HACKER* (JAMES) Profeſſor of Divinity at Friburg in Brisgaw, about the beginning of the XVIIth Century. I only ſpeak of him, to have occaſion to bring to Light (Z) a pſeudonymous Writer, who has not yet appear'd that I know of, in the Catalogues of this kind of Authors.

* And not Hacker, as Konig.

HACKET (WILLIAM) an Engliſh Fanatick in the XVIth Century, was firſt Servant to one Mr. Huſſey, and expreſs'd his Fidelity to him (A) by an Action perfectly Brutal. He afterwards married a rich Widow, and ruin'd her in a little time by his voluptuous Expences. He had never ſtudied, but had a great Memory, which he abuſed in repeating the Miniſters Sermons over his Cups. This he did only to laugh at them, and had no deſign in hearing Sermons, but to furniſh his Memory with this ridiculous Exerciſe. He † was a prodigious Lover of Wine and Women; and he corrupted a Maid that came to his Houſe to ask his Council. He rob'd alſo upon the High-way. At laſt he ſet up for a Prophet, and declar'd, 1. That England ſhould feel the Scourges of Famine, Peſtilence and War, unleſs it eſtabliſh'd the Conſiſtorial Diſcipline: 2. That for the future there ſhould be no more Popes. He ſignify'd the time of this Deſolation of England, which according to him, was the ſame Year he threatned it. He began to propheſie at York and Lincoln, where in Puniſhment of his Boldneſs, he was publickly whipp'd, and condemn'd to be baniſh'd. He had a wonderful fluency at extemporary Prayer; and had choice and very pompous Phraſes, and this made the People believe it was an extraordinary Gift of the Holy Ghoſt. He had an exceſſive Aſſurance (B) in his Prayers, for he ſaid, that if all England ſhould pray for Rain, and he ſhould pray to the contrary, it ſhould not Rain. Edmund Coppinger, and Henry Arthington, two Perſons of moderate Learning, join'd with him: The firſt with the Title of the Prophet of Mercy; and the ſecond with the Title of the Prophet of Judgment. Arthington gave out, that they had an extraordinary Million, (Z) To bring to Light a pſeudonymous Writer.] Hacker having publiſh'd a Diſpute (a) about Predeſtination, was anſwer'd by a Monk of Mantua, under the falſe Name of Daniel Neidinger. He defended himſelf, in a reply, with this Title, Diſputationis de Prædeſtinationis cauſa falſo & mentito authore Dan. Neidingero, vero autem & germano ejus fabro Fr. And. Veranio Ord. Min. Obſ. reg. in urbe Mantuana nuper edita & ibidem a tredecim diverſorum Ord. Fratribus & patribus ſuſceptæ, in quatuor ex quibus coaluit clementa, mendacia, hæreſes, anacephaleoſes, ſordes Sermonis, Analyſis. Autore J. Hackero. Dorſchæus, Profeſſor of Divinity at Strasburg, (b) uſes this Example, to ſhew that the Roman Catholicks accuſe one another of Hereſie. He ſays, that this Reply of Hacker was printed in 1518, but ſince 'tis put in the Oxford Catalogue, printed at Friburg in 1614. I ſuppoſe the firſt Edition was not known to him. The ſame Catalogue mentions Two Volumes of this Hacker, upon Thomas Aquinas. They were printed at Friburg, the firſt in 1619, and the ſecond in 1621. Mr Konig does not diſtinguiſh that, and gives the Title wrong.

(A) Expreſs'd his Fidelity to him by an Action perfectly Brutal.] An Artiſan of Oundle in Northamptonſhire, did ſomething that cauſed an Enmity betwixt him and a Gentleman who had Hacket in his Service. Obſerve how this Servant reveng'd his Maſter. He familiarly and friendly accoſted this Tradeſman's Son (c) and was receiv'd in the ſame manner: Then ſuddenly took him by the Throat, threw him down, and tor off his Note, and inſtead of returning it to the Surgeon, who pretended to ſet it on again, eat it. (d) Eique naſum dentibus evulſit, nec Chirurgo volenti reſtituere tradidit, ſed, ut fertur, barbara immanitate devoravit. Camden does not relate this Fact with the ſame Circumſtances. He ſays, That Hacket enraging the School-Maſter, in Sign of Reconciliation, bit a piece of his Note off, and that it was the School-Maſter who deſired him to reſtore it, that it might be ſowed on while the Wound was freſh. (e) Ad eas adidam adeo efforis (Hacquetus) ut ingenuo Ludimagiſtro, dum redintegrari amoris ſpecie amplecteretur, naſum morſicus abſederit, & coram miſero deformi ſupplicanti ut redderet, quo vulnere adhuc recente aſſuerctur, convomuerit (f) ſeque devoraverit. The variety of theſe Circumſtances is not ſuch, as that we may conclude from it, that the Fact is falſe, we may only obſerve therein a Sign of the Laſneſs or Infirmity of an humane Memory. They that hear a Story, principally attend to the Foundation and Eſſence of the Fact, and this they beſt retain. But having not the ſame Attention to all the Circumſtances, for that would be too painful, they forget many of them. They are not at the trouble of loading their Memory with them, which tenders it not ſtrong enough to bear all the parts of the Burden, and therefore Hours or Days after, if they would tell the ſame Story, they are forc'd to ſupply the Circumſtances they have loſt. Every one makes this Supplement according to the particular Character of his Genius; and hence come infinite Variations, which creep into the very Accounts of the Hiſtorians.

(B) An exceſſive aſſurance in his Prayers.] That hath the Power, ſaid he, and I have the Faith, therefore the thing ſhall be done. He us'd Imprecations, in his Prayers, againſt himſelf, and pretended that the Efficacy of his Imprecations was certain. He boaſted, that in diſputing with a Papiſt, he propoſ'd to him this Condition; I ſubmit inſtantly to eternal Damnation (g), do you do ſo too, and one of us ſhall change his Religion, according to the miſerable or happy Succeſs of our Imprecation. This was very abſurd; for the effect of the Imprecation was to be the ſudden Death of one or the other, and conſequently, neither of them could change his Opinion. The Dead Man could not do it, and the Survivor would have been far from doing it, ſince the bad Succeſs of his Adverſary's Imprecation, had given ſo Authentick a Teſtimony to his Religion. But it muſt not be expected, that ſuch extravagant Viſionaries ſhould avoid Contradictions. Hacket having accuſ'd two great Lords of Treaſon, propoſ'd to them (h) alike Form of Prayer; for this was the Name he gave his execratory Oath. If after you have done it, ſays he, you don't die, I will ſubmit to the Law of Talion. But if you refuſe to do it, and I do it, without any Harm, you ſhall be condemn'd to loſe your Head. The Judges ſent him away as a Madman. He impoſed on abundance of People by theſe ſort of Prayer, and perſwaded them, that for the Sins of Men, the Devils and Conjurers had for two Months, inflicted on him the very Pains of Hell, or within a little of them (i). Camden relates, that by framing by his eternal Damnation, and with them ſeveral horrible Expreſſions, he ſeduc'd Coppinger and Arthington, and made them believe he ſo privily converſ'd with God, and that the Devil had ſtigmatiz'd him. He frequent and moſt fervent Prayer, the outward ſhew of an Holy Life, and the Confeſſion of Faith every Sunday, contributed to the perſwading the ſame things. † Pater, scis te non minus sæpe quam me dixisse Willelmum Hacket * Camden relates this in 1591. See the Remark D. at the end † Taken from Chapter 21. Book of the Britannomachia Monachorum of Henry Fitz Simon, who cites the Records which Sanderus (after many Archbishops of Canterbury) had had of this Business at London, 1592. a attested, Confpiratio pro pratenta disciplina.

Mission, and that after Jesus Christ, the next in Power was William Hacket. Coppinger declar'd, that Hacket was the sole Monarch of Europe. They afterwards went farther, and equall'd him in all things to Jesus Christ, without being oppos'd by Hacket; for he said in his Prayers, † Father, I know thou lovest me equal with thy self. They would have proceeded to the Ceremony of Unction, or Coronation, but he would not suffer them, being already anointed, he said, by the Holy Ghost in Heaven. They ask'd him at last, what he had to command them, and protested they would pay him an Obedience without Reserve. He ordered them to go and proclaim through all the Streets of London, that Jesus Christ was come to judge the World, and lodg'd in such an Inn, and that no Body could put him to Death. They obey'd with so much haste, that Arthington had not time to take his Gloves. They added this to their Master's Instructions, England, repent, repent. They drew together by their bawling, such a Concourse of People, that being come to a great Square, they could go no farther, nor be heard; but finding an empty Chariot, they got into it, and discours'd of the (C) important Commission of William Hacket. They return'd to him, and when they saw him, Arthington cried out before the People, Behold the King of the Earth. This happen'd the 16th. of July, * 1592. They were prosecuted and tried. Hacket was sentenc'd to be hang'd and quarter'd the 28th. of July, and the Sentence was accordingly executed. Coppinger famish'd himself in Prison: But Arthington was † pardoned. The Blasphemies contain'd in the Prayer that Hacket made upon the Scaffold, are so horrid, that I (D) shall only relate them in Latin. ‖ We shall see in the Remarks, some Particulars of his Enthusiasm, compli-cated with Rebellion. He perfectly hated (E) Queen Elizabeth. The truth of this ought not to be question'd, upon pretence that I have it from the Book of a Jesuit, for Camden's Annals, contain most of the same Facts, and with greater Force.

HADRIAN (PUBLIUS ÆLIUS) Emperor, would furnish a very long Article, should we omit nothing of his principal Qualities and Actions. I will content my self with some of them, and repeat as little as may be, what we find in Moreri's Dictionary, in which (A) this Article is not very full of Faults.

Hadrian

(C) The Important Commission.] William Hacket. They said, that he partook of the Nature of Glorified Bodies, and was to convert all Europe to the Confirmed Discipline; and that the Power of Judgment was committed to him. They added, that his Lot was dated to see him, should find him in such an Habit, and were to tell, that all who refuse to obey this King of all Europe, shall kill one another, and that the Queen shall be dethron'd. (a) Before they undertook this fond Design, they went to a Puritan Minister, call'd Wiggington, and protested to him, that the Night before, Jesus Christ appeared to them, not in Body, but by his principal Spirit, by which he dwelt in William Hacket, with greater Fulness than in any other, and that Hacket was the Angel who was to come before the end of the World, with a Crook in his Hand, to separate the Goats from the Sheep; that he was to trample Satan under his Feet, and totally overturn the Kingdom of Antichrist. (b) The Day they went to preach up this new Kingdom through the London-Streets, Hacket commanded them to say, that Jesus Christ was come with his Fan in his Hand, to judge the World, and that this was as true, as that God was in Heaven. They punctually discharged their Commission, and when they were in the Chariot, they declared, that Hacket, after dy glorified as to his Body, participated of Jesus Christ by his principal Spirit, and that he was there with the Fan to establish the Gospel in Europe.

(D) Blasphemies——— that I shall only relate them in Latin.] They exceed those of Caligula, and yet they were the Conclusion of a most devout Prayer, whence we may infer, that there is nothing so extravagant but the Heart of Man is capable of. "(d) Hæc fui. ultima tua oratio. Deus cœli, Potentissime Jehovah, Alpha & Omega, Dominus Dominorum, Rex Regum, æterne Deus. Tu me nôsti verum illum Jehovah quem misisti. Miraculum aliquod ex nubibus ostende his infidelibus, & Literæ me ab his minneis meis Simmis successorem, & te è throno detractum manibus meis lacerato. Camden relating the same Blasphemies, almost in the same Words, adds, that Hacket pronounc'd others still more execrable, (e) Atque magis infandis, Conversus ad complures Lapicum admocentem, Tune spurie, inquit, Hackettum Regem tuum subpendes? Laqueo innodatus oculis in cœlum fulsatis, Hoccine, inquit frendens, pro regno collato rependis? verbo ulturus. This Historian observes, that this Enthusiast and his two Companions, refus'd to take their Hats off before their Judges, and impudently answered, they were above the Magistrates; that at last, Hacket (f) own'd himself a Criminal, but answer'd in so blasphemous a manner, that all the Auditory was astonish'd. There was in this perhaps a great deal of Fraud; for who knows but that he had a mind to insinuate to his Judges, that he was distracted. However, his other Gestures and affected Gravity, shew'd no Sign of Madness. (g) This we have from Camden. Note, That Arthington printed a Book to retract his Repentance. (h)

(E) He perfectly hated Queen Elizabeth.] He could never pray for her, and his Design was to rob her of her Crown and Life, and change the Form of Government. He heard the Sermon bare-headed but he put on his Hat in the Prayers that mention'd the Queen. (i) He confess'd to the Judges before whom he was tried, That he had stabb'd the Effigies of this Prince's to the Heart, with an Iron Pin; that he never owned her for Queen. (A) In which this Article is not very full of Faults.] 'Tis one of the best. I have however observed, without entering into a general Discussion, some twelve things which I think can't be proved. I. That there was in Italy, a City call'd Italica. II. That Hadrian rebuilt Adria. III. That upon his return from England, he heard in Languedoc of Plotina's Death. IV. That he built a Temple at Nismes. V. That Quadratus and Aristides were usher'd by Severus one of the Emperor's Lieutenants, when they presented Books in Favour of the Christian Religion. VI. That Jerusalem and Alia were two different Cities in Judæa. VII. That Plutarch was Hadrian's Tutor. VIII. That Hadrian recall'd Epictetus, Numenius, and other Learned Men to Rome. IX. That he sent others to Alexandria, to teach the Sciences there, before he went himself to that City. X. That he understood the Mathematicks, and wrote Tracts of them. XI. That he died the 12th. of July, in the Year 138, having reign'd 20 Years, 10 Months, and 20 Days. XII. That Phavorinus was his Secretary. We see in my Article, that Hadrian, died the 10th. of July, and began his Reign in the 11th. of August. If he had died the 12th. of July, it must have been said, that he reigned 20 Years, 11 Months, and one Day. Let it be observed, that I will not deny that he received a Letter from Serenus Granius, Proconsul of Asia, exhorting him to Equity towards the Christians, and that he studied Geometry. Spartian (m) says it expressly, and Mr. Moreri

(m) This ought to be understood only of the Study of Geometry

Hadrian, who was born (B) at Rome, the 24th. of January, 76, loſt his Father (C) Ten Years after, and had for his Guardians, Trajan (D) his Relation, and Cælius Tatianus a Roman Knight. His Genius ſo enclin'd him to the Study † of the Greek Tongue, that it occaſion'd him to be jeſted on. He ſerved early in the Armies, and was Tribune of a Legion before the Death of Domitian. The Army of the lower Moeſia choſe him * to compliment Trajan, adopted by the Emperor Nerva, and it was he that brought Trajan the firſt News of Nerva's Death. He regain'd the Favour of this Emperor, which he had almoſt loſt by his exceſſive Expences, which had brought him into Debt. He ‖ married (E) a grand Niece of this Prince; and he had in the Empreſs a great Patroneſs. The Speech he ſpoke before the Senate when he was Queſtor, ¶ was ſo dull, that he was hiſs'd for it: Upon which he apply'd himſelf hard to the ſtudy of the Latin Tongue, and became very ingenious and eloquent. He attended Trajan in the Expedition  againſt the Daci; and to make his Court effectually to him, he drank ſtoutly, and was nobly rewarded for it. He had been Tribune of †† the People, before he went with Trajan to the ſecond Dacian War. He did ſome noble Actions there, and receiv'd ‡‡ a Preſent, which gave him ſome hopes ſucceeding to the Empire. He was made Prætor ſome time after, and afterwards commanded in the lower Pannonia, with ſo good a Conduct, as was worth him the Conſulſhip *. The Orations he compos'd (F) for Trajan, increas'd his Intereſt. After the raiſing of the Siege of Atra in Arabia, Trajan being ſick, and reſolved to return to Rome, left him the Command of the Army. He had before given him the Government of Syria; and finding himſelf near his end, adopted him. ‡ We examine in Pliny's Article, Whether this Adoption was Fictitious. What is certain, is, that Hadrian receiving at Antioch, almoſt at the ſame time, the News of his Adoption, and of the Death of Trajan, caus'd himſelf to be declared Emperor the 11th. of Auguſt 117. One of the firſt things he did, was to abandon almoſt all the Conqueſts

Conquests of Trajan, and to be contented that (G) Euphrates should be the Bounds of the Empire. He did not return to Rome till 118. The Senate decreed him a Triumph, and the Title of Father of the Country *; but he refus'd it, and would have the Triumph given to Trajan's Image. His Bounties to the People (H) were very extraordinary. The Year following he went into Mœsia, to repulse the Sarmatæ †. During his Absence, many Persons of the first Rank ‡ were put to Death; and it was to no purpose for him to protest it was not by his Orders, for he fail'd not to be loaded with all the Odium of these Violences. Never Prince travell'd so quick as he; there being hardly a Province in the Empire, but what he honour'd with his Presence. And as he was magnificent, and desir'd a Personal Knowledge of every thing, he every where left some Marks of his Liberality and Exactness, in examining the Conduct of the Governours. 'Tis suppos'd he began his Travels in the Year 120. He visited France, Germany, and England, where he built a Wall to hinder the Islanders under his Obedience from being ravaged by those that had revolted from the Roman Government. He return'd into France in 121, from whence he went to Spain; 'tis thought it was at that time, he went to Mauritania. His first Voyage to the East was pretty long; for he return'd not to Greece till the Year 125. He pass'd the Winter at Athens, and was initiated in the Mysteries of Ceres. He was at Rome in the beginning of the Year 129 ‖, and 'tis believ'd he went into Africa the same Year, and that after his Return to Rome, he set out again for the East in the Year 130. Having pass'd thro' Asia, where many Kings came to do him Homage, he went into Egypt in the Year 132. He spent the Winter at Athens in 135, and the Spring following came back to Rome. He adopted Lucius Aurelius Annius Ceionius Commodus Verus, who though he had Names enough already, took besides that of Ælius. After this Adoption, Hadrian (I) retir'd to Tibur, where he built sumptuous Edifices, and gave himself up to Effeminacy, and then to Cruelty; for he put many People to Death, either by open Violence, or Clandestine Ways, and spar'd not his own Brother-in-Law Servianus, of 90 Years of Age. Lucius Verus dying the first of January 138, Hadrian adopted Titus Antoninus, and charg'd him to adopt Marcus Annius Verus, and the Son of Lucius Verus. STROS parasset. Domitian (l) had other Men to write his Letters, and make his Speeches and Edicts. It was not Nero but Seneca, that compos'd Claudius's Funeral Oration, which he recited (m). 'Tis true, that the old Gentlemen, who had nothing to do but to make Comparisons betwixt the past and present times, amus'd themselves with observing, that before Nero, no Prince had need of a borrowed Eloquence: as we are told by Tacitus, in the Third Chapter of the Thirteenth Book of his Annals. Adnotabant seniores, quibus otiosum est vetera & præsentia contendere, primum ex iis qui rerum potiti essent Neronem alienæ facundiæ egvisse. M. Spanheim (n) observes, that the Roman Emperors, sometimes imploy'd their Quæstors, not only in composing, but also in speaking for them their Orations, as Suetonius amongst them observes of Nero, and even of Augustus: For the rest, if we believe the Emperor Julian, (o) it was not out of Ignorance, but Lazyness, that Trajan made use of Sura.

(G) Euphrates should be the Bounds of the Empire.] St. Austin urges this Action of Hadrian, to jeer the Idolaters, who said, the God Terminus would never give place to Jove himself, at the building of the Capitol, which was a Prelage, that the Limits of the Roman Empire should never shrink. 'Your God 'Terminus, says St. Austin pleasantly to them, (a) stood 'in greater fear of Hadrian, king of Men, than of Jupiter King of the Gods. Postea in orientalibus partibus Hadriani voluntate mutati sunt termini imperii Romani. Ille namque tres provincias nobiles Armeniam, Mesopotamiam, Assyriam cum finium concessit imperio, ut Deus ille Terminus qui Romanos terminos secundum illos tuebatur, & per illud pulcherrimum auspicium loco non cesserat Jovi, plus Hadrianum regem hominum quam regem deorum timuisse videatur. There is no probality, that the abandoning these Conquests was the effect (b) of any Envy Hadrian had to Trajan. For what greater Honour cou'd be done to the Memory of the late Emperor, than to shew, that things could not be maintain'd in the same height he had rais'd them to? We must say then, that the Impossibility of preserving these conquer'd Countries, induc'd Hadrian to this Sacrifice. (c) Omnia trans Euphratem ac Tigrim reliquit exempto, ut dicebat, Catonis, qui Macedonas liberos pronunciavit quia teneri non poterant. He chose rather to suffer in the Comparison betwixt him and his Predecessor, than expose his Empire to the Confusions that threatned it on all Parts. Ammianus Marcellinus says, that before Jovian, no Emperor or Consul, gave up an Inch of Ground to the Enemy. Mr. Valois (d) pretends he had reason to say it, and that Casaubon had no right to reflect on him for it. See the Remark D of the Article JOVI'AN.

(H) Bounties——were very extraordinary.] "It seems, that he forgave in general, all that was "due from private Person in Rome and Italy, and "in all the Provinces, whatever was owing for "Sixteen Years, at least in the Imperial Provinces: "For Spartian, and an Inscription of this Year 118, "seem to restrain it to these——He burnt "in Trajan's Place, the Bonds and Memorandums of all that he had forgiven, that no "body might fear being call'd to Account for it, "for the future——This Remission amounted to "immense Sums, and some Learned Men, who "have reduc'd it to the value of our Money, "make it rise to Twenty two Millions five "hundred thousand Crowns of Gold. This Generosity had no President before him: The Memorial of it, is not only preserv'd in Historians, but "also in famous Inscriptions of this Year, and the "following, in which it might be perfected, and in "Medals, representing Hadrian with a Torch in his "Hand, setting Fire to the Obligations he had remitted. I Copy this from Mr. Tillemont (c) in whose Remarks may be seen an Examination of many Difficulties concerning this. I do not enter into them; but only make this Reflection, That there is no Bonfire for a Town taken, or a Battle won, that can please the People so much as this of Hadrian. I have read somewhere, that the Venetian Ambassador, Burning before Henry IV. the Papers in which he own'd himself indebted for great Sums to that Republick, this Prince, who loved witty Sayings, said he never saw a better Fire in his Life. Agesilaus, one of the Lacedæmonian Ephori (f) made use of this Thought on a like Occasion.

This Emperor's Dropſie oppreſt and vex'd him to that degree, that he grew as it were (K) raging mad. All imaginable Remedies were employ'd to cure him. tion of the effeminate Life this Emperor led in his Retreat, whilſt Lucius Ælius Cæſar Governed at Rome, but he makes a groſs Blunder in Chronology. He ſays, that Hadrian plung'd himſelf into the infamous Amours of Antinous; which is not to know, that Antinous's Death preceded the Adoption of Ælius Verus. As for his Buildings, theſe are his Words; (b) Rus proprium Tibur ſeceſſit, permiſſa urbe Lucio Ælio Cæſari: ipſe uti beatis locupletibus mos, palatia exſtruere, curare epulas, ſigna, tabulas pictas. Add to this a Paſſage of Spartian (i), Tiburtinam villam mirè ædificavit, ita ut in ea & provinciarum & locorum celeberrima nomina inſcriberet: velut Lyceum, Academiam, Prytaneum, Canopum, Pœcilen, Tempe vocaret. Et ut nihil prætermitteret, etiam inferos finxit.

(K) That he grew as it were raging mad.] To this time is to be referr'd what Lampridius ſays, that Hadrian impos'd his Name on a Town that was call'd Oreſta; and that by this means his Madneſs went off a little. He had this Advice from an Oracle (k) Oreſtam quidem urbem Hadrianus ſuo nomini vindicari juſſit eo tempore quo furore cæperit laborare, ut ex reſponſo quum ei dictum eſſet ut in furioſi alicujus domum vel nomen irrepſeret. Nam ex eo emollitam inſaniam ferunt, per quam multos Senatores occidi juſſerat, quibus ſervatis Antoninus Pii nomen meruit, quod eos poſt ad Senatum adduxit, quos omnes juſſu principis interfectos credebant. The Sieur Triſtan (l) fell into two groſs Miſtakes upon this Paſſage. He makes Lampridius ſay, that Hadrian recovered of his Phrenſie, after he had valued the Town of Oreſta, and that this happen'd at the beginning of Hadrian's Reign. It was eaſie to perceive, that, Lampridius ſpeaks not of a Voyage of this Emperor, and that what he ſays, muſt relate to the time that Antoninus was already adopted; which was but a few Month's before this Prince's Death.

(L) He attributed his Death to them.] Xiphilin relates (a) that Hadrian died with theſe Words in his Mouth, The Multitude of Phyſicians have kill'd the Monarch. Ὁλοι γαρ ἰατροι βασιλεα ἀπεκτονασιν. He adds, that theſe Words were a kind of Proverb. Pliny aſſures us, that there was an Epitaph, which contained a parallel Propoſition: (f) Hinc illa infelicis nomen nei inſcriptio TURBA SE MEDICORUM PERISSE. I wonder that St. Epiphanius has not touch'd upon this Circumſtance of Hadrian's laſt Hours, where he ſays, that he ſent for all the Phyſicians of his Empire, and expos'd them (b) after the Experiment of the Vanity of their Preſcriptions, and wrote a Satyrical Letter againſt this Art and Profeſſion. If this ancient Father was no better inform'd about the Fact it ſelf, than the Circumſtance of time, his Authority is nothing, for he ſays, that after he had written this Satyr, he departed from Rome, to go into Egypt, which is falſe. 'Tis certain, that after the Phyſicians had tried in vain all Experiments to cure his Dropſie, he only travell'd to Baiæ. It can't be doubted, but he had conceiv'd a great Contempt or Indignation againſt them, ſince at laſt, he (c) gave over all courſe of Diet, and eat whatever his Fancy led him to.

(M) Miraculous Cures.] Obſerve what Spartian relates: A Woman came to tell Hadrian, that ſhe had been admoniſh'd in a Dream to repreſent to him, that ſince he was to be cur'd, he ſhould have a care of killing himſelf; that ſhe had loſt her Sight, for not having obey'd the Inſtructions of her Dream; that ſhe had receiv'd a ſecond Order to come and tell him the ſame Things, with a Promiſe of recovering her Sight, by kiſſing his Knees. The Woman having executed this Command, and waſh'd her Eyes with the Water of a Temple, ſaw as well as before. Another Miracle: A Man born blind (d) came from the utmoſt part of Pannonia, and touch'd Hadrian, who had the Fever; which done, the Man came to his Sight, and Hadrian loſt his Fever. Spartian had the Prudence to add, that according to the Teſtimony of Marius Maximus, there was nothing but Counterfeiting in all this. 'Tis eaſie to conjecture as much, tho' we ſhould know nothing of what Marius Maximus ſaid. There's no difficulty in perceiving, that Antonimus, Hadrian's adopted Son, uſed this Stratagem to give him ſome hope, and to remove his Melancholly that oppreſs'd him. How often have theſe Tricks been plaid ſince that, to foſter Superſtitions, and cover State Intrigues. Fallacies, you'll ſay, are lawful, upon Children and the Sick. That's an Argument upon the People, who are always Children, and diſtempered in ſome reſpects. But omitting theſe Reflections, which would fall on too many formidable Perſons, let us ſay a Word or two of Grammatical Criticiſm, to the great Salmaſius. He will not have the Man that came from Pannonia, to be blind from his Birth, but only for a long time; and therefore, inſtead of reading Natus Cæcus, he reads Vetus Cæcus. His reaſon is, that it can't be believ'd that People born blind, recovered their Sight, and that it is more credible, that this might happen to People blind for ſome Years. Obſerve, that in the following Note he confutes Caſaubon, who underſtood by the Word Simulationem, a Magical Charm, a Conjuration. This Senſe is unworthy of Caſaubon. Simulatio in that place only ſignifies a Counterfeiting. Salmaſius explains it ſo, and hits it right: but upon that Hypotheſis, what becomes of the difference he finds betwixt born blind, and one blind for a long time? Does it not ſee, that it was as eaſie for Antonimus to ſuborn one counterfeiting Blindneſs from his Birth, as for three Days, and that 'tis as eaſie for one as the other to obtain his Sight, by touching a Prince that had a Fever, and to cure this Fever at the ſame time? But what is this to the purpoſe? He had read Vetus Cæcus in the Heidelberg Manuſcript; he knew there was Veteres Cæci in Juvenal, and antiqua cæcitas in Marcellus; Would a Man loſe theſe Diſcoveries for the ſake of good reaſoning?

(N) He ſought Death, and could not find it.] So that Severian's Prayer was heard, which he made in dying. (e) Immortal Gods, cry'd he, ye Witneſſes of my Innocence, I have but one Favour to beg of you, which is, that Hadrian may paſſionately deſire to die, and yet may not die. This Prayer beſpoke a Soul exceſſively vindicative; no Imprecation was ever more ſevere; witneſs theſe Words in the 9th. of the Revelation, and 6th. Verſe: And in thoſe Days ſhall Men ſeek Death, and ſhall not find it, and ſhall deſire to die, and Death ſhall flee from them. If we had Hadrian's Letter (g) in which he deſcrib'd the deplorable Condition of a Man who could not die, tho' he deſir'd it, we ſhould ſee ſomething very Tragical; for a Pen ſo eloquent and learn'd as his, could not chuſe, but excellently repreſent the Miſeries he felt. He promis'd Impunity, and even a Reward to whoever ſhould kill him, and finding (g) no Body that could do him that good Office, he wept like a Child; that (h) he was able to cauſe the Death of others, and could not kill himſelf. His Diſcontents and Suſpicions, induc'd him to take off a great many Perſons, and 'twas perhaps on that occaſion, that perceiving the publick was not ſatisfied about the

a great Memory ‡, and perfectly underſtood Arts and Sciences, and wrote (O) many Books. He was on the other hand Cruel, Envious, Unchaſt, Superſtitious, and addicted to Magick. How much more abominable was his Paſſion for † Antinous. I omit his (P) exceſſive Curioſity. He publiſh'd no Edict againſt the Chriſtians; 'tis however fear'd, that his exceſſive Superſtition was the Cauſe of their Perſecution. The Jews riſing afreſh in his Reign, defended themſelves for three Years againſt the Arms he ſent into their Country: After which they were Worſted, and treated with the utmoſt Severity. They tell a ridiculous Fable, about a Queſtion they pretend was put by this Emperor to a Rabbin, upon the Article of the Reſurrection. I ſpeak of it in the Article Barchochebas, as alſo of the things done then in Judæa. Many particular Facts which Contribute to the filling up Hadrian's Character, his Jealouſie againſt thoſe that excell'd in Arts, &c. will be found in ſeveral places of this Dictionary as we have occaſion to ſpeak of the Perſons concern'd in them. The Alphabetical Index will point out every thing. The Senate only granted the Continuance of Hadrian's Acts, ‡ to the Tears and Intreaties of Antoninus; for they had reſolved to Repeal them. But when once this Reſolution was Evaded, Antoninus obtain'd whatever he had a mind to, viz. Hadrian's Apotheoſis. He built a Temple to him at Puzzolo, and Eſtabliſh'd there ſome Games with ſome Companies of Prieſts, and other Appertenances of Deification †. Hadrian had not waited till that time to taſt Divine Honours, having himſelf Seiſed on the Celeſtial Crown. He Conſecrated to himſelf an Altar in Athens in the Temple of Olympick Jove: And as he paſs'd † through many Cities of Aſia, he Multiplied the Temples he built to himſelf. There is no probability, that he deſign'd them

(O) And wrote many Books.] He Writ both in Verſe and Proſe. There remain ſome Fragments (l) of his Latin Poems; and ſome of his Greek Verſes in the Anthology. You'll find in Caſaubon and Salmaſius, (m) the Epitaph of his Hunting-horſe, (n) in Latin Verſe. This Emperor had ſuch a Love for his Horſe, that he built (o) a Tomb for him. St. Johannes Byzantinus Cites twice a Poem intituled Alexandreis, whoſe Authors Name was Adrian: 'Tis not generally agreed that this is a Work of our Emperor. He wrote abundance of Verſes (p) upon his Amours. He made others alſo in the Praiſe (q) of Plotina his Benefactreſs. We can't tell whether a Collection of his witty ſayings were publiſh'd, ſince Spartian's Words (r) may only ſignifie, that many of them were remembred: But 'tis certain he publiſh'd ſome Diſcourſes, and ſome Orations, (a) we ſtill find them cited. We find in Soſipater, that he had ſaid in the firſt Book of his Diſcourſes, that Auguſtus was no very Learned Man. Tametſi Auguſtus non peruditus homo fuerit, ut id adverbium (Obiter) ex uſu potius quam ratione protulerit.

By the way here's an Authority for thoſe who in the Buſineſs of Languages would have Cuſtom ſubmit to Reaſon. Here's alſo a great Example for thoſe whoſe moſt ſerious Studies are a rigorous Examination of their native Tongue; for it appears by the Paſſage of Soſipater that our Emperor was (b) in Latin, what Vaugelas was in French. Aulus Gellius (c) quotes the Speech that Hadrian ſpoke before the Senate for the Inhabitants of Italica his Father's native Place. But this Emperors main Work was doubtleſs, the Hiſtory of his Life. He was willing it ſhould appear under another's Name, probably that he might have the more Liberty to commend himſelf. Phlegon (d) one of his freed Men, a Learned Man, put his Name to his Maſters Work. Hadrian compos'd ſome Books in imitation (e) of Antimachus a Greek Poet, of whom he was a great Admirer. Theſe Books were very obſcure. Spartian had preſerved the Title of them; but 'tis a Queſtion whether the Manuſcripts retain'd it right. So that this very Title is a Riddle, and a Rack to the Criticks. Salmaſius turns his Head an hundred Ways, to draw his Concluſion; and after he has fix'd the Reading that he thinks the only good one, he is as much at a loſs as before. Solam eam (Historiam) eſſe veram (Lectionem) mihi perſuadeo; quomodo tamen explicanda ſit juxta cum ignotiſſimus Scio. If this Work of Hadrian had been to be handed down to us, it might have been ſaid to the Author when he was Writing it: You are going,

To fabrick Racks for future Salmaſius's

The very Title will make them ſtoop and give up their arms. 'Tis not well determin'd whether Hadrian wrote concerning the Military Art. 'Tis certain he made ſome fine (g) Regulations, and eſtabliſh'd an excellent Diſcipline in his Troops. Vegetius owns that he made uſe of Hadrian's Regulations; but as he acknowledges the Imperfection of Reſpect to thoſe of Trajan and Auguſtus, which yet affords no grounds to pretend that theſe two Emperors writ Books upon this Subject, 'tis plain that Geſner (h) had no reaſon to ſay, by vertue of this Paſſage of Vegetius, that Hadrian writ concerning the Military Art. Some will have (i) him to have Written upon Tacticks, and that Urbicus's Work upon this Subject is Hadrian's, excepting Urbicus's additions. Mr. Rigaut has publiſh'd a Fragment of it.

(P) His exceſſive Curioſity.] I might give it this Name, tho' he had not deſired to penetrate into Futurity, ſo much as he did whether by Aſtrology or Magick. There are other Reaſons enough to make him thought of too inquiſitive a Spirit. He is call'd by Tertullian (k), curioſitatum omnium explorator; and by Ammianus Marcellinus, futurorum ſciſcitationi nimiæ deditus. I ſhall not Examine whether it became a Prince to be ſo fond of beholding upon the Place, whatever he met with in Books concerning the ſeveral Countries of the World. (l) Peregrinationis ita cupidus ut omnia quæ legerat de locis orbis, præſens vellet addiſcere. The Voyages he undertook to ſatisfie himſelf in this Point, were not uſeleſs to the Provinces; therefore let us not Cavil him hereupon. Let us ſuffer him to aſcend Mount Ætna to ſee whether the Riſing Sun has the ſame Colours as the Rainbow, and to get upon Mount Caſſius (n) to ſee the ſame Luminary Ariſe: But who can pardon him for imploying numerous Spies, to inform him of all the Secrets of Families: What a Woman Writ to her Husband, what an Husband ſaid to his Wife. (o) Erat curioſus non ſolum domûs ſuæ, ſed etiam amicorum, ita ut per frumentarios occulta omnia exploraret, nec adverterent amici ſciri ab Imperatore ſuam vitam priuſquam ipſe hoc Imperator offenderet. 'Tis not to be doubted but that the intelligence the Spies gave him facilitated his Enterprizes of Gallantry; for he gave no better quarter to his Friends thereupon, than to indifferent People. 'Tis thus I could willingly underſtand the Words of Spartian. them (Q) for Jesus Christ; and we can't tell where Lampridius had what he says upon that Head. It does not appear that any other besides himself had any Knowledge of this Design.

HADRIAN, Cardinal, Priest of the Title of St. Chrysogonus, was a Native of Cornetto, in (A) Tuscany. He was Nuncio to Innocent VIII. (B) in Scotland, and then in France; and after he had been Clerk and Treasurer to the Apostolick Chamber, he was honoured with a Cardinal's Cap by Pope Alexander VI. whose Secretary he had been. This Cardinal's Life was a Scene of odd Changes, the end whereof was far from being honourable. He (C) narrowly escap'd it, the Day that Alexander VI. poison'd himself by Inadvertency. Afterwards he so incurr'd the Enmity of Julius II. that he was forc'd to hide himself in the Mountains of Trent, fulminated with the severe * Decrees of this Pontiff. Being recall'd by Leo X. he had so little Gratitude for this Favour, that he engaged in a Conspiracy (D) against him. This Pope forgave him this Fault; and expedited Letters of † Pardon for him. But the Cardinal did not (E) trust to them; or had not the Power to withstand the Remorse of Conscience, which the Presence of the Objects might render more importunate: He made his escape by Night, and it was never truly known (F) what was become of him. He was one of the first that attempted the Reformation of the Latin Tongue in a true way. He studied Cicero with excellent Success, and made abundance of admirable Discoveries concerning the Purity of this Language. The Treatise he wrote de Sermone Latino, during his absconding in the Alps, is a Proof of it. Whilst he was labouring upon this || he interrupted a very considerable Work, which was a Latin Translation of the Old Testament. Some † reckon it amongst the Works he compos'd. 'Tis pretended (Compare with this, what is said in the Remark E. of the Article Lubieniezki.

(A) Quidem servaverit fidem. Sovereigns have so many other ways to make themselves formidable, that they ought to leave this to Parasites (g) Scire volunt secreta domus, atque inde timeri; and yet you see some in all Ages, who spare nothing to be exactly inform'd of all that is said in Houses. Hadrian's Curiosity was doubtless the cause, that almost all his greatest Friends, and they that were raised to the greatest Dignities, incurr'd his Enmity. He greedily swallow'd all the Reports brought him concerning his Friends. (i) Facile de amicis quid insusurrabatur audivit. To conclude, since I have considered him in this Remark, as a curious Traveller, I will finish it, by saying, that he march'd on Foot (k) as a common Soldier, and that he never cover'd his Head in any Weather. He suffered by it at last.

(B) In Scotland.] I don't find he was Nuncio in England, but yet he gain'd the Affection of King Henry VII. who made him Bishop of Hereford, and of Bath and Wells. (b)

(C) He escap'd it narrowly.] There is something very observable in this Adventure. 'Tis thus related by our Historians: Alexander the VIth's Bastard (c) longing for Cardinal Hadrian Cornet's (d) Spoils, had agreed with the Pope to go and sup with him in his Villa, and had order'd thither some Bottles of excellent Wine, prepared with a Mixture to poison their Host. Now it happen'd, that the Father and Son coming betimes, and being very thirsty by reason of the heat of the Season, ask'd for some Wine, and whilst the Servant who knew the Secret, was out of the way, another gave them some of this. The Father, who drank it pure, died the same Day, which was the 17th of August, 1503. The Son, who was more vigorous, and had dilated it with Water, had leisure to have recourse to Antidotes, and being wrapt up in a Mules Belly, he escap'd; but there hung upon him a Langor, that permitted him not to act in his most necessary Occasions. Hadrian had not been promoted to the Cardinalship above two or three Months. Guicciardin deserves to be read (e) concerning this Pope's Death.

(D) In a Conspiracy against him.] Cardinal Alfonso Petrucci was the head of it; they aim'd at Leo X's Life. Some say, that our (f) Hadrian engaged not with the hope of being Pope, but that these hopes were grounded upon an Prediction which promis'd the Pontificate to one Hadrian of mean Birth, but of excellent Learning. As all this agreed to Hadrian de Cornetto, he applied himself to the fulfilling it, and thereby lost all his Honour, and the Repose of his Life. We may venture to say, that there are no greater Pests of Mankind, than those Pretenders to Predictions; for they find but too many ignorant and turbulent Spirits, whom they engage in fatal Enterprizes. A well govern'd State ought not to suffer such People, which way soever they boast to have consulted Heaven, whether by the Stars, or St. John's Revelation. Most of them are Impostors, who have no other aim, than to disturb the publick Peace. He that deceiv'd Cardinal de Cornetto, was a Magician in the Apennine Mountains, as Mr. Varillas says, who tells this Story at large. See the 27th Page of his Secret History of Florence. But Paul Jovius says, it was a Sorceress. Certam spem adipiscendi Pontificatus conceperunt ex oraculo fatidicæ Mulieris. Thus he speaks about the beginning of the 4th. Book of the History of Leo X.

(E) Did not trust to them.] Mr. Varillas observes, that two things made Cardinal Hadrian diffident; one was, that Cardinal Soderin and he were fin'd ten thousand Crowns apiece, tho' they had prostrated themselves at the Pope's Feet, and the Pope had declared in a full Consistory, that he would pardon the Cardinals, who were accomplices in the Conspiracy, if they confess'd their Crime immediately, and ask'd his Pardon before their Brethren. The other was the Marks of his Indignation, which in spight of his Endeavours, appear'd in Leo's Countenance. See the 283, and 284 Pages of the Secret History of Florence.

pretended also, that his Tract de Poetis is still extant. As to his Treatise de vera Philosophia, there is no doubt it was printed at Cologne, in 1548. He dealt in (G) Poetry.

HADRIAN VI. was born (A) at Utrecht, in the Year * 1459. The Genius discovered in him in his Childhood, obliged (B) his Father to design him for Learning, though he had not wherewithal to maintain him in that Capacity. But the University of Louvain, supplied this Domestick Indigence. The young Man was admitted in a Colledge, where a certain Number of Scholars were maintained Gratis. We are told, that he us'd to read by Night, by the Light (BA) of the Lamps that were hung up in Churches, or the Corners of the Street: Which was both a sign of his Poverty and of his studious Temper. He made very great Progress in all kinds of Sciences, and if he was nor a Poet (C) nor a Polite Writer, it was because he did not value it. His Manners were exemplary; and no Man was ever known to intrigue less fuit, neque quò abierit, neque uli sit quatuordecim jam annorum spatio quispiam potuit explorare. He adds, that it was thought his Servant kill'd him, for the sake of the Pistoles the Cardinal had sewed up in his Wastcoat. Constans tamen opinio est eum insuto in interiorem thoracem auro onerato comitis famuli perfidia oppressum, auroque furtorio cadaver in solitarium aliquem locum abjectum occultari. Father Oldoini observes, that he was divested of the Purple (g) and his Benefices; that he fled into Turkey, and died Clandestinly, on what Day or Year no Man knows. This agrees with Leander Albertus, in his Description of Italy, Nostra insuper ætate, says he, magna illustrandæ patriæ principia jecerat Adrianus Cardinalis ex hac urbe (Cornetto) cum literarum studio, tum cæremoniarum, sed qui metu Leonis X. Pontif. Max. clam Roma profectus, exinde nunquam apparuit. The Author of the Secret History of Florence says, (h) that Cardinal Hadrian went from Rome in the disguise of a Reaper; that he travell'd only by Night till he came into his Country, where he spent the rest of his Days in changing hiding-places: So fully perswaded was he of the Magician's Prediction. Here are two things borrowed from Paul Jovius (i); the rest is perhaps the Author's Invention. Guicciardin is still more particular than Paul Jovius (k) Adriano partitosi occultamente, quello che s'avenisse di lui, non fu mai più, che si sapesse, nè trovato nè veduto in luogo alcuno. He says this under the Year 1517. whence we may conclude, that Pierius Valerianus's Dialogues de infelicitate literatorum, were compos'd in 1531. Moreri has plac'd our Hadrian's Flight in the Year 1518. Why did he not follow Guicciardin's Chronology? He sends this Fugitive to Venice and Riva, in the Diocese of Trent. I fear he confounds the Exile under Julius II. with that under Leo X.

(G) He dealt in Poetry.] We have his little Poem de Venatione, and that intitled Ito Julii II. Pontificis Romani, without reckoning the Verses in the Praise of the Holy Virgin, and the Description of the Palace he built near the Vatican, which is at present possess'd by the Family Colonna. 'Tis call'd the English Palace, because Cardinal Hadrian bequeath'd it to the King of England (l).

(A) Born at Utrecht.] This Town in Latin, is call'd Trajectum ad Rhenum, as Maestrick is called Trajectum ad Mosam. Some (a) only saying, that Hadrian was Trajectensis, have caus'd others to make him (b) a Native of Maestricht. So true it is, that the least Inaccuracy occasions some Author to trip. Probably Father Labbe perceiv'd Bellarmin's Negligence; for in his Commentary upon this Jesuit's Ecclesiastical Writers, he does not use the Word Trajectensis, but Ultrajectensis. 'Tis so certain, that Trajectum alone rather signifies, Maestricht than Utrecht, that M. de Marolles is not excusable for (c) taking Trajectensem urbem for Utrecht, in the Second Book of Gregorius Turonensis. The Subject was concerning the retreat of S. Servatius, Bishop of Tongres, and that was another reason for his not mistaking Maestricht. I doubt not but the Learned Onuphrius Panvinius has taken Trajectensis here, for a Man born at Maestricht. Adrianus VI. says he (d), Trajectensis, Flander vel Brabantinus. An Error a Thousand times more pardonable than that of a German Writer, who says (e) Adrianus VI. patria Derthusiensis Germanus. Some make him born in Italy: (f) Ut plane ridiculi sunt qui in suis ad Alphonsi Ciaconii historiam additionibus natales Adriani majoresve Italiæ vindicant. Jerome Niger, an Italian Author, said of this Pope, (g) He speaks Latin always well enough for a Spaniard.

(B) His Father.] His Name was Florent Boyens (h) and he got his Living by Barge making, Naupegus. Others make him a Weaver, and others a Brewer. I think the first Opinion is the rightest, since Valerius Andreas, who has made a great many Enquiries concerning Pope Hadrian VI. says not a Word of the other Trades ascribed to his Father. As for the Son, he was call'd Hadrianus Florentius, that is, Hadrian, Son of Florent; 'Twas the Custom of the Country, and still remains amongst the Vulgar (BA) That he us'd to read by Night, by the Light of the Lamps.] This I have from Gabriel Naudæus: Non secus omnino, says he, (i) ac olim fecere maximi illi viri, Euclides dum nostu Megaris Athenas proficisceretur ad audiendum Socratem --- Adrianaque præterea ejus nomini Pontifex sextus, & Augustinus Steuchus Eugubinus, quos inter luctandum cum suis & angustiis vitæ miseriis, sæpe videre fuit ad clylychnios nocu in templis aut comitiis colluentes legendi desiderio accessisse.

(C) And if he was not a Poet.] One of the things that made him decried by the Italians, as his slighting of Poetry, and fineness of Style, two things by which a great many under Leo X. had made their Fortunes, and upon which they valued themselves most in that Country for Fifty or Sixty Years. Hadrian had his Reasons for it, for the Poets had produc'd the same ill Effects, that they afterwards (k) produc'd in France, (l) Quod unum ei viri elegantes defuisse prædicant, eloquentiæ cultioris flores, & poetarum amanitates contemnere erat solitus, sive quod putaret eas sibi aliquid de gravissimorum studiorum autoritate detrahere, sive quod castis & viris ingeniis poetarum lusus pravos mores importare & religionibus officere arbitraretur. He was so little dispos'd to favour them, that one of the Reasons of Paul Jovius's experiencing his Kindness, was because he had not join'd Poetry to the Study of the Liberal Arts. (m) Jovium omnino eo ——— sacerdotio esse perornandum, quem audivisset optimis disciplinis liberaliter eruditum, & scriptorem annalium valde elegantem, nec tamen esse poetam, ut cæteri qui cultiores literas sectarentur. The Paganism that the Poets scatter'd in their Works, contributed not a little to this Pope's Coldness for them, for he understood not Raillery in this Point. He was (n) no complaisant Man upon these Matters. He turn'd away his Head when he was shewn the Statue of Laocoon, and said these were the Images of Impiety. Ornamenta insignis picturæ & statuarum priscæ artis nequaquam magni fecit, adeo ut Vianesio Bonnensium legato commendante statuam Laocoontis, quam in Belvederii viridariis Julius ingenti pretio coemptam ad loci dignitatem collocarat, versis statim oculis tanquam impiæ gentis simulacra vituperaret. Paul Jovius (o) informs us of this particular. Judge whether the Lovers of the fine Arts, whether the Italians, who admir'd this Masterpiece of Sculpture, could have a Relish for such a Pope. The Poets made him sensible, that it was not said without reason, Genus Irritabile Vatum. Here's an Epigram that Sannazar regales him with.

Barbarus in Latios dux quatit arma domos;
In Vaticano noster latet; hunc tamen alto,
Christe, vides cœlo, (proh dolor) & pateris.

(D) The Cure that was given him in Holland.] Paul Jovius ſays, that Margaret (q), Maximilian the Emperor's Daughter, Governeſs of the Netherlands, gave him this Cure, and that a little after he was preferr'd to the Deanry of Louvain. He is miſtaken in making this Princeſs Governante of the Netherlands at this time: For ſhe was not ſo till after the Death of the Duke of Savoy her Second actual Husband. I uſe this Word, becauſe the firſt Prince (r) ſhe was betroth'd to, return'd her before the Conſummation of the Marriage, and becauſe I give no Credit to thoſe (ſ) who ſay the Duke of Savoy did not know her. At the moſt, ſince he died in 1504, it is clear, that Margaret of Auſtria was not Governeſs of the Netherlands, when Hadrian was promoted to the Deanry of Louvain, which was in the Year (t) 1497. Paul Jovius muſt have confounded this Margaret, with the Widow of Charles the Hardy, laſt Duke of Burgundy, Siſter to Edward the IVth. King of England. She was alſo call'd Margaret, and was at the Charge (v) of Hadrian's Promotion to his Doctor of Divinity's Degree. They who tell us this, ſay indeed, that this Doctor had the Deanry of St. Peter's at Louvain; that of Notredame at Antwerp; a Canonry and Treſurer's Office at Notredame le Grand of Utrecht, and the Provoſtſhip of the Holy Saviour in the ſame Town; but they ſpeak not of any Benefice, with Cure of Souls, or any Parochial Church. This Parith is perhaps another Confuſion of Paul Jovius, Cardinal Palla vicini (w) has corrected nothing in this Narration of that Writer.

(E) No great progreſs in Latin.] Every Body has heard how this Emperor, upon hearing a Speech in Latin, and not underſtanding it, cry'd out with a Sigh, Hadrian told me how it would be. Paul Jovius ſpeaks of it, as of a thing that happen'd in his Preſence; (x) Audivi ego Cæſarem, quum Genuæ Latinam orationem à quodam rectatam nequaquam præclarè intelligeret, ſuſpirantem hæc verba ore protuliſſe; agnoſce, inquit, nunc maximè & cum dolore quidem magiſtri mei divina monita, quum hos flores & elegantias Latini ſermonis percipere nequeam, & meminerim eum ſæpè prædixiſſe, me aliquando puerilis incuriæ pœnas daturum. This Hiſtorian had been ſaying, that Hadrian not being capable of making his Party good againſt Chievres, contented himſelf with premoniſhing his young Scholar, that he would repent his Negligence hereafter. Hadrianum authoritate imparem, & natura leniſſimum, officio facile deceſſiſſe, ita tamen ut diſcipulo ſæpiſſime diceret, futurum aliquando ut cum præſentis negligentiæ pœniteret. Charles V. experienc'd it at Genoa, and honeſtly confeſs'd it. Camerarius (a) would have Hadrian reſponſible for this Emperor's uſing an Interpreter, when he heard a Speech in Latin, as if he had been more Sollicitous to inſtruct his Pupil in the Catholick Religion, than in good Letters; but this Confeſſion of the Emperor, is ſufficient to excuſe the Tutor. Mr. Varillas (b) enters into a long Diſpute againſt the Spaniſh Hiſtorians, pretending it is falſe, either that Chievres was guilty of what he is accus'd of with reſpect to his Pupil's Latin, or that Charles V. was ignorant of this Language, or that he was unluckily ſenſible of this Defect upon the hearing an Oration. As to the laſt Fact, which the Spaniards, as he ſays, ſuppoſe to have happen'd in Germany, he maintains, that it is not related in any Author of other Nations. Would he have ſpoke thus, had he known the Adventure of the Oration at Gen. 2, mentioned by Paul Jovius?

(F) It was Charles the Fifth's Intereſt ] Paul Jovius obſerves, that Hadrian had a ſhare in (c) the numerous Promotions of the Year 1517. (d) In vertue of Maximilian the Emperor's Letters. He adds ſome other Reaſons. As to the Popedom, 'tis a very common Opinion, that Hadrian came off, by the ſtrong Canvaſſing of the Emperor Charles V. (e) Cæſare urgente Leoni demortuo abſens (raro & imitato ſanè exemplo) Pontifex Max. unitaque haginta p. rum purpuratorum ſuffragiis creatus. 'Tis ſaid, That Amiot owed the place of Grand Almoner of France, to a Table Diſcourſe (f) of Charles IX. upon the Subject of Charles V. "This Emperor "was prais'd for many things, but eſpecially for "making his Preceptor Pope——The merit of "this Action was ſo heightned, that it made an "Impreſſion on Charles IX. ſo as to ſay, that if "occaſion offer'd, he would do as much for his." 'Tis therefore a very general Opinion, that Pope Hadrian VI, was the Creature of Charles V. But yet it ſeems, that this Emperor procur'd him the Popedom, but indirectly, and by Accident. Paul Jovius, who has div'd well enough into the Intrigues of this Conclave, tells us, that Julian de Medicis, the Head of a Potent Faction, did not concern himſelf for Hadrian, till he found (g) he could do nothing for himſelf. 'Tis true, Hadrian's Adhetion to the Intereſts of Charles V. made Julian's Faction very favourable to him, when they could not carry it for the latter. They talk of an Inſcription (h) wherein Hadrian own'd himſelf obliged to the Imperial Majeſty for all his Greatneſs. This Inſcription was compoſ'd, ſay they, in theſe Words, Ut trajectum plantavit, Lovanium rigavit, Cæſar vero incrementum dedit; That is, Utrecht planted, Louvain watered, but the Emperor gave the increaſe; Upon which one ſaid, *God had no hand at all in it. sent Ambaſſador into Spain, to King Ferdinand, and ſome ſay he manag'd things (G) with much greater Addreſs than could be expected from a Man who had ſo long imbib'd the Univerſity Air. He ſoftned this Monarch, who was much diſſatisfied with his Son-in-Law's Treatment of him, and with the Zeal the Nobility expreſs'd for the Auſtrian Princes. Hadrian remov'd theſe ill Impreſſions, the Conſequences whereof were to be fear'd, and was honoured a little after with the Biſhoprick (H) of Tortoſa, and continued his Embaſſy notwithſtanding. He diſcharg'd the Functions of it till Ferdinand's * Death. After which he divided the Regency with (I) Cardinal Ximenes†. 'Tis true, his ſhare was the leaſt, to ſay no worſe: but there came a Time when his Authority was much greater. Ximenes took too much upon him, for which Reaſon the Arch-Duke Charles ſent him Home, when he went in Perſon to take Poſſeſſion of the Kingdom of Spain; and ſometime after he gave the Government to Hadrian in a very honourable manner, I mean, when he departed for Germany, where the Imperial Crown call'd him. Hadrian found himſelf much perplex'd with the Government of ſo many Kingdoms, becauſe there aroſe a dangerous Sedition, which he could not have been able to ſurmount, had he not had two Collegues aſſigned him, viz. the Conſtable and Amirante of Caſtile. The Invaſion of Navarre by the French, was another great Perplexity in his Government. He came off with Honour, and enjoy'd the Satisfaction of recovering Navarre, when he receiv'd the News of his Election to the Popedom †. I have omitted to ſay, that Leo X. gave him a Cardinal's Cap in the Year 1517. (G) With much greater Addreſs.] Mr. Varillas is of another Opinion. With him Hadrian (l) was fit for nothing but to dictate in a College; he underſtood not Politicks, nor Cabinet Councils, for which this is given amongſt other Proofs, that in his Embaſſy to Aragon, he did not anſwer Chievres Expectation. But who told Varillas that this was a ſign of his Inability? Hadrian (m) hated Chievres on many Accounts; and inſtead of Negotiating according to his Views, he did him ill Offices underhand. This no doubt was ill anſwering this Lord's Hopes, but was no ſign of Inability.

(H) The Biſhoprick of Tortoſa.] Many Authors (n) whom I have conſulted, agree, that Ferdinand gave Hadrian this Biſhoprick. But Mr. Varillas ſays, that it was given him after this Prince's Death (o) as an amends for the Power he was deprived of. We muſt know, that Cardinal Ximenes nominated Regent of the (p) Kingdom by Ferdinand's Will, would ſeize on this Employ in ſpight of the Brevet that Hadrian had brought from Flanders, to be Regent of Caſtile and Aragon, in caſe of Ferdinand's Death. The Cardinal was more reſolute than Hadrian in his Pretenſions; for the latter was brought to be content with part of the Regency, and Mr. Varillas ſuppoſes he was made Biſhop, to (q) make him amends. I have been looking in (r) a Book later than Mr. Varillas's, where I find, that the Author ſuppoſes our Hadrian was not Biſhop at the time of the Diſpute about the Regency. Relating the Circumſtances of this Diſpute, he calls him only Dean of Louvain, and he ſays (s) that Ximenes pretended that this Dean conſenting only to have it as a Second, the Dignity and Rank be bore in Caſtile, not permitting a ſimple Prieſt, as the Dean was, to pretend to a Precedency over a Cardinal Arch-Biſhop, he would allow him only what he thought fit. The Biſhop of Niſmes ſays expreſly (t) that the Dean came not to the Biſhoprick of Tortoſa, but by Ximenes's Recommendation after Ferdinand's Death; and as he cites Alvara Gomez (u) and Peter Martyr, (w) 'tis probable that Paul Jovius and the Writers of the Netherlands, are miſtaken. The manner of Ferdinand's receiving the Dean, does not intimate that he had made him Biſhop: He had penetrated (x) the true Subject of his Embaſſy, he had treated him as a Spy, and when Hadrian ſolliciting for a Second Audience, he angrily anſwered what would he have; does he deſire to know whether I am dying? Tell him I am not to be ſeen to Day. However he ſaw him a few Days after, by the Advice of his Miniſters, and told him, that he was not well enough to treat with him about Buſineſs, and order'd him to retire to Guadalupa, to the Convent of St. Jerome——He gave him Officers in Appearance to ſerve him, but in effect to guard him, and to hinder ſuſpected People from having any Commerce with him.

(l) He divided the Regency.] There is great Probability in one of the Circumſtances related by Mr. Varillas. He ſays, (f) that one of the Arguments urg'd to the Dean (g) of Utrecht, during his Diſpute with Ximenes about the Regency, was the repreſenting to him, "That if he attempted to execute the "Commiſſions he had brought from Flanders, he "would kindle a Civil-War in Spain, and be anſwerable to God for all the Murders and other "Crimes that ſhould be committed, as he himſelf "had previouſly confeſs'd in his excellent Commentary upon the Maſter of the Sentences, where he "had taught, that a Man raiſing Diſturbances in a "State, when he might forbear it, without "hazarding his Conſcience and his Honour, was "reſponſible for all the ſubſequent Calamities. We "have ſeen above, that the Dean was an Honeſt "Man, and that he was not well ſkill'd in the matter he pretended to. He was ſo charm'd with "the Deference that was paid him, in referring to himſelf an Affair wherein he was a Party, "and with the Honour done him in citing the Writings he had formerly dictated in the Univerſity "of Louvain, and afterwards printed, that he promiſed to ſubmit to what the Council of Spain "ſhould determine, provided an Expedient was "found to defend his Reputation, and hinder the "Arch-Duke's Commiſſions from being turn'd into ridicule. Here's exactly the Fable of the Raven and the Fox, only with this Difference, that the Raven loſt his Prey for future Praiſes, whereas poor Hadrian loſt his, for Praiſes given his ſinging in times paſt.

no ſooner reſolved upon the Election of Cardinal de Torroſa, but he made his Party promiſe to give him their Voices all at once. This was done. The opening of the Billets, ſhewing that a Candidate was propoſed, upon whom it ſeem'd no Body had yet thought, caus'd a great Surprize. Cardinal Cajetan gave a freſh Lift, by adviſing thoſe that were neareſt him to take this Side, ſince (b) it was as he ſaid, that of God and Men. Immediately many of them eſpous'd his Intereſt with a good Grace, by I know not what Motive of Religion; others who knew not ſo much as the Cardinal of Torroſa's Name, heſitated, but nevertheleſs followed the prevailing Opinion: the Torrent of Inſpiration hurried them along, and made them forget all their Intereſts. None but Cardinal Uſin reſiſted this Inſpiration of the Conclave. Julian de Medicis was overjoy'd, but the others fell into a ſad Dejection; and the People were ſo inrag'd at their Choice, (i) that they loaded them with a Thouſand Abuſes, upon the coming out of the Conclave. One of them thank'd the People, for ſuffering them to come off ſo cheap, whereas if they had their deſerts, they would have been ſton'd (k). Adaperto conclavi quum globus Cardinalium Hadriani pontem eſſet prætervectus, & opifices pueriquè minacibus oculis vocesque & manibus obſtreperent, nec à fœdiſſimis probris abſtinerent, Sigiſmundus Gonzaga Cardinalis venidenti vultu his egit gratias, quod adverſus extrema ſupplicia meritos contumeliis eſſent contenti, nec lapidibus publicam injuriam vindicarent. The Peoples Indignation was founded upon their having no regard to the ſtain of Original Sin, and the fear that the new Pope would keep his See elſewhere than in Rome.

(L) Arrived at Rome.] Francis Swert (l) ſays, that Didacus Stunica has made a Relation of this Voyage. I doubt it much; for Nicholas Antonio does not ſpeak of it, tho' he ſpeaks of another Relation of a Voyage written by this Author, of leſs Conſequence than this would be. The Relation mention'd by Nicholas Antonio, is that of a Voyage which Stunica made to Rome in 1520, which Schottus has inſerted in the end of his Spaniſh Bibliotheque. Inſtead of Didacus Stunica, it ſhould be ſaid, Blaiſe Ortiz, for 'tis he that compos'd a Relation of the Voyage of Hadrian VI. It was printed at Toledo, in the Year 1546. The Author went from Spain to Rome with this Pope (m).

(M) Very little Satisfaction in his Triple Crown.] This is ſignified in the Inſcription he would have engraven on his Tomb; Adrianus VI. hic ſitus eſt, qui nihil ſibi infelicius in vita duxit quam quod imperaret. Father Labbe (n) ſays, this Epitaph was put on his Tomb in the Church of St. Mary dell' anima, but he is miſtaken: The Cardinals, who erected him a Mauſoleum in this Church, put a much longer and more pompous Inſcription on it. It is to be ſeen in abundance of Authors. The other was only engraven on the Tomb where he was proviſionally depoſited in St. Peter's Church. See Paul Jovius at the end of this Pope's Life. We need not wonder that Hadrian VI. thought the Papal Crown ſo heavy, for the general Affairs of Chriſtendom were in great Confuſion in his Pontificate, and he was not ſufficiently acquainted with the Genius of the Italians, to avoid offending them in a Thouſand Inſtances. The News he daily receiv'd of the Progreſſes and Menaces of the Otomans (a), and his little Experience in the Affairs of Italy, ſo diſturbed his Head, that he could not forbear ſaying, he had more Satisfaction in governing a College of Louvain, than in Governing all the Chriſtian Church. If he could not have known of his own Head, that his Irreſolutions and Delays caus'd Miſchief and Murmurs, he might have known it by the Reproaches offer'd by Ferdinand's Ambaſſador, to his Face, who began his Speech thus: Fabius Maximus, Sanctiſſime pater, rem Romanam cunctando reſtituit, tu vero pariter cunctando rem Romanam ſimulque Europam perdere contendis. Thus (b) Exordium ſo confounded the Pope, that, as the Cardinals hated him, they were ready to break out into Laughter.

(N) For an Hater of Mankind.] Pierius Valerianus (c) makes him a Man who avoided human Society, and who in the Cavalcades kept at as great a diſtance as poſſible from the Courtiers; he put Spurs to his Horſe when he ſaw others approach him. To ſee this Author's Satyr in all its Extent, we muſt chooſe certain Editions, for there are ſome that have been expung'd on this particular. That of Baſil of 1575, is not of this Number, as Father Theophilus (d) Raynaud has obſerved, who has taken this Pope's Part, againſt the Humaniſts of that time.

I don't mention the Capitolo of Berna againſt this Pope; I only ſay, that this Paſſage is not to be taken literally.

Baſta ch'egli hanno fatto un Papa ſanto,
Che dice ogni mattima la ſua Meſſa,
E non s'è tocca mai ſe non col guanto.

'Tis a Burleſque, familiar, and even a Proverbial Hyperbole amongſt the Italians, Gli hippocriti, ſays Aretin Giorn. 1. della 2. parte, che non ſel toccano mai ſe non col guanto. I owe this Obſervation to Mr. de la Monnoye.

(O) Heinous Calumnies againſt him.] They were not contented to ſcandalize him for prodigious Avarice, but gave out, that they had diſcover'd the Reaſon of his ſtaying ſeven Years in a Corner of the Vatican, where he ſuffer'd no Body to ſee him, that it was not like Numa, to converſe with his Nymph Egeria. They added, that the Diſeaſe he died of, proceeded from too much Luxury and Effeminacy, and that he was not contented to abuſe himſelf with Women, but muſt have Handſome Boys beſides (e). This was not all. They put forth that he was a Magician, and that his Friends deſiring to elude the Proofs that were taken from I know not how many Magical Inſtruments, that were found in his Chamber after his Death, ſaid that he found the Philoſopher's Stone. As it could not be denied, that he had the exteriour of Vertue, and was a lover of Reformation and Juſtice, they confin'd themſelves to ſay, that this was only Hypocriſie; and that this Fault is more common in Germany, than is imagin'd. See concerning all this, a Letter of Chriſtopher Battus, to Jerome Saulius, in the Second Volume of Wolfius. We read in the Supplement of (b) the Abbot of Urſperg's Chronicle, that they found amongſt this Pope's ſecret Papers, ſome Magical Books, and that ſome pretend he came to the Popedom by this wicked Art.

Note, That Gerard Moringus obſerves, that this good Pope underſtanding that the Italians form'd evil Suſpicions upon his bringing ſome Youths from Spain, ſent them immediately back into their Country. (P) to be Pope. His very Sobriety has not escap'd (Q) Railleries. The Joy that was expres'd for his Death, was in Reality (R) a great Commendation of him. I can't tell whether they were Catholicks or Protestants, that gave out first that he permitted Sacrifices to be made to the Heathen Gods (S) in order to stop the Pestilence. Guicciardin has not spar'd him more than others; for he pretends † that they who elected this Barbarian to the Popedom, were led rather by a blind Fury, than by Choice * and Deliberation; and that being unable to assign any Reason for their extravagant Conduct, they excussed themselves on the Holy Ghost, who was us'd, as they said, to inspire the Cardinals, during the Election of the Popes ‡. Hadrian's Body was deposited in the Vatican Church, betwixt those of Pius II. and Pius III. and remov'd afterwards to St. Mary del l'Anima. William Enckevort, the only Cardinal he had made, took all the care of it, and erected a Stately Monument to him ‡. Quid os impurum eo impulerit, nihil esse aliud reor, quam id quod Comicus habet, Mala mens, malus animus.*

(P) He was not fit to be Pope.] Few will read this place, without perceiving, that Cardinal Palavicini is pointed at, and thinking of the new Gospel, in which many Maxims of his History of the Council of Trent have been so severely censur'd. Hadrian VI. was in the Cardinal's Opinion, an excellent Ecclesiastick, but an indifferent Pope. (l) In Ecclesiastico ottimo, Pontefice in verità mediocre. He descends even lower into the Temper of the People, who judge of things only by the Event; for in Consequence of the bad Success of his Reign, he was reckon'd so much as an indifferent Pope (m). This honest Flemming, not finding in Italy the Candour and Sincerity he had been trained up in, entred into a general Mistrust: he believ'd that Snares were laid for him in every thing; he durst only trust those of his own Country, who with their Oppenness without Experience, did him more Injury than the Italians would have done with their Dissimulation. The Jansenist, who wrote the new Gospel, has made a malicious use of all Cardinal Palavicini's Concession concerning the good Qualities of this Pontiff; but at the bottom, the Cardinal was not so much in the Wrong, as might be pretended. 'Tis true, if the Christian Church were what it ought to be, the same Vertues which would furnish out a good Church-man, would suffice for a Pope (n); but in the State the Roman Church has long continued, under an Head whose Spiritual Power is so incorporated with the Temporal, that the Preservation of the one depends upon that of the other, 'tis a madness to pretend, that a Pope who understands not the Arts of Courts and the Slights of Politicks, can discharge his Duties. See the Remark P of the Article Bellarmin, at the end. To accomplish the Protestants Prophecies, there need be but Four or Five Popes successively, such as some have been, who were otherwise rigid Moralists. However, 'tis worth while to see (o) Mr. de Launoi's Letter, wherein he makes out Hadrian's Apology against Cardinal Palavicini.

(Q) His very Sobriety has not escap'd Railleries.] He was so little us'd to the Kickshaws of Rome, that there was no Fish he preferr'd before the Melwel; so that the Price of this Fish rise considerably in his Pontificate, not without the Laughter of all the Fish-Market. Instead of praising him for this, Paul Jovius has had the Boldness to say, that he had no better taste with respect to good Dishes, than Judgment for the Administration of Affairs. I so impoverish this Author's Latin, that 'tis necessary to translate it Word for Word (p) Modo Mevinceic plebeio admodum pisci Hadrianus Pontifex, sicuti in administranda republica hebetis ingenii vel depravati judicii, ita in esculentis insulsissimi gustus supra mediocre pretium ridente toto foro piscario jam fecerat. The Court of Rome went from one Extream to another; for never was there a Pope, whose Table was so delicate, as that of Leo X. Men got into his Favour by the Invention of Ragoos; and there were (q) four great Masters of Cookery, who became his Minions. They invented a sort of Sausage, which astonish'd Hadrian VI. when he examin'd the Expences of his Predecessor. For his part, he kept no such useless Officers as those, and was so much the reverse of Leo X. that his Charge was not above Twelve Crowns a Day. The Romans satyriz'd this great Frugality, and said, that the Vatican was grown like those Houses that the fear of Hobgoblins had made unfrequented. Familiam adeò sordidam & exiguam alebat, ut sumptus quotidianus duodecim aureos non excederet. Quid plura? Vaticana domus non jam domus illa Pontificia, & ocellus urbis ut quondam, sed domus aliqua, ut poetæ tradunt, quæ propter lemurum formidinem vacua & deserta sit, præ solitudine videbatur. Thus speaks Christopher Battus, whom I have cited above. Paul Jovius's Words give us to understand, that there were some People at Rome, who in Complaisance to this Pope, made account of his Fish. We shall see in the Article of the Chancellor du Prat, that this was not the first time that Great Men have brought into Fashion some Dishes that were despis'd before. I believe likewise, that Hadrian's Preference of Beer before Wine, was no less laugh'd at, than that of the Melwel before all other Fish. His common Drink was Beer, to which was attributed his last Sickness. He had a great care of his Health, and he dined at so constant an Hour, that he abruptly quitted the most important Affairs, when he had notice that Dinner was ready; but he eat little. (a) Ferunt Hadrianum alioqui vegeta viridisque senectæ contraxisse morbum assiduo cervisiæ potu —— Nam per se cibi parcissimus erat, & in tucnda valetudine appriime diligens & morosus, tanta horarum definitione, ut denunciante Architriclino paratas esse epulas, vel maximarum rerum colloquia protinus abrumperet.

(R) Was in Reality a great Commendation.] Because nothing rendred him more odious than his Desire to put a stop to the Crying Sins, and to imploy the severest Punishments against them. The Report was, that he was going to publish some terrible Bulls against Judaizers, Despisers of Holy Things, Simonists, Usurers and Sodomites. This last Article threw (b) such an Allarm into the Court and City, that there were young Men, who after his Death, fixt Festoons upon his Physician's Gate, with this Inscription in Capital Letters, TO THE DELIVERER OF THE COUNTRY. Could the Joy at such a Sovereign's Death, be any thing else than a Proof of his Vertue? Paul Jovius relates, that this Joy was excessively great. Morte ejus plerique & præsertim veteris aulæ sectatores effusissime sunt lætati, & secundum eos nonnulli Romanorum qui detrimenta rerum suarum senserant.

(S) To the Heathen Gods in Order.] I have not yet had time to proceed far in the search of the Original of this Lye. I have only trac'd it to a Book (c) printed at Amsterdam, in 1661, wherein are these Words. Is (Adrianus VI.) ad avertendam pestem quæ gravissime in urbe sæviebat, Mago Demetrio Græco concessit sylvestrem taurum Diis Gentilium ad placandam eorum iram mactare, cessavitque lues. The Author cites Paul Jovius in the Second Book of his History; but we must believe in Charity, and for his Honour that he had not read this Historian. Let us see what Paul Jovius says; the place deserves relating. He only says, that the Pope did not severely forbid the Communication of Pestilent mentione, maculosos quosdam cum aulæ tum civitatis desperata publica securitate terruerat, adeo ut non defuerint petulantissimi juvenes, qui Joanni Antracino Pontificis Medico postes festa fronde per intempestam noctem protinus exornarent, cum titulo uncialibus literis inscripto in hæc verba, Liberatori Patriæ S. Houses,

(I) was an Author. 'Tis somewhat strange, that a Man who owed his Advancement to his Learning, so little countenanc'd (K) good Wits. The Collection of the Letters of Princes, † contain some Particulars of this Pope's Humour, his Life has been amply written by Gerard Moringus, a Divine of Louvain.

† In two Letters of Jerome Niger, to Mark Anthony Muret, fol. m. 81. &c.

He did not dissemble the great Abuses he observed in the Church; he publickly acknowledged them, and that in a very emphatical Manner, in the Instruction (X) he gave the Nuncio who was to speak for him at the Diet of Nuremberg. He therein deplor'd the sad Life of the Clergy, and the Corruption of Morals that appear'd in the Persons of some Popes. He had long wish'd to introduce amongst Churchmen, a Reformation of Manners. He had labour'd to effect this, whilst he was Dean (Y) of Louvain, but the Insignificancy of his Pains had obliged him to desist from his Enterprize. One of the justest Reproaches he can be tax'd with, was the contradicting the fine

Houses, and that that Method, which was very different from the Customs of Italy, occasion'd the Death of abundance of People. He is not said to give leave to the Magitian to make the Sacrifice; 'tis only said in general, that no Body durst oppose the Populace, who countenanc'd this Demetrius: besides, it is not said that this Man pretended to Sacrifice the Bull to the Heathen Gods; and as to the Success, 'tis only said, the Plague diminish'd. What then do they think of, who cite Paul Jovius, when they vent so many Circumstances which he has not mentioned?

(l) Jovius Hist. lib. 21. fol. m. 11.

(d) Exortæ in Urbe pestilentes lues, quæ quum se veris legibus more nostro Pontifici minimè coercendæ videretur, contactu ægrorum ita exarsit ut multa funera in compitis viderentur, apparerentque vestibula Urbem, haud multo dierum spatio, nisi Græculus quidam nomine Demetrius Smyrtanus, sedandæ pestilentiæ, favente ei turba hominum, negotium suscepisset, nemine superstitionem vetare ausso. Nam ferum taurum, cui vinum cornu dissecarat, magico carmine dextram in aurem prolato repente ita manusfactum reddiderat, ut injecto tenui filo ad integrum cornu, quo vellet perducens, pestilentiæ placando mimi ad Amphitheatrum immolaret. Nec credula multitudinis spem ex toto fefellit, quum ab ea inanis sacrificii prospera litatione, mitescere morbus cæpisset.

(I) That this Pope was an Author.] His Quæstiones and Expositiones upon the Fourth Book of the Master of the Sentences, were printed at Paris in Folio, in the Year 1512, (e) and in 1516, and his quæstiones quodlibeticæ duodecim at Louvain, in Octavo, in 1515, and at Paris in Folio, the Year following. During his stay in Spain, he composed Computum hominis agonizantis, & Sermonem de sæculo pertuso. After his Pontificate, he publish'd Regulas Cancellariæ Apostolicæ, and writ many Letters to the Princes of Germany, &c. which were printed with the Councils, and elsewhere.

(e) There are more Editions of it.

I have something to observe concerning his Work upon the Master of the Sentences. The Sieur Konig deceiv'd by their Ambiguity, (f) who have said (g) in IV. sententiarum quæstiones & expositiones, affirms, that our Hadrian publish'd Questions upon the Four Books of the Sentences. Here is a new Proof of what is said in the First Remark of this Article, that an Author can't be ever so little unexact but he throws another into Falshood. Would it not have been better to have said in quartum sententiarum; or in IV. librum sententiarum, than to use the Number IV. which signifies as well Quatuor, as Quartus. Father Oldoin (h) has committed the same Error as the Sieur Konig. Mr. Lamillas deserves to be heard concerning this Book of Hadrian: His Commentary, says he, upon the Master of the Sentences, was admir'd (i) and certainly if it is Book was not the subtillest of the same Nature, which were found in the Libraries; it was at least the clearest and most Methodical. The Author had maintain'd (k) in the most decisive manner imaginable, that it was certain the Pope might err even in Matters belonging to Faith, and 'tis pretended he did not change his Opinion when he was Pope, as did Pius II. for he altered nothing in this part of his Book, in the Edition that was printed at Rome, during his Pontificate.

(K) So little countenanc'd good Wits.] We have seen in the Remark (C) his Notions of the Poets. This might earlier be pardon'd him than the sinking the Funds that had been imploy'd for the Maintenance of Learned Men, who came from Greece into Italy, to whom the West is indebted for the Resurrection of Learning. Cardinal Bessarion (l) maintain'd at Rome, part of these great Genius's, and establish'd an Academy for them in the Vatican. But the greatest Number subsisted upon the Bounties of Pope Nicolas V.—— (m) Of all his Successors, there was none but Hadrian VI. who suppress'd these Gratifications, by an Oeconomy injurious to his Memory. Let us see the Observation of another Author (n) "All the Learned of his time promised themselves "Advancement upon his coming to the Pontificate, "because he owed all his Fortune and Exaltation to "Learning. And therefore they could not but be "astonish'd to see him so ill dispos'd against all that "delight'd in good Literature, calling them Terentians, and treating them in that manner, that "'twas thought he would have brought in Barbarism "again, had he not died in the 2d. Year of his Supream Dignity. Paul Jovius says (1) handsomely, "that he thus ill treated the Muses of his Age, with "the same Sense and Judgment, as he prefer'd the "Low-Country Melwel, before all other Dishes, "and the best Fish that was eaten in Italy. Paul Jovius does not say this. See his Text in the Remark (I). The Reader will be glad to know where La Mothe le Vayer has taken what he relates, for that reason I shall give a fine Passage here, of Ficinus Valerianus. (a) Fuit & fuit Hadriano VI. par bonarum omnium litterarum infortunium. Nam cum is Lovanii Decanus fuisset, ad quem utpote litterarum Universarum moderatus litteratorum numerus confluxerat, cum non minora de Hadriano illi quisque polliceretur, excedit humanarum & eloquentiæ, totiusque naturæ hostis acerrimus, qui litteratis omnibus inimicitias minitaretur, quoniam ut ipse dictitabat, Terentianos essent, quos tum odisse, atque etiam, persequi cæpisset. voluntarium alii exilium, alias atque alias alii latebras quærentes, tamdiu latuere, quoad Dei beneficio altero Imperii anno decessit, qui si aliquanto diutius vixisset, Gotica illa tempora adversus bonas litteras exhibitura fuisse.

This was a part of his Instruction. Dices nos ingenuè fatere, quod Deus hanc persecutionem à Lutheranis illatam, ecclesiæ suæ inferri permittit, propter peccata hominum, sacerdotum maximè, & ecclesiæ prælatorum. Clamant Scripturæ peccata populi derivari à peccatis sacerdotum, propterea que ut ait Chrysostomus, Salvator noster eu staturus infirmam civitatem Jerusalem, ingressus est primo templum, ut peccata sacerdotum primo castigaret instar boni medici, qui morbum à radice curat. Scimus in hac sancta sede aliquot jam annis multa abominanda fuisse, abusus in spiritualibus, excessus in mandatis, & omnia denique in perversum mutata, nec mirum, si egritudo à capite in membra, à summis Pontificibus in alios inferiores prælatos descendit. Omnes nos prælati, videlicet ecclesiastici declinavimus, unusquisque in vias suas, nec fuit jamdiu qui faceret bonum, non fuit usque ad unum. A Protestant Writer imagines, that the Cardinals so strongly resented this Pope's dishonouring the Court of Rome in the Diet of the Empire, and burning a Man for the Crime of Beastiality, that they shortned the Pope's Life. preach by Example; knowing that his Endeavours to bring his Collegues into the right Way, would be more effectual, if he himſelf practis'd the Duties of Temperance. He perſiſted to live frugally; there was more Neatneſs than Abundance at his Table; and when he entertain'd, he preſs'd no Body to Drink, and never began Healths to oblige the Company to drink round. Nor did he any more ſuffer his own Health to be drunk; he ſet himſelf above all this pretended German Civility. His Feaſts laſted but an Hour, and he caus'd ſome piece of Scripture to be read part of the time: He would have had it read during all the Meal, but for fear of diſguſting ſome Body or other of his Gueſts. (c) Neque temere ultra horam accumbebat, etiamſi convivas magnos haberet, atque interim fere adhibito lectore, qui aliquid è literis ſacris recitaret, ut non minus mente, quam ventre convivæ delectarentur, ſed id tantum ad tempus, ne lectio longior cuiquam fortaſſis moleſtiæ eſſet. He alſo continued a very Chaſt Life: There was nothing of Wantonneſs in his Geſtures or Diſcourſes: nor would he ſuffer any Obſcenity in his Preſence; though otherwiſe he delighted in a vertuous Facetiouſneſs. Nor did he only abſtain from all actual Impurities, but carefully avoided the Appearances and Suſpicions of it. He particularly made it his Duty to poſſeſs his Collegues with the ſame practical Morality. He vehemently exhorted them to it, in the Diſcourſes he made at the Chapter Meetings, and ſharply cenſur'd ſuch as he knew (d) addicted to Drinking and Gaming, and eſpecially thoſe that kept Concubines, omitting nothing that could oblige them to refrain from that evil Commerce. But he met with ſo many Obſtacles, becauſe ſome of the more aged and potent oppos'd his Deſign, that he renounc'd it. His Zeal had like to have coſt him his Life; he had been poiſon'd, if his Phyſician had not found a good Antidote againſt Arſenick. 'Twas thought this was done by a Canon's Concubine, were he was invited to Dinner. (e) Sed in re longè honeſtiſſima tantum difficultatis habuit, obnitentibus quibuſdam è ſenioribus ac potentioribus, & præſertim non ſuppetente auxilio, ſine quo hujuſmodi non temerè confici queunt, ut negotium magna ex parte infectum relinquere debuerit. Quinimo parum abfuit, quin per eam ipſam cauſam, veneno periret. Id concubina unius è Canonicis, à quo ad prandium vocatus erat, holuſculo ejus, indidiſſe putabatur. When he ſaw there was no hope of Reformation, and that his Endeavours procur'd him many Enemies, he totally deſiſted, and declared, that the Deans of Chapters were much leſs reſponſible for theſe Diſorders, than the Biſhops, for the Deans were obliged to receive thoſe whoſe Corruption was grown inveterate. But nothing oblig'd the Biſhops or their Vicars, to confer Orders and Benefices, as they did, upon infamous Debauchees. (f) Dum ſpem nullam fructus conſpiceret, nihilque aliud ſibi quam odium & malevolentiam quæri intelligeret, in totum conatu ſuperſedit, ſatis habens, ſignificaſſe ſibi diſplicere, poſtquam aliud præterea non poſſet, prædicans tamen culpam eam non tam Decanis Collegiorum, qui jam obſtinatos & in ſordibus illis inveteratos exciperent, quam Epiſcopis, eorumque vicariis præſtandam, qui quoſcunque ſine delectu, quantumvis probroſos & infames, ad ordines & beneficia admitterent, nulla aut exigua, in retroactam vitam inquiſitione facta. All this is taken from a Book written by a Prieſt. Let it not then be objected, that theſe are Proteſtant Reproaches.

'Tis certian, that the Dean hit the Nail on the Head. The Negligence of the Biſhops, or their Vicars, was the Source of the Diſorder. They did not examine whether they that were admitted to Benefices, had lived well, and given good Proofs of a Conſtitution that could abſtain from Bodily Pleaſures. This want of Enquiry was a Gate through which abundance entred into the Church, who were already bent towards Senſuality: A Bent that is difficultly rectified, which gathers Strength continually, till it grows into Habit, an almoſt incurable Diſeaſe. You ſee then why our Hadrian's Exhortations could have no effect upon Canons long practis'd in Drunkenneſs, and the Pleaſures of Whoredom. They were ſo beſotted to this Courſe of Life, that they could not imagine how it was poſſible to live without it. 'Tis infinitely harder to perſwade a Batchellor of 45 or 50 Years to Marriage, than a Widower of 60, who has juſt loſt his Wife: So great is the Power of Cuſtom. The Concubine on her Part, finds it as hard to part with her Canon, after having been ſo many Years at Bed and Board with him. Where ſhall I go, ſays ſhe, what ſhall I do? Where ſhall I find ſo good a Bed, ſo good a Table, ſo good a Fire? And therefore you'll find her and her Companions very ready to oppoſe the Deſigns of a Reformer. The Dean of Louvain needed a more undaunted Courage; for the Poiſon of theſe Whores was as formidable as the Dagger of an Aſſaſſin. Not finding he had any Call to Martyrdom, he choſe rather to leave things as they were, than to expoſe himſelf to Hatred, and even Death, by going to reform them. In magnis voluiſſe ſat eſt, was doubtleſs his Maxim.

(Z) Of having contradicted the fine Leſſons againſt the Plurality of Benefices.] When he was only Profeſſor of Louvain, he maintain'd, that this Plurality was vicious; and that a Man who had once gotten a Living that was ſufficient to maintain him handſomely, ought to be content with it, and ſtop there. But when he was at the Arch-Duke of Auſtria's Court, he accepted many Preferments, and forgot his Doctrine. This Inconſtancy was a Scandal to ſome People. (a) Honores & ſacerdotia quædam magnifica acceſſere, non ſine admiratione, & fortaſſis offenſione aliquorum, qui eum diverſum facere ineuſabant, atque aliquando docuiſſet. Docuiſſe quippe, non eſſe fas cuiquam multa habere beneficia, ſed uno aliquo ad honeſtam mundamque ſuſtentationem vitæ ſufficiente, quietum ac contentum eſſe debere. The Author I borrow theſe Words from, declares he will not examine (b) whether this Conduct was cenſur'd juſtly or unjuſtly; but yet he undertakes to juſtify it, and uſes the moſt plauſible Argument that can be offered upon ſuch a Subject. He ſays, amongſt other things, that it ſhould not be thought ſtrange, that Hadrian thought that lawful in himſelf, which would have been unlawful in others, who had not the ſame extraordinary Qualities, or the ſame Employs at Court that he had. The great Talents that God has given a Prieſt, are much more ſerviceable to the Church, when they are accompanied with a large Revenue; and it can't be denied, but that an Eccleſiaſtick who is imploy'd at Court, is neceſſarily oblig'd to greater Expences. The Author adds to this, many other Arguments of the ſame Nature, and which have all the fault of being fit to be employ'd in an Apology of the Caſuiſts, like that of Father Pirot. I mean, they may ſerve to juſtify thoſe, who being in great Poſts, heap all the vacant Places upon their own Heads. May not it be ſaid in their Vindication, that they are able to make a better uſe of them than others, and that they are neceſſary for them, that their great Qualities may have Liberty to act in their whole Sphere, for the Profit and Advantage of the State. The Author adds, that it is falſe, that Hadrian oppos'd the Plurality of Benefices, either in his Books or Lectures. He has rather countenance'd it, continues he, as appears by his Commentary upon Lombard. (c) Neque vero ipſe Hadrianus uſquam diverſum aut docuit, aut ſcripſit, ut ei falſo intendunt, ſed potius contra. Legas eum qui velit, in quartum Petri Lombardi ſcribentem, ubi de reſtitutione agens, quæſtionem illam ex profeſſo diſſerit. All that this Author draws afterwards from this Commentary, is not much to his Purpoſe. If what he pretends might be inferr'd from it, it would only be by an oblique and very indirect Conſequence; and he ſays nothing of the quodlibetick Oration, that 'tis affirm'd Hadrian printed againſt the Plurality of Benefices. We'll cite a Proteſtant writer, who relates an Anſwer this Pope made to thoſe that ask'd him why he did not remove a Corruption, which he had ſo well condemned. (d) *Imò cum Lovanii olim edidiſſet Quodlibeticam Orationem contra pluralitatem beneficiorum, monentibus cur ipſe qui jam poteſtatem tollendi haberet, quod antè reprehendere tantum potuiſſet, omnia beneficia, maximè ex Inferiore Germania ſupplicantibus interciperet, reſpondit: cum parvuli eſſemus loquebamur, ſapiebamus, faciebamus ut parvuli, nunc autem poſtquam viri facti ſumus, reliquimus ea quæ ſunt parvuli. HADRIAN (Cornelius) in Dutch Hadrianſen, a famous Preacher in the XVIth. Century, was of Dort: He became a Cordelier, and was Guardian of the Convent †, and Lecturer of Divinity. He understood Latin and Greek, and Hebrew well, and publickly ‖ taught these three Languages. He preach'd 30 Years at Bruges, and never was concern'd at the Slanders that were publish'd against him. He died at Bruges, at sixty Years of Age, the 14th. of July, 1581. He compos'd a Treatise concerning the Seven Sacraments. John Lernutius had seen in ϒ Manuscript many very learned Sermons of this Friar. The Works that came out under his Name, after his Death, were mingled with Buffoonry, and immodest Jests. Sanderus pretends, that the Hereticks foisted them in, to defame the Memory of this good and innocent Monk ♂. He ought to have proved it, or not mention'd it. The Protestants speak of this Cordelier, as of a violent ξ Declaimer; and there have been Books that say, he had introduc'd amongst Women, a new sort of Devotion, which was, that he appointed them certain Days, in which they ought to (Y) strip themselves stark naked before him, that he might give

"(c) Pope "Hadrian VI. preceded him. There were some that "wondred to see him act against a certain Oration he "had made at Louvain, being there Magister Noster, "disapproving the Multiplicity of Benefices, and "their crowding them under one Hat: When be-"ing Pope, he did the same thing, especially in the "Netherlands. He answer'd them in the Words of "St. Paul, When I was a Child, I spoke as a Child, &c. 1 Cor. 13. Mention is made of this, in the News (f) from the Republick of Learning, 1684.

(AA) Into Trouble for having cited this Fact.] He found himself publickly accus'd of maintaining, that the Charges of Canonization are contrary to the Purity and Holiness of this Act. His Accuser's Name was Sebastian de St. Paul; he had been Divinity Professor at Louvain, and twice Provincial of the Carmelites in the Netherlands. Observe how this Jesuit defended himself. He (g) said, that he only reported what he had read in Blasse Ortizius, Canon of Toledo, and a Domestick of Hadrian VI. 2. That having cited this in Italick, and named his Author, he had reason to complain of being calumniated by his Critick, who has suppress'd these Circumstances; for an Accusation is not only unjust, when it urges a Falshood, but also when it conceals the Truth. (h) An ignoras certam esse apud Theologos sententiam, quod accusatio esse possit graviter injusta, non tantum ex falsi impositione, sed etiam ex reticentia veri. 3. That from his alledging a thing as glorious to Hadrian VI. it does not thence follow, that he taxes the other Popes with Error, who approve or appoint the great Expences of Canonization. 4. That he prais'd Hadrian as (i) a Pontiff moved with an honest Zeal, and acting according to the Instincts of Conscience, of which we may, and on many Occasions must, follow the innocent Error. 5. That he did not approve of Hadrian's Motive, which was, that these Expences were repugnant to the Purity and Holiness of Canonization. 6. That he doubts not but they are founded upon many weighty Reasons. 7. That Hadrian VI. might err in that point as a private Doctor, without prejudice to the Infallibility of Popes pronouncing ex Cathedra. 8. That Baronius relates some much more notable Errors of some Popes without being obnoxious, to be accus'd of injuring the Holy Apostolick See.

Who does not see the fatal Marks of Engagement? A Roman Catholick is a true Slave in his Judgment. There are a Thousand Instances in which he must commend good Actions. Can any thing be more self-evident than that Hadrian VI. merits Approbation as to what he did, and the reason why he did it? And yet here's a Jesuit, who not being able to praise him without indirectly censuring the other Popes, is forc'd to tread upon Thorns in his Justification; nor can he clear himself but by supposing our Hadrian in an Error, but that his Error, being accompanied with a good Intention, excuses him. This is all the Glory a Pope can promise himself, who sets up to reform Corruptions. He shall be excus'd for the Errors of his Conscience, and be said to have err'd, not as a Pope, but as a Private Doctor. Thank you for that.

(BB) To that excess as to offend the Vulgar of the People.] Every Body was scandaliz'd in Paris, in 1622, to see the Pomp wherewith the Begging Friars celebrated the Canonization of St. Theresa. There came out the same Year a little Book, wherein 'tis feign'd the good Women murmur'd heartily. (k) How did you do, Cousin, says a Young Married Woman, at this Fire? For my part, I never saw such Disorder, nor so much Mischief; one of my Brothers had his whole Face burnt, and there is no likelihood of his Recovery. But to what purpose are all these Superfluities, says a Toothless old Woman? In my younger Days I never heard of Canonizing Saints in this Fashion, 'tis rather Canonading than Canonizing. Softly, softly, Aunt, says a Merchant's Wife of St. Denis's Street, a great deal more has been done at Rome. They are publick Rejoicings; there is no danger sometimes in Superfluities, when we are induc'd to them by a pure and sincere Affection; and besides, what the Carmelites have done, was by the command of the Queen, who has supplied this Expence, because St. Theresa was a Spaniard. No matter for that, says a Citizen's Wife, living near Saint Leu, it had been a Thousand Times more offended than honoured by it; and I promise you, I don't at all approve of these things. How many Maids do you think have been run away with? All the Corn round about is beaten down and burnt: They have taken the Month of August for it, rather than July. For my part, says an Advocate's Wife of the great Council, I was of Opinion that all these Superfluities should go to the adorning their Church, they should have kept it themselves, and they would have been more esteem'd, than by evaporating so much Wealth into Smoak. This would have kindled the Fire of Devotion in their Hearts, who came to visit them; whereas on the contrary, all the Air and Fields round about have been set on Fire with their Fuses: I had a Ruff of Five Stories utterly spoil'd: if the Fire had been lighted at Eight of the Clock, so many Cloaks had not been lost; all the Scholars were there in Arms. After all, it must be said here, as on many other Occasions, there is nothing but is good for something or other; the greatest Abuses have a fair Side. If Canonizations could be made without vast Expences, they would be more common: 'Tis well that the Impossibility of supplying the Expence is a Barrier to the Greediness of the Monastick Orders. Subjects of Canonization would never be wanting; every Commonalty would have as many of them as the others; and if the Charge was but little, the other Engines would easily be prepared.

(Y) Strip themselves stark naked before him.] If Gyges's Maxim were true (a), that a Woman divests her self of her Modesty with her Cloaths, our Hadrian's Affairs had been in a good safe, supposing he was not such a Visionary as to imagine in earnest, that his giving some Lashes to the naked Bodies of the Penitents, would have a singular Vertue to expiate their Sins. The World is so ready to construe things perversly, that there are few that will attribute the Conduct of this Friar to any other Principle than what some Body calls an Inquisitiveness into the Pleasures of others (b). If it were true, as some Learned Men affirm, that in the Primitive Church, those who were Baptised, of what Age or Sex soever, were as naked as they came out of their

There's nothing but theſe People are (Z) able to perſwade Women to, under the ſpecious Pretence of Devotion, when they have the Talent of Prating, and are Celebrated for their Preaching. HAY, a Family of Scotland. It owes its firſt Nobility to a very famous Action. 'Tis ſaid, that the Danes invading Scotland in the Reign of Kenneth III. about the Year 980, there happen'd a Battle betwixt them and the Scots, in which the latter being put to Flight, retir'd towards Perth. They were oblig'd to paſs through a very narrow Way, betwixt the Mountains and the River Tay. A Countryman, who happened to be there with his Two Sons, all Men of undaunted Courage, made himſelf Maſter of the Defile, exhorted the Fliers to make head againſt the Enemy, and ſtopt the Paſſage againſt thoſe that endeavoured to continue their Flight. He did more, he armed himſelf with what came next to his Hands, and followed by his Two Sons, who were armed with a piece of their Plough, he fell with ſuch Fury upon the Danes, and ſo encouraged the Fliers by his Example, that Victory declar'd for the Scots. The Enemy was put to flight in his Turn, and Scotland was preſerv'd from the Slavery the Danes had deſign'd to reduce it to. This Peaſant, known afterwards by the Name of Hay, was the Founder of the Family I ſpeak of. He and his two Sons ſignaliz'd themſelves extraordinarily in the Fight; they caus'd a great Conſternation, and made a great Slaughter wherever they fought. This Noble Action, which ſav'd their Country, met with (A) a ſuitable Recompence, and ſince that time this Family has been one of the moſt eminent of the Kingdom. their Mother's Belly, one might better apprehend how that Man, by his fine Tongue, and ſeeming Piety, might bring his Devotees to his Beck. Henry Stephens tells a Story that has ſome Relation to that. They went ſo far, ſays he, (b), as to require (as I have read it) that they ſhould be allowed in Confeſſion to handle the Parts that have been the Inſtruments of the ſin that is confeſt, and one of them who made that Requeſt, being told by a Biſhop that it would be a ſhameful thing, if Men and Women were obliged to ſhew them their Privy-Parts; he anſwered, that if a Confeſſor may honeſtly conſider with the Eyes of the Mind, not only the Members that have committed filthy Actions, but alſo the very Filthineſs committed by them, when 'tis diſcovered to him in Confeſſion; much leſs ought it to be thought an immodeſt thing to look upon thoſe very Members with the Eyes of the Body. He further alledged, that a Confeſſor, being a Spiritual Phyſician, ought to feel his Patient, as the Phyſician of the Body feels and handles a ſick Perſon. And mixing ſome Blaſphemies and Prophanations with his jeſting Diſcourſe, he brought in theſe Words of the Goſpel, Go, and ſhew thy ſelf to the Prieſt, as if it had been the Cuſtom to ſtrip, and ſhew one ſelf naked to the Prieſt.

HAILLAN (Bernard de Girard, Lord of) Historiographer of France, descended from an Ancient and (A) noble Family, was born at Bourdeaux about the Year 1535. He set up for an Author betimes, and after having appear'd in the Republick of Learning, in the quality of a (B) Poet and Translator, he applied himself to the Writing of History, and succeeded so well, that by the first Works of this Nature, he obtain'd of Charles those of the Family of Hay were carried away, as well as others. During this Civil War, Robert Hay stuck to the Interests of Robert Bruce with an entire Fidelity, and did him so considerable Services, that he was rewarded for them with the Place of Hereditary High-Constable of Scotland, in the Year 1310, and that he might support that Honour with a suitable Figure, the same Prince gave him great Possessions in Land, in the County of Aberdeen. This Office still remains in the Family, and is enjoy'd at present by the Earl of Errol, who is reckon'd the 19th. of his Family, who has enjoy'd it. Nicolas Lord Hay was kill'd in 1332, with 280 Gentlemen of his Family, at the Battle of Duplin, taking the part of King Bruce against Edward Balliol. David, Lord Hay, his Successor, accompanied King David Bruce in the War against the English, and was kill'd in the Year 1344, at the Battle of Durham. Thomas Lord Hay, married King Robert II's Daughter, who brought him for her Dowry, the Barony of Inchanthill, in the County of Perth, about the Year 1370. William Lord Hay was deputed in the Year 1423, with some other Gentlemen, to deliberate about the Means of restoring King James I. to Liberty, who was kept in England. He succeeded in that Affair, and a little time after was created Earl of Errol. William Hay, Earl of Errol, High-Constable of Scotland, and Sheriff of the County of Aberdeen, accompanied James IV. to the Battle of Floudon, in the Year 1513, and was kill'd there with his Prince, together with 87 Gentlemen of his Name. Francis Hay, Earl of Errol, by his constant Adherence to Queen Mary, and the Religion of the Church of Rome, was expos'd to great Misfortunes, his Houses were demolish'd, his Estate pillaged, and himself imprison'd: But under King James VI. Son to Queen Mary, he was in Favour. He was one of the Scotch Lords, who was sent into England in 1604, to settle the Union of the two Crowns. His Son assisted at the Coronation of Charles I. in Scotland, in the Year 1633. Gilbert Hay, Earl of Errol, had a great Share in the Friendship of Charles the I. and made himself remarkable in the Parliament of Edinburgh, at the time of Charles the II's. Restoration. John Hay, Earl of Errol, at present

He Writ it in French, according to Father Alegambe; but it is an Error: For John Hay affirms in his Preface that he Writ it in Latin, and that it was Translated into French by some of their Scholars. This Apology was made against the Libel of James Pineton de Chambrun, Preacher at Nismes, and printed at Lions in 1586. The Epistle Dedicatory, dated the 2d. of July, 1585, declares that the Author had read publickly Divinity for Five Years at Tournon. Antimonium ad responsa Bezæ. Disputatio contra Ministrum Anonymum Nemausensem. His Helleborum Joanni Serrano, found among his Papers (b) is preserv'd in the Archives of the Society at Rome. This is all we learn from the two Bibliotheques of the Jesuits. The Authors of them did not know that John Hay had actually publish'd a Book against de Serres, (viz.) an Answer to that Minister's 2d. Anti-Jesuit. (E) With a Jesuit of his Name, who was banish'd.] His Name was Alexander Hay. "He was convict-"ed of some treasonable Words against the King, "after the Reduction of Paris, so far as to say, that "if he pass'd by their College, he would gladly "throw himself headlong out of the Window to "break his Neck that Way. This we read in Mezerai's great History (d). The Author of the Anticoton will inform us of the Date of the Decree of Parliament. (e) There were Informations given against Alexander Hayns, a Scotch Jesuit, who had taught publickly, that it was necessary to dissemble and obey the King for a time in Hypocrisy, frequently saying these Words, Jesuita est omnis homo: This Jesuit was moreover charg'd with saying often, that he wish'd, if the King pass'd by their College, he could fall upon him and break his Neck. For which Reason, by a Decree of Parliament, of the 10th. of January, 1595. the said Hayns was condemn'd to perpetual Banishment, and enjoin'd to continue it, upon pain of being hang'd and strangled, without any form of Process. The Author of the Thanks of the Butterwomen, having said the same thing, adds (f) that this Jesuit having afterwards repeated and confirm'd these Words in the City of Prague, upon which the Grandees of the Kingdom solliciting to have him brought back into France, it was answered, that he had eaten some peel'd Barly, not well boil'd, and he died as suddenly as the Provost of Mareschals of Pluviers, ——who was strangled at the Chatelet, with a String of his Drawers, which was not strong enough to bridle a Fly. Alexander Hayns, if we believe (g) Pasquier, in the time of the Troubles, was Teacher of the first Class of the Jesuits College at Paris.

(A) Descended from an Ancient and Noble Family.] When he speaks of the Materials he collected to compose the History of France, he does not forget the Assistances of his Relations. Francis de Girard, my Brother, Lord of Haillan, says he, (h) sent me from Bourdeaux, many Papers, concerning the Affairs of Guienne, collected by the late Lewis de Girard, our Father; and by Giles, Mark, and Richard de Girard our Ancestors; the two last whereof lived in Bourdelois, in honourable Posts, at the time that the City of Bourdeaux, and the Country of Guyenne were reduc'd to the Obedience of the French in 1451. He tells us in another place (i), that his Father was a Curious Man in the Antiquities of his Country, who for above Forty Five Years was Lieutenant in the Admiralty of Guienne, and afterwards, adds he, Francis de Girard, Lord of Haillan, my Brother, was for above Ten Years in the same Admiralty, under the late Kings of Navarre, Henry and Antony.

I may take for a Translation, the Tract concerning the Duties of Men, which he printed at Blois in 1560, in Octavo; for he took it from Tully's Offices. (C) He obtain'd of Charles IX. the Title of Hiſtoriographer of France, in 1571.] Thus he tells us himſelf, in an Epiſtle Dedicatory, dated at Paris in July, 1576, where he thus ſpeaks to Henry III. (a) 'Tis now five Years ſince the late King your Brother, your Self, Sir, and the Queen your Mother, having ſeen my Book concerning the State and Succeſs of the Affairs of France, which was printed, and the two firſt Books of the Hiſtory of France, only in Manuſcript, it pleas'd the late King, at yours, and the Queen your Mother's Requeſt, to Command me (and you, Sir, did the ſame) to write in French the Hiſtory of the Kings of France, your Predeceſſors, hitherto ill written by our Natives, and negligently or enviouſly handled by Strangers. And to furniſh me with Means and Courage to undertake this Work, it pleaſed the King your Brother (at the Inſtance and Requeſt of Mr. de Villequier, who always loved me, and my Writings, and who is at preſent almoſt the only worthy Witneſs of the long Services, which more ways than one I have done you ſince your Childhood,) to give me the Place of Hiſtoriographer of France, and to promiſe to raiſe and prefer me, which alſo, Sir, you aſſur'd me of on your part, and that my long and faithful Services, and my ordinary Labours, ſhould receive their Fruit. As this Paſſage may ſerve for the proof of a thing (b) I have advanc'd in the Text of this Article, I was not willing to abbreviate it. But here's a ſtrong Proof ſtill. This Hiſtorian having ſaid (c) that Henry III. I uſed always to hear and ſpeak the Truth, and gave Hopes to Men of Learning, that he would be their Support, and that ſometimes he would read and hear Hiſtories, adds, " which I can truly ſay, as having " known him from your Infancy, at the time I had " the Honour to be near your Perſon, and in your " Service, ſometimes diſcourſing with you about many " fine Hiſtories, both of the Kings your Anceſtors, " and other Kingdoms and States. The Paſſage I take from the Epiſtle Dedicatory of his State and Succeſs of the Affairs of France, is ſtill more formal. (d) " I have learn'd, Sir, ſays he, addreſſing himſelf " to Henry III. by the Education I have had, and " the Courſe of Affairs I have ſeen, being near you, " for the ſpace of Twelve Years before your Acceſ- " ſion to the Throne; and by many Affairs which I " have manag'd and ſeen for the Service of the Kings " your Predeceſſors, and yours, both within and " without the Kingdom, how one ought to ſpeak " and write of Kings and their Affairs. See alſo what will be ſaid (e) in the Remark (I.).

Note, that he publiſh'd (f) at Paris, in 1571. a brief Hiſtory of the Arts and Dukes of Anjou, from Godfrey Griſegounelle, to Monſeigneur Henry, Duke of Anjou, Bourbonnois, and Auvergne. He alſo publiſh'd the ſame Year, a Promiſe and Draught of the Hiſtory of France. (g) Du Verdier Vau-Privas, who tells me this, does not ſpeak of a Work that Du Haillan had publiſh'd in 1570, intituled, Of the Fortune and Power of France, with a Summary Diſcourſe upon the Deſign of the Hiſtory of France. (h) He publiſh'd the ſame Year a Book (i) which has been reprinted very often, which he dedicated to the Duke of Anjou. He ſays in his Advertiſement to the Reader (l). " This Book concerning the State " and Succeſs of the Affairs of France, which " I preſent to you, clad in new Accoutre- " ments, and much longer and finer than it was " formerly, was born ten Years ago, and was pre- " ſented to you at its Birth, being then very ſmall. " Two Years after I took it out of its Infancy, and " cloathing it in a longer Habit, I gave it, by your " Command, to the late King Charles your Brother. Thus he ſpeaks in an Epiſtle Dedicatory, of an Edition that brought forth this Work (m) in a Dreſs entirely new, and much finer and richer than it was before. The Author reviſ'd and enlarg'd it in 1594. and dedicated it to Henry IV. Zeiller ſays, (n) this Book is often cited and commended; and that he has, in his 190th Letter, given d'Aubigne's Judgment about it. I have not ſeen that Letter, but I am certain it contains a Blunder: for d'Aubigne in the Preface (o) that Zeiller cites, paſſes no Judgment on du Haillan's Writings, contenting himſelf only to harangue him. His Criticiſms fell only upon la Popeliniere, and Thuanus. Martin Zeiller did not know that du Haillan writ the Hiſtory of France, and Konig is ignorant of it too.

(D) By the advantageous and honourable Gratifications he made the Author.] La Popeliniere, omitting the Title of Hiſtoriographer of France, conferr'd on Du Haillan by Charles IX. touches only the Recompences of Henry III. This Omiſſion may be excuſed, conſidering the Difference betwixt a bare Title, and a Place ſettled, with a Salary annext to it. Now ſuch was the Employ that Henry III. conferr'd on him. However, let us ſee what (a) la Popeliniere ſays. (p) " Henry the Third, the Firſt of Princes " Ancient or Modern, not only gratified the Sieur " du Haillan of Bourdeaux, one of the Secretaries of " the Finances, with ſeveral Bounties he gave him, " as an Acknowledgment of the Pains he had taken " in the firſt Body of his French Hiſtory. But alſo " honour'd him afterwards with the firſt Place of " Hiſtoriographer of France, with a fix'd Salary " of 1200 Crowns per Annum, and made him one of " his Privy-Councellors, at the Inſtance of Chan- " cellor Chiverny, that he might be the better in- " ſtructed in the Knowledge of the moſt important " Affairs of the Kingdom. So that Henry III. was " the firſt that rais'd the bare and meer Title of " Hiſtorian, to the honourable Degree and Title of " Hiſtoriographer of France, in the Perſon of Ber- " nard de Girard, Sieur du Haillan, after his dedica- " ting and preſenting to him his Hiſtory of France, " collected from preceding Authors, as the firſt " Body of Hiſtory in a French Dreſs. We read in the French Mercury, (q) " that Henry III. as an Ac- " knowledgment of the Pains du Haillan had ta- " ken in the firſt Book of his French Hiſtory, " gratify'd him with the Place of Secretary of his " Finances. I don't know what this firſt Book of French Hiſtory is, that was recompenc'd in this manner: for du Haillan publiſh'd the Hiſtory of France all at once; and he does not ſay in his Epiſtle Dedicatory, that he had already obtain'd any Recompence. He only ſays, that Charles IX (r) had given him the Place of Hiſtoriographer, with fair Promiſes, and that Henry III. then Duke of Anjou, had alſo promiſed him ſome Benefactions. I fancy that the Compiler of the Mercury was afraid of being cenſur'd for tranſcribing the Paſſage of la Popeliniere Word for Word, and that to prevent it, he quoted him with ſome Alterations, but he did not ſucceed well in it. He chang'd the Firſt Body of his French Hiſtory, into the Firſt Book of his French Hiſtory. Theſe two Phraſes are widely different. The former ſignifies, that du Haillan was the firſt who publiſh'd a Body of French Hiſtory: The other ſignifies, that the Firſt Book of the French Hiſtory, written by du Haillan, was printed by it ſelf, before all the reſt. The Author of the Mercury ſuppoſes moreover, that this firſt Book procur'd him the Secretaryſhip of the Treaſury, from Henry III. but la Popeliniere, ſays no ſuch thing; he ſuppoſes that du Haillan was Secretary before the publiſhing of the Hiſtory of France. It muſt be however acknowledg'd, that his Narrative is ſomewhat confus'd: he has inſerted an afterwards, which is a Perplexity; it being a Term that does but ill agree with the following Words. The Mercury adds, 1. That after the Recompence for the firſt Book, the Hiſtorian obtain'd a better one, when he dedicated his Hiſtory of France to Henry III. for he was honour'd with the Title of Counſellor and Hiſtoriographer of France. 2. That he afterwards wrote the State and Succeſs of the Affairs of France: This is falſe, this Book was printed before the Death of Charles IX. (f) 3. That he was made Genealogiſt of the Knights of the Order of the Holy Ghoſt, at the Creation of that Order. He might have ſaid, that he had in Commendam, an Abby (t) which the famous Abelard had poſſeſs'd. Note, that in the firſt Edition of his Hiſtory ſtory, he only ſtiles himſelf Hiſtoriographer of France, but in the latter he is ſtiled Chancellor of the King, Secretary of the Treaſury and Chamber, and Hiſtoriographer of France. Note alſo, that in 1584, he was not yet rewarded. We ſhall ſee his Complaint (v) below.

(v) In the Remark F

(E) The Reaſons——ſhew, that he underſtood the Duties of an Hiſtorian.] I mean chiefly, the Reflection he had made, that a Man muſt reſolve upon an unlucky Choice, that writes the Hiſtory of Monarchs lately dead. He muſt either diſſemble the Truth, or provoke ſome Perſons who are moſt to be fear'd. The firſt of theſe Inconveniencies ſtrikes an Hiſtorian's Honour and Conſcience, the other offends againſt his Prudence. 'Tis beſt therefore to ſay nothing. This was one of du Haillan's Reaſons (a) with reſpect to the Reigns that followed Lewis XII. He adds a general Reaſon (b) of great Weight; viz. that there were already particular Hiſtories of all the Reigns after Charles VII. and that in the common Opinion it was almoſt impoſſible to equal the Writers of ſome of theſe Works. This Conſideration ought to affect an honeſt Man, and a famous Hiſtorian. He ought to ſave the Reader the Diſcontent of purchaſing twice the ſame thing. The reſpect he owes the publick, requires this, and Juſtice will not allow him to tranſcribe the Hiſtories that others have wrote: This is robbing another of his Property. His own Reputation and Prudence, oblige him to ſeek a more difficult and certain way to Glory. To Copy or give a new Form to the Writings of others, is too cheap a labour to be honourable, and expoſes you to the Infamy of Plagiaries. You'll be reckon'd a vain Man, if you pretend to equal their Glory who are thought incomparable, and you run the riſk of being ſtill accounted inferiour, though you ſhould match or exceed them. Ought a Wiſe Man to encounter the Prepoſſeſſions of the publick? 'Tis pity but ſuch Reaſons ſhould make as great Impreſſions on every Body, as they did (c) on du Haillan; the Libraries would not be ſo throng'd with Books, containing the ſame Things. Let us here give the Deſcription he has made of the Inconveniencies that the Authors of the Hiſtory of their own Age fall into. ' (d) For as much as all ' thoſe Hiſtories which treat of King Francis I. were ' written in his, or his Son Henry's Time, the Au- ' thors have perhaps more enlarged on the Praiſes ' of this King, than was ſuitable to his Merit, ' (though he was a great and excellent King) or ' to the Duty of an Hiſtorian, or to Truth, which ' is the conſtant Fault of thoſe who write the Hi- ' ſtory of their time, and of the Princes under ' whom they live. For where's the Man that dares ' touch upon the Vices of his Prince, or blame his ' Actions or thoſe of his Miniſters, and relate the ' Plots, Impoſtures, and Treaſons that are acted in ' his Reign, or ſay, that his Prince did ſuch an In- ' juſtice, committed ſuch an Adultery; or that a ' certain Man ran away in a Battle, and that ano- ' ther committed a Treaſon, ſuch a one was guilty ' of a Robbery, and another of a Treachery, and ' a third of ſuch another Villany? There is no ' Body venturous enough to do this. And therefore ' they that write the Hiſtory of their own Times, ' are actuated with ſeveral Paſſions, and are obli- ' ged, either to lye openly, if they univerſally ' praiſe their Princes, if they favour their Nation, ' if they generally blame their Enemies; or to diſ- ' ſemble and palliate the Truth, and to gild over ' their Writings, and the Actions of their Princes ' with fine Words, or (if they reſolve to ſpeak the ' truth) they are forc'd to conceal their Names, and ' print their Works without them. They that ' write the Hiſtory of their Predeceſſors, may (if ' they will) avoid this Fault, and run boldly in the ' Field of Truth, with all Aſſurance and Liberty ' of Language. Many Readers will here call to mind the Words of the Emperor Peſcennius Niger. Praiſe Marius, or Hannibal, or ſome other great General, who is under Ground, ſaid he to an Orator, who deſir'd to ſpeak a Panegyrick to him. For 'tis ridiculous to praiſe the Living, eſpecially if they be Emperors: Rewards are expected from them, they are feared, they can kill and baniſh. (e) Quum imperatori facto quidam panegyricum recitare vellet, dixit ei, Scribe laudes Marii vel Annibalis, vel alicujus ducis optimi vita functi, & dic quid ille fecerit ut eum nos imitemur. Nam viventes laudare irriſio eſt, maxime Imperatores, à quibus ſperatur, qui timentur, qui præſtare publicè poſſunt, qui poſſunt necare, qui proſcribere: ſe autem vivum placere velle, mortuum etiam laudari.

IN WHAT Caſes it is reaſonable to write Hiſtory, &c. already handled by others.

Let us ſay by the by, that we muſt not make du Haillan's Second Reaſon a general Rule (f); for there are many Caſes, in which 'tis very reaſonable to write the Hiſtory of the ſame Reigns that have already been written by others. As 1. When a Man has a great many new things to ſay, or when he can illuſtrate and rectify the preceding Hiſtories in many Places. 2. When the deſign is to collect into one Body all the Facts belonging to an Hiſtory, ſome whereof lie in ſome Books, and others in others. 3. When the taſte of the Readers requires a new Language, and a new Turn. At preſent, for inſtance, moſt People would chuſe rather to be ignorant of Hiſtory, than to read the Authors that compoſed it, in the Fifteenth or Sixteenth Century. And therefore, tho' an Hiſtorian ſhould have nothing to ſay but what was already printed yet it would be commendable to publiſh an Hiſtory, provided the turn and the Stile could allure the Reader, and the Publick appeared altogether diſguſted with other Hiſtorians. Whence it appears, that if there are ſo many Books containing the ſame Things, it is not always the fault of the Authors, but frequently of the Readers, who will not be at the pains of ſeeking Hiſtorical Facts ſeparately, or turning over Books written in old French. 'Tis therefore for their Convenience and Profit, that ſome Authors publiſh Hiſtories, which teach nothing new, and only connect together in a better Stile, the different pieces of other Authors. If you have diſcover'd ſome new Facts, will it be ſaid to you, be contented to publiſh them, and nothing elſe, why do you from thence take occaſion to make a large Book, in which you crowd ſo many old Stories? This Cenſure is juſt on many Occaſions, but not when their new Diſcoveries may be diffus'd upon a very long Train of Events. They muſt then be incorporated with old Relations; the Intereſt and Convenience of the Reader requires it. We ſhall ſee by and by, that upon this Principle, our du Haillan chang'd his Reſolution.

(f) It is the ſecond, not in his Book, but according to the Abſtract, I have given above of his Narrative

What has been ſaid of Hiſtorical Books, may be applied to other Works. There are but too many which contain nothing but what is found in an hundred others; but on the other ſide, it would be a thing prejudicial to the Republick of Learning (g) not to dare to put in a Work, what other Books have already publiſh'd. A Divine of Leiden pretends, that 'tis of great uſe to publiſh ſeveral Books upon the ſame Subjects, when they are important; he aſſerts alſo, that 'tis an excellent way to leſſen the Multitude of Books which burden and oppreſs ſo many People. The reaſon of this Paradox is, that a conſiderable Number of Books upon certain Subjects, would imploy the publick, and then abundance of other Books would be neglected, and leap from the Bookſeller's to the Grocer's Shop. Let us ſee this Author's Words, in which we ſhall find an excellent Thought of St. Auguſtin. (h) Id (ſcribendi cacoëthes) nunc his temporibus in immenſum eſt auctum, ut omnem medelam ſuperaſſe videatur, nec alio modo poſſit coerceri, quam ſi plures divulges libros; quam rationem agendi forte paradoxam aliquis dixerit, optimam tamen nemo jure negaverit. De multitudine librorum utilium immenſo numero non eſt quod jure conqueramur, qui non facile nimis augentur. Quamvis enim de rebus iiſdem ſcribunt plures, modo illæ ſint cognitu dignæ, nullum id nocumentum veritati videtur inferre, quæ ſic ad plures ſibi viam pandit, cùm lectorum alii his potius, quàm illis ſcriptoribus delectentur, quamvis de eodem argumento commentatis. Quod rectè obſervavit Auguſtinus lib. 1. de Trinitate cap. 3. Neque enim omnia, quæ ab omnibus conſcribuntur, in omnium manus veniunt. Et fieri poteſt, ut nonnulli, qui etiam hæc noſtra intelligere valent, illos planiores non inveniant libros, & in iſtos ſaltem incidant. Ideoque utile eſt, plures à pluribus fieri diverſo ſtylo, non diverſa fide, etiam de quæſtionibus eiſdem,

Duties of an Historian. However, he promis'd Henry IV. to continue (F) this History to his Time: But he did not make this Promise good. The Reason that obliged him to continue it, was not for the Honour of † Philip de Comines. He had the Courage to confute many Traditions, that an indiscreet Zeal for the Glory of France had propagated, and to speak freely upon (G) some tender Points, as for Example, concerning the Maid of Orleans. This Liberty gave Offence to narrow Souls, and such as would have every thing sacrific'd to Policy. I don't know whether he did well to publish (H) eisdem, ut ad plurimos res ipsa perveniat, ad alios sic, alios autem sic. Quâ ratione inutiles libri sensim eliminantur, ut alii postea non sit usui, quàm ut piperi & thuri involvendo inserviant.

(F) To continue this History to his time.] I prove it by this Passage: (i) 'I have also written a Book 'concerning the Monarchy of France, which will 'quickly present it self to your Majesty, with a 'Description of all the Secrets and Affairs of the 'Establishment, Greatness and Power of your King-'dom, and of the Kings your Predecessors. Their 'History, which I have made and finish'd at the 'Death of Charles VII. will be quickly followed by 'those of the other succeeding Kings, down to your 'Majesty; then yours will come out, if you please, 'to have it publish'd. This is what du Haillan said to King Henry IV. in an Epistle Dedicatory, dated in Octob. 1594. He had acquainted his Readers with the change of his Resolution ten Years before; for dedicating to Henry III. the Second Edition of his History of France, corrected and enlarged in 1584. he speaks to him in this manner. 'Though in my Epistle Dedicatory to your Majesty, 'and in the Preface of the First Edition, I said, I 'would proceed no further, nor write the History of 'Lewis XI. because it was already done by Philip 'de Comines, Sieur d'Argenton; yet having since 'chang'd my Resolution, I have began it with hopes 'of finishing it this next Winter, if I find my La-'bour will be acceptable to you. 'Tis not amiss to see the reason of his Change; for besides that we shall see his Judgment concerning Philip de Comines, we shall find that he was under one of those Cases in which 'tis permitted to write a History after other Writers. 'That which has caus'd me, (1) says he, 'to alter my Resolution, and to treat of the said 'King Lewis was, that the Sieur d'Argenton be-'gan his History, call'd Memoirs, but from the Fifth 'Year of his Reign, and that all the Causes of the 'Wars, and of the great Affairs this King had, are 'compris'd betwixt the beginning of his Reign, 'and the time wherein Philip de Comines begins to 'write, and in that part of History which he has 'treated, he has conceal'd many Things, which I 'have discovered, and extracted from many Books, 'Memoirs, and Dispatches of that time, and from 'many secret Discourses, written either in his Reign, 'or a little after his Death, which are free from 'fear and Hatred, Flattery and Praise, into which 'they often fall who write the History of their own 'times, and into the last of which Philip de Comines 'has been carried, being moved to either by his great 'Affection towards his Master, or the Benefactions 'he had receiv'd from him, or the fear of his Suc-'cessor. And therefore he has not said what others 'might say, and what other Historians have said 'of the Actions, Vices, and Craft (b) of that 'King; and praising him more than he ought, he 'in many places acts the part of an Orator, and of 'a Paregyrist, and not of an Historian; and in his 'long Digressions upon the Affairs of Foreign Po-'tentates, he transgresses the Bounds of History. After all, none of the Promises du Haillan made, of continuing the History of France, came to any thing. Nothing of this was found (c) amongst his Papers after his Death; the Booksellers, who added a Continuation to his Work, as far as the Year (d) 1615, and afterwards as far as the Year 1627. took it from Paulus Æmilius, Philip de Comines, Arnold Ferron, du Bellay, &c.

(G) Confute many Traditions——and speak freely——concerning the Maid of Orleans.] Let the Reader be uneasie at the length of the Passage I am going to cite; it is instructive, and shews the true Character of an Historian, and the ridiculous Scandal that is taken by ill turn'd Heads, from his Boldness to prefer Truth before all things. This preposterous Humour is of all Times and Places. 'Tis worth while to observe, how some famous Authors have vilified and oppos'd him. These are du Haillan's Words. (e) 'I have not acted the 'part of a Flatterer, nor of a Courtier, but that of 'an Historian, and I have spoken the Truth. I 'have not imitated Flattering Painters, who draw-'ing a Face, if it happen to have any Imperfection 'or Deformity in it, leave it out, or make it hand-'some. My Resolution was to praise the ugliest as 'well as the finest Features, and to speak boldly and 'freely of every thing with an unusual Liberty, 'which will be prais'd and admired by all good 'Readers; as I have formerly done in my History of 'the State and Success of the Affairs of France; 'in which I have boldly spoken many things, which 'before me no Body durst say, and possibly did not 'know. For both in that Work, and in this I have 'encountred many Things receiv'd in common Opi-'nion, as the coming of Pharamond into Gaul, the 'Institution of the Salick Law, attributed to him, the 'Creation of the Peers of France, ascribed to Charle-'magne, and other particular Points, having with 'Boldness and Truth affirmed, that Pharamond ne-'ver pass'd the Rhine to enter Gaul, and that he did 'not make the Salick Law to exclude the Daughters 'from the Succession of our Crown, because he ne-'ver came into our France. Whereupon, some who 'pretend to speak of every thing, and know nothing, 'and who think by their ill grounded Opinions to 'overturn those which are built upon Judgment 'and Reason, have said, that I went about to de-'stroy the Principles of our History, by denying the 'Institution of this Law by Pharamond. But, Sir, 'this is not my Design, but only to reject an anci-'ent Error, the Salick Law being, in my Opinion, 'ancient and approved enough, since it has been 'practis'd as a Law, from the beginning of our 'first Kings (as you may see at large at the begin-'ning of the first Book of the History in Pharamond's Life) and my Opinion thereupon, can give 'no Advantage to Strangers, nor scandalize our Na-'tives, except such as are scandaliz'd with every 'thing but what themselves say and do. Some have 'found fault with my Liberty of Language in this 'particular, and in that of the Peers of France, 'and in others, saying, That I act against the Duty of 'an Historian, by robbing France of an ancient Opi-'nion she had of the coming of Pharamond into 'Gaul, of the Salick Law made by him, and the 'Institution of the Peers of France, and that 'tis 'a Crime to abrogate things grown old in Opinion, 'and written by ignorant People, who never read 'good Books, and believ'd by others as ignoram, 'who have neither Sense nor Understanding to read, 'or understand good and ancient Authors, but ra-'ther amuse themselves with old Trumpery, as ill 'wrought as their own Heads. Good Historians (Sir) ought not in their Words or Writings to 'follow the Opinions of the Vulgar, but only the 'true ones, and such as are approved by true Au-'thors, or good Arguments and Conjectures, which 'when they are numerous, and well argued, serve 'for a true and certain Testimony, and supply the 'Deficiency of Writings, when the direct Proof of 'the Truth is devour'd by the Malice of Time. I 'have therefore (Sir) in these things, and many 'others, rejected the common Opinion for the true. 'In which I presume I have done good Service to 'the History of France, disingaging it from many 'Forgeries and Fables, which render it disagreeable, 'and sometimes contradictory, delivering the Rea-'ders from the Uncertainty of many Points, which 'they found not the meaning of. In which I am 'certain to please Men of Judgment, which are 'those that I care to please, and not those who shall 'dislike my Opinions and Writings. If you would know what he says of the Maid of Orleans, read the following Passage. (f) 'The Miracle of this 'Maid, whether it was invented and feign'd, or true, 'rais'd the Courage of the Lords, the People, and 'the King, who had lost it; such is the force of 'Religion, and frequently of Superstition. For 'some

(H) some things, which he knew only by hear-say. He was much criticiſed, and he manifeſted how it vex'd him, by the Haughtineſs wherewith (I) he anſwered his Cenſurers. He has not been unjuſtly cenſur'd in every thing, as I ſhall ſhew by a Paſſage

' ſome ſay, that this Joan was a Whore to John Baſtard of Orleans, others to the Sieur Baudricourt, ' others to Poton, who being politick and prudent, ' and ſeeing the King at his Wits end, and the People ' ſo diſcouraged by continual Wars, that there was ' no raiſing their Hopes and Spirits, bethought ' themſelves of imploying a Miracle, made up of a ' falſe Religion, which of all things in the World is ' moſt apt to raiſe and animate People, and make 'em ' believe a Lye. And the People were very much ' diſpos'd to receive ſuch Superſtitions. They that ' believe ſhe was a Maid ſent from God, are not ' damn'd; neither are thoſe that don't believe it. ' Many think this laſt Article an Hereſie; but I ſhall ' ſuſpend my Belief on either Side. Theſe Lords ' for ſome Days together, inſtructed her in all ſhe ' was to anſwer to the King's Queſtions, and theirs, ' when ſhe ſhould come into his Preſence (for they ' themſelves were to make the Interrogatives) ' and that ſhe might know the King, when ſhe ' ſhould be brought to him (whom ſhe had never ' ſeen) they made her familiar with his Picture be- ' forehand. The Day deſign'd, in which ſhe was to ' come to his Chamber, which was by their Appoint- ' ment, they fail'd not to be there. When ſhe ' came in, the firſt that asked her what ſhe would ' have, were the Baſtard of Orleans and Baudricourt; ' who asking her what ſhe wanted, ſhe anſwered ' ſhe would ſpeak with the King. They ſhewed ' her one of the other Lords who were there, ſaying ' it was the King, but ſhe being before tutour'd in ' every thing that was to be ſaid and done, and ' what ſhe was to ſay and do, ſaid it was not the ' King, and that he was hid behind the Bed, (where ' indeed he was) and going to him, ſhe ſaid to him, ' what has been ſaid above. This feign'd and coun- ' terfeit Invention of Religion, was of that Ad- ' vantage to the Kingdom, as to raiſe its drooping ' and diſpirited Courage from Deſpair. At laſt ſhe ' was taken by the Engliſh before Compiegne, and ' carried to Rouen, where ſhe was tried and burnt. ' Some have been, and will be diſpleas'd at my ſaying ' this, and that I deprive our Countrymen of an O- ' pinion, which they have ſo long reckon'd a Sacred ' and miraculous thing, to turn it at preſent into a ' Fable. But I reſolv'd to ſay it, becauſe it has ' been thus diſcovered by Time, that diſcovers all ' Things; beſides, it is not a thing of that Impor- ' tance, that it ought to be believed as an Article of ' Faith.

(H) To publiſh ſome things which he knew only by hear-ſay.] 'Twas upon ſuch a Foundation he publiſh'd that Charles VIII. was ſupoſititious. See the News from the Republick of Learning (a). Varillas (b) confutes this Story.

(I) By the Haughtineſs wherewith he anſwered his Cenſurers. As the Works he had publiſh'd before the Hiſtory of France, had been criticiſed, he doubted not but they would have the ſame Fate. And therefore he ſhewed himſelf Supercilious before-hand, and placed on the backſide of the Title, a Sonnet, which has ſomething of a Gaſcon in it.

Mille & mille ignorans, ſuperbes envieux,
Meſdiſans, eſtourdis, vains & preſumptueux
Te voudront attaquer une indigne querelle.
Mais ne crains tout cela, ains paſſe hardiment,
Car leur preſumption, ny leur ſot jugement,
Ne pourront empeſcher ta carriere immortelle.

At the very beginning of this Preface, he makes this Obſervation. ' If this Hiſtory of France ' pleaſes not every Body, as I well know it will not ' pleaſe the faſtidious, the ignorant, and the envi- ' ous (and ſuch I will not pleaſe) who ſhall paſs ' their fooliſh, ignorant, and envious Judgment up- ' on it, I am certain it will pleaſe thoſe amongſt you ' who are Writers, who know by Experience what ' Labour is, who have a Judgment free from all Paſ- ' ſion, and who honeſtly excuſe the Faults and In- ' advertencies that may be met with in ſo great ' a Work. The laſt part of this Paſſage is conſidera- ble, and moſt true in certain Reſpects. None are ſo fervent Criticks, or ſo raſh and injuſt in their Cen- ſures, as they that write nothing. An Author has more reaſon to promiſe himſelf ſome Indulgence and Equity amongſt Authors, than amongſt ſuch as know not by Experience, the Difficulties of Writing. Provided only there be no Emulation in the caſe, as ſometimes there is not; for Authors don't always take the ſame Road: The Reputation of one, is not al- ways of the ſame kind with that of another. And in this caſe, it is better to fall into the Hands of a Laborious Author, than of a Lazy Reader. In the other caſe, a Reader proves more equitable. But to return to du Haillan, he ſpeaks thus towards the end of this Preface: ' In the mean time, I will con- ' ſider the Enviers and Slanderers of me and my ' Works, who ſhall caſt the Duſts of their Malice ' againſt both. Being able to ſay with Truth, Read- ' ers, that in my Fortune, Actions, and Writings, ' I have never been envied or hated by any, but by ' the Ignorant and the Wicked, and thoſe whoſe Re- ' putation has been tainted with ſome Vice. The Storm he foreſaw (c) actually happen'd. Let us ſee what he obſerves in the Epiſtle Dedicatory (d) of the (e) Second Edition. ' This Work was no ſooner ' born, but it was bark'd at, and bit by the Envy ' and Obloquy of all ſorts and Ranks of People, ' ſome openly my Enemies, and others my ' pretended Friends; nay, there were ſome, who ' carrying it fair with me, as they did in all their ' Actions, and courting your Favour by indirect and ' oblique Ways, of which they were extreamly gree ' dy, went about to purchaſe it by Impoſture and ' Calumny, at the expence of my own and my Hi- ' ſtory's Reputation, cenſuring it in your Preſence, ' for that, for which it has ſince been moſt eſteem'd, ' and which will give it the greateſt Honour and ' Favour with Poſterity; I mean the Truth and the ' Boldneſs of Language. He expreſſes ſtill more Re- ' ſentment, and Haughtineſs at the end of his Pre- face. ' They, ſays he, according to their uſual Ma- ' lice, were of the Number of my Adherents; but ' I have reſolved to deſpiſe their Envy, and ' laugh at it, covering my ſelf with the Veil of ' Truth, and the Benevolence of ſuch of my Rea- ' ders, as have read and ſhall read my Book with ' Judgment, and have approved, and ſhall approve ' it: For 'tis for you that 'tis made, and not for the ' envious, ignorant and malicious, who can't look ' upon any thing that's Good, and knew not how to ' judge of, or eſteem what is praiſe worthy. A- mongſt the things he ſaid to his Criticks, I have met with one that deſerves Conſideration. " (f) If ' ſometimes I name Men, whoſe Name the to ' tickliſh Reader will ſay, is not an Affair of State; ' I will anſwer him, that it ſeem'd to me, that I ' have a Judgment as well as he, and (let him be ' who he will) I know better what I write, than ' he knows how to judge of my Writings. This is what many other Authors may and ought to repre ſent to their Criticks. A Man that is imploy'd many Years upon one kind of Work, knows better than another what it requires. He has not, if you pleaſe, ſo good a Taſt and Judgment as another, generally ſpeaking; but ſince he has ſtudied certain Subjects, and applied himſelf to them for a long time, we ought to believe, that he judges better of their Nature, and the Ornaments that belong to them, than thoſe that have not made them their particular Study. And therefore we ought not to imagine, that certain Authors act imprudently, when on ſeve- ral Occaſions, they prefer their own Judgment, before that of their Friends, or their Enemies, though otherwiſe more knowing than themſelves. A Wri- ter leſs intelligent, ſpeaking Generally, than the Readers, will yet have more Views than they upon the Subjects he treats of; and whilſt they know not whether he had reaſon to ſay ſuch or ſuch things, he knows he was induced to it by ma- ny reaſonable Motives, grounded upon the Chara- of his Work. Hence ariſe infinite ill-gr Cenſures, and therefore it would be requiſite to dy well the Rules, by which Men pronounce wh a Work be good or bad. For Example, to judge well of this commended Hiſtory, which I call an Hiſtorical and Critical Dictionary, a Man muſt have ſtudied the Rights and Privileges of an Hiſtorical Commentator; and hereupon I might ſay, as du Haillan, I know better what I write than [illegible] know.

WHY Authors ought ſometimes to prefer their own Judgments before the Judgments of others.

ſage (K) of Sorel. His manner of talking of himſelf, is a Teſtimony that he was not diſintereſted enough, either as to his Glory or Fortune. He vaunts too much his Labour, and the Succeſs (L) of his Books, their ſeveral Editions, Tranſlations, &c. and he too palpably manifeſts his Mercenary Deſires of Reward. I don't know whether we ought to believe that he † threatned with his Iron-Pen, thoſe who ſhould deſpiſe his Works, and that he judged it ſufficient to blaſt them, and pretended, that his Golden-Pen was capable of Eternizing the Merit of his Benefactors. He died * at Paris the 23d. of November, 1610. in his 76th. Year, and was buried at St. Euſtache. It muſt not be forgotten, that he had † attended Francis de Noailles, Biſhop of Acqs in his Embaſſies to England and Venice. We ſhall ſee in the Remarks, many pieces of his Epiſtles Dedicatory and Prefaces. They will diſpleaſe thoſe that deſire only a Superficial Knowledge of famous Men, but not ſuch as would know them intus & in cute. 'Tis for theſe latter that I labour, and I am certain they will acknowledge the Pains I take to ſhew them the Picture of the Heart, according to the Lineaments I find of it in Books, or as Authors have painted themſelves. Let this be ſaid once for all. We might make a great many Reflections upon this Picture of du Haillan, and therefore knows how to judge of my Writings. I have ſtudied the Nature and Properties of Compilations; if they every where pleas'd one kind of People, they would not be good. They that know not their Character, would only expect to find in them, what pleaſes their Palate.

Here are two other Paſſages of du Haillan, which will inform us that he was cenſur'd and vexed at it. (g) My Works, Sir——have not been able to avoid the Barkings and Bitings of Calumny and Envy, and of Evil-ſpeakers and Slanderers, with whoſe Stings, not only my Writings have been prick'd, but alſo the Courſe of my Fortune, has been wounded, ulcerated and ſtopt; it ſeems that ſome Rays of Vertue and Ability, which my Enemies diſcover'd in me, were offenſive to the Eyes of their Ignorance and Malice, and that my Light could not be born by them. Nay, Sir, in your Preſence, I have been ſo ſlander'd and ill uſed, that 'tis not long of my Enemies, if I have not forfeited your Favour and good Opinion, in which alone I have ever fowed the Hopes of all my Happineſs, and the Seeds of my moſt humble and devoted Service. But your Goodneſs and wiſe Judgment, Sir, has made them appear Impoſtors, and deliver'd me from the Fears of the Miſchief with which they threatned me. He ſpoke thus to Henry III. in 1580, dedicating a new Edition of one of his Books to him. The Preface of the ſame Book is very ſharp againſt du Haillan's Criticks, from which I have taken what follows. (h) " There are ſome Phantaſtical Wits (the Number whereof is endleſs) accuſtom'd to ſlander and " abuſe every thing, becauſe they are full of Ignorance and Preſumption, which take away their " taſte, who did not approve of my Book. Of theſe " ſome are common Courtiers, others are Lawyers, " others Collegiates, others ſome young Coxcombs, " lately come from the Univerſity, with three Borders of Latin upon their Gowns, and a ſprinkling " of purchaſed Honour, who ferreting all ſorts of " Books, pretend to deſpiſe and reject them, if they " find a Letter miſplac'd, or don't find what they " know not how to look for. Others are profeſt Writers, who being ſwell'd up, and big with Books, " bring forth one every Week, fill the Book-Sellers " Stalls with them, talk boldly of every body, deſpiſe the Works of others, and approve none but " their own. Some of theſe are meer Apes, for if " they ſee another do a Work, at Thirty Paces diſtance from thence, they put forth another, to " which they give the ſame Name. All theſe ſorts " of People have attack'd, pinch'd, and bark'd at me, " but however they have not bitten me, nor done any " injury to my preſent Performance, or to my Hiſtory of France, being only like cold Cinders, " which blacken, without being able to burn: For " in ſpight of their Envy, Cavils, Pedantry, " Railling and Preſumption, my Works fly through " the World, have obtain'd a great Reputation, and " are tranſlated into ſeveral Languages——" As for the Courtiers who have ill ſpoken of my " Writings, and attempted to make them odious, " they are Men accuſtom'd to rob others of their " Honour, when they want Opportunities of pilla" ging anyhing elſe.

(K) By a Paſſage of Sorel.] It contains a reaſonable Cenſure of ſome of du Haillan's Faults, and alſo ſome ſmall Commendations. (a) He was deſirous to imitate the Elegance of the beſt Hiſtorians, but to avoid Pains, he has almoſt tranſlated Word for Word, all Paulus Æmilius's Orations, and has alſo copied him in his Narrations: 'Tis true, he has added a great many curious Obſervations, which he found elſewhere. He may be charg'd with giving a fabulous Exordium to his Hiſtory, intirely of his own Invention, making Pharamond and his Faithful Councellors deliberate, whether having the Power in his Hand, he ought to reduce the French to an Ariſtocratical, or Monarchical Government, and giving to each of them an Harangue for the backing his Opinion. We there find the Names of Charimond and Quadrek, imaginary Perſons. 'Tis a thing very ſurprizing: We have but little Aſſurance that there was ever ſuch a Man as Pharamond in the World, and though there was, yet 'tis an egregious Baldneſs to relate things of him, which have no Foundation. M. Dupleix cenſures du Haillan for it, ſaying he has taken his Speeches from Amadis de Gaule; but Amadis has none of theſe Political Diſcourſes. We muſt ſuppoſe Dupleix only meant, that du Haillan had invented this, as it were to write a kind of a Romance. However, if they are not found in Amadis, they are in many other Places. They are common Places, that are uſually met with in Books, that treat of ſo trivial a Subject, as the different Forms of Government. Du Haillan is accus'd on another Hand, of talking too freely of ſome Eccleſiaſticks; but he did it poſſibly to ſhew his Zeal for our Kings, and to maintain their Authority. Notwithſtanding all this, his Writings are more judicious and methodical than thoſe that preceded his. His Hiſtory inſtructs us in many Particulars of the French Government, which he underſtood well enough, as he has made farther appear in his Book, of the State and Succeſs of the Affairs of France. In fine, he is to be praiſed for having firſt attempted to put our Hiſtory in a good and agreeable Form, which he has effected according to the Light that wat in his time.

was to consult, and then he adds: From all these Confusions, Diversities, Prolixities, and Labyrinths, Sir, I have escap'd, and have written the History of France, and of the Kings your Ancestors, in the best manner that I could. I have not been able to do it so well as it deserves, or to give it its just Perfection; and I will not blame the Dead or their Works, to give the Praise and Advantage to my own. Only I will say, without Presumption and Boasting, that I have done a thing that was never yet effected or seen by any of our Kings. Having given to the History of France, a Dress it never appear'd in before——Some may be able to write the History of France as well, and better than my self, and others Worse; but if I obtain not the first Rank amongst them, I assure my self I shall not have the last. I have found the way of drawing the Quintessence out of these gross Masses of ancient Histories, and of reducing their Luxuriancy and Superfluity, and Prolixity, to things necessary, and not superfluous; and besides, not willing to rely upon Histories and Chronicles, I have extracted from Foreigners, and Registers of Courts of Parliaments, from the Chambers of Accounts, and Charters of Churches, and from some Books lent me by some of my Friends, the necessary Materials of my Subject. My sole Aim was Truth, which is the Eye of History. He repeats a great deal of this in his Preface. I have labour'd upon it, says he, for five Years, I have spent many whole Days, and half Nights; I have rummaged, read, and turn'd over and over, many Books, Charters, Monuments, old Writings, Papers, and Parchments; I have had many Latin, French, and Italian Books, treating of the Histories of France, England, Germany, Italy, Spain, Flanders, Scotland, Burgundy, Bretagne, Anjou, Berry, and Aquitain, the Holy Wars in Asia and Europe, the Lives of Princes and Emperors, and abundance of others, with a World of old Writings and ancient Monuments. From all these I have extracted the Quintessence, distilling them in the Alembick of my Judgment and Inclinations, and I shew you my Extractions in my Book.

If you would know what he says of the Success of his Work, read what follows. (e) 'My 'History, which has vanquish'd their Envy, shall live 'as long as the French Tongue shall continue and 'prevail in these your Kingdoms. Since its first Edition, it has been often printed, both in your 'Kingdom, and out of it, in several Volumes and 'Characters, and turn'd into Latin by Pata (f) Boulanger, a Teacher in the College of Loudun, a 'Man of a good Life, and great Learning, and 'who in a Latin Stile, imitates, as much as any 'Man in Europe, the Purity and Softness of Cicero. 'But since, Sir, I have augmented and enlarg'd my 'History a new, having in some Places inserted two 'or three Leaves, in others less, he waits for this 'Impression to add to his Latin Version, what I 'have added to my French Composition. So that 'you'll quickly see, Sir, as also your Subjects and 'Strangers, this History in the Latin Tongue Add to this the beginning of his Preface. I wish my History of France might be as agreeable to you, as I have taken Pains and Labour in its Complement. My desires have not been altogether vain; for it so pleased Men of Judgment, that since that time it has been frequently printed, and in divers Volumes, both within and without the Kingdom, and read over and over, by all the ingenious Men of France, and numerous Foreigners——Now, Reader, seeing my Work has so well succeeded, and been so well receiv'd, both by Foreigners and Frenchmen, and so often reprinted and desired, I have corrected and much enlarg'd it, and enrich'd it with many curious Discoveries. Dedicating his Book of the State and Success of the Affairs of France, to Henry III. in 1580, he express'd himself in this manner. "(a) I am, Sir, the first of 'all the French, who have written the History of 'France, and in a Polite Language shewn the Grandeur and Dignity of our Kings; for before there 'was nothing but the old Trash of Chronicles that 'spoke of them. My Works are seen and read by 'all Christendom, and translated into several Languages, particularly my History of France, is put into 'Latin, by a very Learned Man of your Kingdom, 'and is ready to appear and present it self to your 'Majesty, cloathed in a Latin Dress. I am none of those 'ventrious and ignorant Writers, whose Brains daily 'teem with Books, and who in their benighted Studies, 'wherein they see not the Light of humane Affairs, 'speak and write confidently, right or wrong, of the 'present State Affairs, of your most secret and important Councils, judge of every thing, are partial for one, and prepossess'd against another, extol those that feed them with Money, make a meer 'Pretender of a great General, and Commander of 'an Army, and live only by the Sale of their presumptuous Writings. And therefore such Writers 'will see their Works expire, before themselves, 'and shamefully assist at their Funerals. I have 'learnt, Sir (b), Let us see the beginning of the Preface of the same Book. Many of you (Readers) who shall see this present Work, which I newly review'd and much enlarged and enrich'd, have seen it before printed in several sorts of Volumes, and Characters, from its first Edition, of the Year 1570. For since that time, (c) there has not an Year past'd, but it has been reprinted, and given Satisfaction to all who have seen it, who like what is good. When he dedicated the same Book to Henry IV. in 1594, he thus spoke to this Prince. It has travel'd, and seen the World, and has been well receiv'd within and without the Kingdom, and Strangers have made it speak their Language.

(b) You will find the Sequel of this Passage above.

(c) Lower he speaks thus: I'll tell you, that the Printer, who for Ten Years successively, has reprinted it every Year, design'd to reprint it again. Note, that this Preface was written in 1580.

As for his desire of Rewards, it may be clearly enough seen in the Passages I have already related, but it will more plainly shew it self in this, that follows. (d) I have proposed this Work in four Winters, Seasons proper for Writing and Studying, and have spent but few Summers Days in it, which seem not fit for such a Fatigue, as the short and cold Days are which I have employ'd in it. So that I am apprehensive of being frozen, unless the Sun of your Majesty, by the Rays of your Liberalities and Bounties, afford some encouraging warmth. There's not a Man of Letters in your Kingdom, who excells in any Science, or has shewn any Performance, but you have rewarded him for it, and all your ancient Servants are rais'd to Honours and Preferments, and are full and rich with your Gifts and Benefactions. I am the first who have written the History of the Kings your Ancestors, and possibly the only Person that hath done it in a good Method, and fine Language, and I am one of the first and eldest of your Servants, and yet I am the only one and the last to be provided for, but not the last in Merit. I have labour'd, and labour generally, for the Publick, more than for my self; nor only have I been engaged in writing Books, but also sometimes imploy'd in Voyages to Foreign Countries; and by the Observation of Affairs for Twenty Nine Years together, whilst I have been a Courtier, I have learnt how Histories ought to be written, and how I am to speak of Kings, and treat and write of Affairs of State. Here you see an Author Discontented, complaining that he is not enrich'd, nor advanc'd to Honours, by the Productions of his Pen, and asking when that Recompence of his Labours will come, so much desir'd, so well deserv'd. We find the same Complaint, in a Preface he publish'd in 1586. I have taken this Pains, says he, (f) to serve the publick, which I think I advantage, and have advantag'd by my Labours: Which gives me a singular Satisfaction: for I have labour'd with that Design. And that is almost all the Recompence I have had: and I shall be very well satisfied with this last Labour, when I find it will be acceptable to you. You may believe what you please of what I am going to relate, I'll quote my Author (e). 'Henry the Great——made one Day a 'Repartee to the Sieur du Haillan——for as du Haillan, a Man——vain——and given to his 'Belly——spake one Day to the late King too freely, 'complaining of the small Salary which he receiv'd 'from his Liberality, and had the Boldness to say to him, 'Sir, you know that I have two Pensions a publick Historian, a Title with which it has pleased your Majesty to honour me, one is of Gold, and the other of 'Iron: with my Golden Pen, I render those Immortal 'who honour me and do me good, and with my Iron one 'I tarnish the Reputation of those who don't take notice of the Merits of my Works. The King knowing by this Harangue, the Character of the Man, who was more valiant at a Meal, than he was in the Field, told him with a wonderful and royal Prefence of Mind. M. du Haillan, I don't believe that you have a Golden Pen; for had you had one, you has swallowed it long ago.

A REFLECTION upon the mercenary Spirit of those, who serve the Publick.

tleman, would seem at first Sight to make an absurd Question; but upon Examination, we should find in it a just Subject of a Problem, and should declare for the affirmative. Consider a little the printed, or not printed Relations of News-Writers, and the Discourses of those that have a long time seen great People. Consult the Historians who enter most into Particulars: especially, read the Authors of Memoirs: Do this attentively, and I doubt not but you'll own, that a poor Foot-Boy is in Proportion, less Mercenary, and more disinterested, than most of those that possess great Employs, either in Princes Households, or in the Government. These are Persons never contented, always ready to beg new Honours, and greater Pensions, and to complain of the Smalness of their Recompences, to particularize Services, to murmur if they are forgotten, whilst others are thought on, to threaten to retire, and to manifest their Discontent, by surly and audacious Proceedings, &c. These Gentlemen imagine they have the greater Right to demand extravagant Rewards, because they perswade themselves that their Master, a King, or a Sovereign: in a Word, the publick will never come to want, though they have famish'd Leeches upon them continually sucking (g). Tell me not of such, or such an one, who are ruin'd in their Prince's Service, and of such a great Lord, whose Lands and Houses are under an Execution. These are not Examples of their Disinterestedness. 'Tis not Zeal for their Country, but a Mercenary Temper, or their great State and Debauchery, that are the cause of their Poverty. They thought, that if they appear'd at Court, or in the Army with great Equipages, really useless to the publick Good, they should the easier come to Preferments, and at last, if they are ruin'd, it is not for the Advantage of the State, but to gratify their Pomp and Pride, and other particular Passions. The Aristides and Fabricii, who after they had possess'd the greatest Posts, and spent all their Life in a wonderful Frugality, had hardly any thing to leave their Children, are good Examples of an Unmercenary Spirit; but where are such to be found?

(g) Nec missura cutem nisi plena cruoris hirudo. Hor. de Arte Poet. vers.

But what is worse, is to see that Men of Learning can't cure themselves of this common Distemper. The Court and the Army being the Schools of Ambition and Luxury, and consequently of Avarice, 'tis no wonder they teach Men to do nothing gratis, and to desire large Recompences for their Services. And as this Passion is not easie to be satisfied, without Boasting of what they have done, and complaining of the want of a just Reward, there's no occasion to take so much Exception at this Conduct. But it will still be reasonably lamented, that Study and the Profession of Learning, should not have taught du Haillan the Prudence to avoid so much Ostentation of his Labours, and to forbear Complaints of the meanness of his Fortune. If he were the only Author of such a Conduct, there would be no occasion to be concern'd at it: but the Mischief of it is, that he herein copied a great Number of Writers, and an hundred others have copied, and still copy him. This is a great Injury to the Muses, and deprives them of the Glory they should enjoy, of inspiring their Attendants with a true Generosity, and a noble Contempt of Riches and publick Rewards. They are like other Men, you'll say, and no less subject to Ambition and Avarice, the two popular Diseases of an human Heart. 'Tis certain, that the desire of living at ease, by means of a good Revenue, is not the only reason of the Boastings and Complaints of du Haillan, and those that are like him; for Pride has a good part in it. They fancy, that the Publick will have a great esteem for their Persons and their Works, when 'tis known (a) they are preferr'd and rewarded for them; but in this there is great misreckoning: Some private Persons, I confess, may be surpriz'd by this Exteriour, and impose on themselves with this Fallacy: Such an Author has gotten noble Employs, and rides in his Coach, therefore he has a great deal of Merit and his Works are good. But the Publick is seldom caught thus; and however, 'tis a Charm but of short continuance. Posterity judges of Books by the Books themselves: If they are good, they are not despis'd, tho' it should be related at the Beginning of the Preface that the Author died with Hunger: If they are bad, they are despis'd, tho' it should appear in the very Title, that the Author was an Earl or a Marquis, and left a Million. What is it you fear? Why do you torment your self? Might one have been said to du Haillan: You may be allow'd to say that you have not spar'd your Pains or Care to render your Work perfect: Your Duty oblig'd you to great Fatigues, and 'tis a Civility to the Publick, to declare in a Preface, that you have done all you could to merit their Approbation. You ought to have stopt there, and not to have urged the Greatness and Price of your Labours, as a just Cause of demanding greater Recompences, and complaining you had not been sufficiently paid. Are you afraid that future Ages should know that your Studies and Lucubrations have put the History of France in a very fine Light, but have not enrich'd you? What Injury could that do your Memory? If it be be said that you was not sollicitous to heap up Riches, it will be supposed you wanted an ill Quality: Your Glory will not suffer by it: Sleep at Rest. If it be said that you had Ability sufficient to grow rich, but that you did not care to employ it, being content with your Books and your Studies, and to consecrate your time to the Instruction of the Publick: would not this be an excellent Elogy? Would it not be a favourable Prejudice for your Works? If the Contempt of Riches, and your continual Application to writing good Books, expose you to the danger of dying poor, you ought to desire this may be be put in the Epitaph on your Grave (b). This would be worth to you a good Title of Nobility in the Republick of Learning: This would be (c) a fine way to Immortality: Never fear the Judgment of Posterity upon it. If they are censured for their Ingratitude and Injustice, who were careless of recompencing your pains, what is that to you? 'tis a Censure that will not light upon you.

A LAUDABLE Passage concerning Mr. Descartes.

It must be here said to the Glory of Mr. Descartes, that he preserv'd himself pure and untainted from this scandalous Disease, tho' one of his Friends had taken the most dangerous ways to infect him. Observe in what manner this zealous Friend excited him to boast himself, and make loud Demands of Recompence. '(d) Know, that to obtain any thing 'of the Publick, it is not enough to hint a Word or 'two by the bye, in the Preface of a Book, without 'saying expresly that you desire and expect it, and 'explaining the Reasons, to prove not only that 'you deserve it, but also that 'tis their greatest Interest to give it you, and that they ought to expect 'great Advantage from it. It is usual to see all 'those that imagine they have Merit, make such 'Proclamations, and so importunately assert their 'Pretensions, and promise so much above what 'they can do, that when any one speaks modestly 'of himself, and desires nothing of any body, nor 'makes any confident Promises, whatever Proofs he 'otherwise gives of his Ability, he will not be consider'd. You'll say perhaps that you are not of an 'Humour, either to ask any thing, or speak to your 'own Advantage; because the one seems to be a sign 'of Meanness, and the other of Pride. But I 'maintain that this Humour ought to be corrected, 'and that it proceeds from Error and Infirmity, rather than from an honest Bashfulness and Modesty.——You may say likewise that your Works 'speak sufficiently, and that you have no need to add 'Promises and Boastings, which being the Custom 'of cheating Quacks, seem not becoming a Man 'of Honour who only seeks the Truth. But that 'which makes these Pretenders inexcusable, is not 'their boasting great and good things of themselves, 'but only false ones, and such as cannot be proved: 'whereas those things I would have you say of your 'self, are so true, and so evidently prov'd by your 'Writings, that you may affirm them, by all the Laws 'of Decency, and Charity obliges you to it, because o'thers are concerned to know them. For tho' your 'Writings speak sufficiently to such as carefully peruse them, and are able to understand them; yet this 'is not enough for the Design I would put you upon, 'because every one can't read them, and the Managers of publick Affairs have hardly leisure. 'Tis 'probable that some who have read them, may 'speak to them about it: but whatever they may 'say, the little Noise you are known to make, and 'the great Modesty you always have observ'd in 'speaking of your self, hinders them from reflecting much upon it. Nay, because they are accustom'd to hear indifferent People set off to them in the 'most advantageous terms imaginable, they have no 'reason to take the most extraordinary Praises that 'should be given you by those that know you, for 'exact Truth. But when a Man speaks of himself,

His Speech was highly approved, and procured him the esteem and protection of that Chancellor, so far as to receive from him his Doctor's Cap in presence of the Great Council the 18*th* of March 1640, having first defended some Theses ‡ in that illustrious Assembly. He followed Mr. Seguier to Paris, and made himself so advantageously known by some Pieces, that he was offer'd some Regencies in 5 several Colledges, and was extraordinarily † admitted into the Body of the University the 14*th* of August 1641. He chose rather to teach in the College of Harcourt than in any other; where he had a great Croud of Auditors. He Publish'd from time to time some Latin Poems which increas'd his Reputation, and occasion'd his Patron to cause him to be made the King's Poet, and Reader in Latin and Greek in the College Royal the 18*th* of December 1646. His too violent application to Study having ruin'd his Health, he was forc'd to rest some years to restore it; when he was recover'd, he resolved to restore the Faculty of Law to some Credit, which was fallen to a very low Ebb, having but one Professor (B) in it. He was made Regius Professor of the Canon Law in 1655, and he used all his Endeavours to raise and encourage the Study of this Faculty, the Rights (C) whereof he strenuously supported, notwithstanding the oppositions he met with. It's to him especially, we ought to ascribe the advantage the (D) Paris Professors have enjoy'd since the Year 1679. He compos'd (E) some very good Books, and had the satisfaction to have the most famous Learned Men for his Friends, who were yet more charm'd with his Virtue than his Learning. He Died excellently (F) prepared the 27*th* of December 1689. *

Ovid*, cited by this Grammarian, has elegantly describ'd the complaints and misfortune of the Hamadryade which the Impious Eryfichthon destroy'd. She lived in an old Oak of a prodigious bigness whom all the World Reverenc'd (c.) Eryfichthon's Servants durst not obey his Order to cut the Tree: he was forc'd to do it himself.

Some Grammarians divide what Servius unites; they will have the Hamadryades to be so call'd, because they were either Born or Died with the Oaks. (e) Ἁμαδρυάδες νενόμισται μονογενεῖς μόναι, διὰ τὸ ἅμα τοῖς δένδροις γεννᾶσθαι. ἢ ἅμα συναπόλλυσθαι τοῖς δρυσὶ τοῖς φυτοῖς, ὑπὸ τῶν ἀφελομένων. This division ought to be rejected, because the general opinion is, that the Life of these Nymphs was precisely of the same continuance with that of their Trees. Hence Pindar in a Poem that is lost, said ἐπὶ δρυὸς καὶ ἐπὶ τέρμα, finem ætati æqualis arbori nasci. Callimachus has this expression (f); ἐν δρυὸς αἰθούσῃσι τανύφλοιον, coætaneam ingemiscens prope quercum, speaking of the Hamadryad Melia. Apollonius imitated him, when he introduc'd an Hamadryad intreating one not to cut down a certain Tree.

Statius makes mention of a Wood that had outlived the Nymphs and Fauni: But this does not contradict the Tradition concerning the Hamadryades. Beſides, who knows not that this Poet's Sallies had no reſpect for any thing: Therefore there is no reaſon to attend to them, as to things that may be oppos'd to the general opinion. You'll ſee his words in the Remark D. Auſonius, more remote than he from the Fountain Head, is yet more conformable to the old Tradition, Non ſine Hamadryadis fato, ſays he, (i) cadit arborea trabs.

(i) Auſon. Edyll. 12. p. m. 483. Compare Balzac's Verſes recited in the Remark K of the Article Thomas Pactl.

Note that Pauſanias expreſſes himſelf in a manner that ſeems to prove that the Hamadryades were younger than their Trees. Speaking of a Town call'd Tithorea, (k) he ſays, Τιθορέαν δὲ, ὡς ἐπιχώριοι λέγουσιν Φωκέων ἀπὸ Τιθορέως γενέσθαι, εἶναι τῆς ἀρχῆθεν λόγῳ τῆς πολίδος ἐφεστῶτα ἀπὸ τε ἄλλων δένδρων, καὶ μάλιστα ἀπὸ τῶν δρυῶν. Tithoream incolæ vocatam eſſe dicunt à Tithorea Nympha, de iis unâ quas priſci poetarum ſermones, quam ex cæteris arboribus, tum verò è quercubus maximè genitas prodiderunt. This is making the Trees the Mothers of the Hamadryades: And therefore 'tis not true that they were Born at the ſame time. But I dont think Pauſanias's Expreſſions are to be much inſiſted on: It was not his buſineſs preciſely to deſcribe the Nature of theſe old Fables. Let us ſtick therefore to what the Poets affirm, that theſe Nymphs and Trees were Born at the ſame time. Obſerve that Pauſanias takes notice that they were eſpecially Born of an Oak. I don't ſee that this can be impugned by Pherecydes's Authority; for what he ſays does not ſeem to Concern the Hamadryades, properly ſo call'd. He (l) relates that the Fig Tree was call'd συκῆ from a Daughter of Oxylus; and that this Oxylus having lain with Hamadryade his Siſter, begot eight Daughters, which were all call'd Nymphs Hamadryades; but they had each a particular Name, which was afterwards given to Trees. She that was call'd συκῆ, Syce, was the Etymology of the Name of the Fig Tree: It ſeems to me that Hamadryade, Oxylus's Siſter, was not of the ſame kind with the Nymphs ſpoken of in this Article. Let this be ſaid with the leave of a (m) famous Author.

(B) Extreamly grateful to thoſe that preſerved them from Death] One Rhacus perceiving that an Oak was ready to fall, commanded his Children to prevent it, either by ſtrengthning it at the Root with Earth, or underpropping it. The Nymph who muſt have Periſh'd if the Oak had fallen, appear'd to Rhacus and thank'd him for ſaving her Life, offering him any recompence he deſired: he anſwer'd he deſir'd to enjoy her. The Nymph promis'd to grant his requeſt, and commanded him to abſtain from all other Women; She added that a Bee ſhould be the Meſſenger betwixt them: But the Bee happening to come whilſt Rhacus was Playing, he fell to giving hard Language, which provok'd the Hamadryade, in ſo much that he was maim'd for it. (a) This is the Relation of Charon of Lampſacus, if we believe the Scholiaſt of Apollonius. He told another Story with a better Concluſion: Which is this, as it is found in Natalis Comes, who does not cite the Author he had it from. Æneas the Son of Jupiter and Calliſto, Hunting in a Wood, met with an Hamadryade in great danger of Periſhing; for the Tree with which ſhe was Born, had been very much damaged in its Roots by the Stream of a River: She pray'd Æneas to ſave her Life; he granted her requeſt, by turning the Courſe of the River, and putting new Earth about the Tree. The Nymph was not ungrateful, ſhe granted him what we call the laſt favour, and had two Children by him; Her name was Proſpelea (b). We only find in Pauſanias (c) that Arcas was Married to a Dryade Nymph called Erato, by whom he had three Boys. We might conclude from this that though the Hamadryades could not ſurvive their Oak, or their Fir, &c. they might ſometimes leave them, and if this conſequence was doubtful, it might be confirm'd by a paſſage of Homer, where we find that the ſame Nymphs which had their Birth and Death with Trees, taſted the pleaſures of Love in Caves with the Sileni.

' Et le Phenix de neuf corbeaux egale
' Les jours, mais vous, progenie Royale

' De dix Phenix vous fourniſſez les ans.

' Now they that miſtake the Poets meaning in the ' Word Genean, that is, the Age of Man, make ' this Calculation of Time to amount to a vaſt Num- ' ber of Years; for it only ſignifies one Year, ſo that ' the Sum total amounts but to Nine thouſand ſeven ' hundred and twenty Years, which is the Age of ' Dæmons. And there are many Mathematicians, ' who make it ſhorter. Even Pindar has not made it ' greater, when he ſays, the Life of Nymphs is ap- ' pointed equal to that of Trees, and therefore they ' are call'd Hamadryades, becauſe they are born and ' die with Oaks. Plutarch deſerves ſome Cenſure, for not relating the Verſe in which Heſiod defin'd the Duration of human Life: for it was the Baſis of all the following Calculations. I may ſuppoſe that Heſiod defin'd this Duration, ſince his Tranſlator begins with ſaying, the Age of Man contain'd 96 Years. This Period being granted, 'tis eaſie to compute the Age of Stags, Ravens, &c. and we find, that the Crow lived 864 Year, the Stag 3456, the Raven 10368, the Phenix 93312, and the Hamadryad 933120. All this is ridiculous, and Pliny has reaſon to reject it as fabulous. (b) *De ſpatio atque longinquitate vitæ hominum, non locorum modo ſitus, verum exempla, ac ſua cuique ſors naſcendi incertum fecere. Upon the leaſt Computation, which is making Heſiod's (i) Age to mean only an Year, his Doctrine would be falſe concerning the Hamadryades: they could not live longer than Trees, but there is no Tree that can laſt 9720 Years. What Pliny ſays of the long Life of ſome Trees (i), and others of the (k) Oak of Mamre, and an hundred Stories of this Nature, though they were as true as they are doubtful, make nothing againſt my Aſſertion.

For the reſt, it was not hard for the Gentiles to imagine ſuch a kind of Nymphs; for they had a Religious Veneration for Trees (n) which they believed to be very ancient, and whoſe extraordinary Bigneſs demonſtrated their long Life. 'Twas an eaſie Tranſition from hence to believe, they were the Abode of ſome Deity. They made a natural Idol of them, I mean, they fancied, that without the Help of Conſecration, which brought down the God into the Statues dedicated to him, a Nymph or Deity dwelt in the midſt of theſe Trees: The Oak that Eryſichthon fell'd, was reverenc'd for its Bulk and great Age, it was adorn'd as a conſecrated Place, it was hung with the Tokens of the Succeſs of one's Devotion, and with the Monuments of anſwer'd Vows.

(d) Seneca in Herc. Oeteo v. 1051. p. m. 322.

There is ſome Probability, that the Nymphs are here meant, that were born and died with a Tree, and that properly ſpeaking, were call'd Hamadryades, and not Dryades. It was not a conſtant Tradition, that theſe Nymphs could not depart from their Trees: not for a few Moments. And therefore Seneca might ſuppoſe they left them to hear Orpheus ſing. Note, that Servius is miſtaken in thinking Statius ſpoke of the Hamadryades, in theſe Verſes of the 6th. Book of the Thebaïs.

(c) Linquunt flentes dilecta locorum
Otia, cana Pales, Silvamque arbiter umbræ,

Silva, nec amplexæ dimittunt robora Nymphæ.

(e) Statius Theb. lib. 6. v. 110. p. m. 234.

'Tis certain, that the Nymphs he ſpeaks of, were thoſe that were properly call'd Dryades, and therefore Servius is to blame, to apply the nec amplexæ dimittunt robora Nymphæ to the Hamadryades, whoſe Character he had been giving in theſe Words. (f) Hamadryades cum arboribus & naſcuntur & pereunt, unde plerumque, caſa arbore ſanguis emanat. Barthius did not perceive this Grammarian's Error, tho' he produces a Paſſage, that was very proper to notifie it. Pulcra notatio in Commentario antiquo, ſays he, (g) Dimittunt.] Non cum effectu intellige, dimittunt enim omnino, quamvis ſero dimittant. Sed diuturnitatem manifeſtat amoris, non abceſſiſſe Nymphas, niſi penitus proſtratis arboribus. Sic ſolemus dicere: Ille modum non facit plorandi, non facit alius finem videndi, cum diutius videat aut fleat. Don't theſe Words plainly ſhew, that Statius does not ſpeak of the ſame kind of Nymphs defin'd by Servius, and that neceſſarily died when their Trees were cut down?

(h) Hanno Carthaginenſis exploratum miſſus à ſuis, cum per Oceani oſtium exiiſſet, magnam partem ejus circumvectus, non ſe mare ſed commeatum defeciſſe memoratu retulerat. Let us ſee Pliny's Words (i): Et Hanno, Carthaginis potentia florente, circumvectus à Gadibus ad finem Arabiæ, navigationem eam prodidit ſcripto. Salmaſius (k) ſuppoſes Pliny miſtaken, and that Hanno did not continue his Diſcoveries to the Red Sea, but only to the Iſland call'd Gorgades. Iſaac Voſſius (l) is much of the ſame Opinion, he thinks, that the Iſland, call'd at preſent St. Anne, was the Boundary of this General's Navigation.

tion of his Voyage, which was often (B) quoted; but little Credit was given to it. There is something (C) of it remaining. It is not agreed at what time (D) he lived, and there is no Proof that the Carthaginians put him to Death. He hung up in Juno's Temple, the Skins of some Savage Women who were flea'd by his Order. See the last Remark.

HARPALYCE, the most Beautiful young Woman of Argos. Clymenus her Father grew so much in love with her, that having used all Endeavours to conquer his Passion, and finding it still increas'd by them, he resolv'd on the means to satisfieit. He therefore corrupted his Daughter's Nurse, and thereby secretly had his fill of the beloved Object. Sometime after came the Son-in-Law, to whom he had promised his Daughter. Immediately all things were sumptuously prepared for the Wedding: The Marriage was consummated: The Husband departed with his Bride to return Home. Then Clymenus repented he had given Consent to the Match. His Love put him into such a Passion of Rage, that before they came to the end of their Journey, he made away with his Son-in-Law, and brought back his Daughter to Argos, where he carried himself publickly as her Husband. She at last reflected on the Indignites she had suffered (C) There's something of it remaining.] Sigismund Gelenius had it printed in Greek, at Basil, by Frobenius, in 1533. There came out a Second Edition of it in the same place, in 1559, with the Latin Version, and some Notes of Conrad Gesner: and yet Salmasius says, that this Work seems to have been unknown to the Greeks. (o) Scriptum illud non videtur innotuisse. Etenim si venisset in notitiam ac manus Græcorum totam eam meridiani Oceani oram minime reliquisset intactam. He knew not therefore of the Words of Pliny, cited in the foregoing Remark, and of the Passage of the Book Περὶ θαυμασίων ἀκουσμάτων, de auditionibus admirandis; in which Hanno is quoted. Mention is also made of it in Artemidorus the Ephesian's Epitomy. Here are Instances that shew, that Men of the greatest Reading, and vastest Memory, are sometimes ignorant of things very easie to be known. Isaac Vossius (p) has not forgiven Salmasius this Mistake. Nor has Father Hardouin (q) omitted it. Note, That there was publish'd at Leiden, in 1674, what had been publish'd at Basil in 1559 I mean Hanno's Periplus, with Gesner's Latin Version and Notes, and John Leo's Africa. But Berkelius added some Remarks to it, taken from the second Part of Mr. Bochart's Geographia sacra. The same (r) opusculum of Hanno has been publish'd at Oxford, in 1698, by Mr. Hudson, with many other Writings of the same Nature, in the First Tome of Geographiæ veteris Scriptores Græci Minores. Mr. Dodwell's Dissertations prefix'd to this Volume, which treat amply of those ancient Greek Authors, are full of Learning. That concerning Hanno is not the least important. Mr. Dodwell does not believe, that this Carthaginian Commander wrote the Periplus that goes under his Name. He ascribes it to a Gracian of Sicily, a great Admirer of the Glory of Carthage. He believes also, that the Periplus which goes at present under Hanno's Name, is very different from that which the Ancients had. See the Margin (†).

(D) At what time he lived.] Pliny says, 'twas when the Carthaginian Affairs were at the highest. This is indefinite: nevertheless (f) Vossius finds there a just reason to conclude, that our Hanno was neither he that Justin speaks of in the Twentieth Book, nor he that Pliny mentions in the Sixteenth Chapter of the Eighth Book, nor he that was the Leader of a Faction (t) in Carthage, in the second Punick War: but he that was sent against Agathocles, as Justin informs us in the Twenty second Book. Hanno in the Twentieth Book of Justin was sent against the Tyrant Dionysius: The Gauls had then taken the City (v) of Rome, which they did in the 366th. Year from its Foundation. The same Hanno was kill'd some time after, with all his Family (w) for endeavouring to make himself Master of Carthage. I don't know but this City was in as flourishing a Condition at that time, as when another Hanno was sent (x) against Agathocles. He lost his Life in a Combat in the 443d. Year of Rome. I therefore see no certainty in Vossius's Thought. Note, that Pliny's Passage, alledg'd by him, is to be understood of one Hanno, who was condemn'd for having had the Art of taming a Lion; for they were perswaded, that the Liberty of their Country could not be safe in the Hands of a General, who could master the Cruelty of wild Beasts. (a) Primus hominum leonem manu tractare ausus, & ostendere mansuefactum, Hanno è clarissimis Pœnorum traditur: damnatusque illo argumento, quoniam nihil non persuasurus vir tam artificis ingenii videbatur: & male credi libertas ei, cui in tantum cessisset etiam feritas. Vossius observes, that Plutarch has spoken of the same Hanno. Indeed, he says, that the Carthaginians banish'd him, (b) because seeing him make a Lion carry his Baggage, they suspected he aspir'd to the Sovereignty. Neither Pliny nor Plutarch say any thing to denote the time this was done in, and 'tis difficult to conceive, what reason Vossius had to imagine they speak of a Hanno different from ours. Father Hardouin is of another Opinion, who thinks that the Voyager was the same that was condemn'd for taming a Lion. He cannot offer any proof of it; and we may conjecture he is mistaken; for 'tis somewhat probable, that if this was one and the same Person, Pliny would have touch'd upon this Circumstance. The surest way is to take neither Side, neither denying what Vossius denied, nor affirming what Father Hardouin affirms. Note, that he supposes Pliny to affirm (c) that Hanno was put to Death; but 'tis better to give a more indefinite Explication to the Word damnatus, since Plutarch specifies the Punishment of Banishment. This Objection may be made to Vossius. Aristotle has cited Hanno in his Book de admirandis auditionibus. Wherefore this Carthaginian General must have lived before Agathocles. But Vossius (d) answers, that Aristotle was not the Author of this Book. Solinus stands us in no stead, by saying, that Xenophon of Lampsacus has cited Hanno; for besides that, 'tis not known at what time this Xenophon lived, we have reason to believe, that Solinus is mistaken. These are his Words: (e) Has (Gorgades insulas) incoluere Gorgones monstra, & jamque usque adhuc monstrosa gens habitat. Distant à continente bidui navigatione. Prodidit denique Xenophon Lampsacenus Hannonem Pœnorum regem in eas permeavisse, repertasque ibi fœminas alitis pernicitate, atque ex omnibus quæ apparuerant, duas captas tam hirto atque aspero corpore, ut ad argumentum spectandæ rei duarum cutes miraculi gratia inter donaria Junonis suspendent: quæ duravere usque in tempora excidii Carthaginensis. 'Tis plain, that this Passage is a Transcript of this following. (f) Contra hoc quoque promontorium Gorgades insulæ narrantur Gorgonum quondam domus bidui navigatione distantes à continente, ut tradit Xenophon Lampsacenus. Penetravit in eas Hanno Pœnorum Imperator, prodiditque hirta fœminarum corpora, viros pernicitate evasisse: duarumque Gorgonum cutes, argumenti & miraculi gratia in Junonis templo posuit, spectatas usque ad Carthaginem captam. The Copy differs from the Original since Pliny does not, like Solinus, make Xenophon say, that Hanno penetrated into the Gorgades, &c. Salmasius supposes, that Solinus has [illegible]d this to prove, that Xenophon of Lampsacus lived after Hanno. (g) Hoc obtinere vult Solinus ut finis illi respondeat principiis, & toto in cursu sibi constet. Hanno vetustior Xenophonte Lampsaceno. Quomodo igitur hic de illo prodere potuit? I confess, this is an inexplicable Riddle

HARPALICUS King of the Amymnians * in Thrace, had a Daughter nam'd Harpalice, who was brought up with (A) Cows and Mares Milk, and whom he had accuſtom'd betimes to handle Arms. By this means he made a good Warriour of her, and found his account in it; for had not his Daughter come to his Reſcue when he was Aſſaulted and Wounded by (B) Neoptolemus the Son of Achilles, he had unavoidably loſt his Life; but Harpalice ſo ſeaſonably Charg'd the Enemy, as to put him to Flight. Her Father whom ſhe had ſo happily deliver'd from that Forcign War, ‖ loſt his Life ſome time after in a Civil one: His Subjects ? depos'd him and at laſt Kill'd him. Harpalice retir'd into the Woods and took to Robbing. She flew like Lightning; ſo that when ſhe was purſued by Horſemen to recover from her the Cattle ſhe had carry'd off, they could not overtake her. They had no way to take her but by laying Nets as they do for Staggs. They Kill'd her, but it coſt them dear that did it: For there immediately aroſe a diſpute in the Neighbourhood, who it was the Cattel ſhe had Stoln belong'd to: They Fought it out, and left many on both ſides Dead upon the Place. A Cuſtom was ſince Eſtabliſh'd of aſſembling at the Tomb of the Damſel to Expiate her Death with Turnaments. There was an Harpalice that was deſperately in Love with ‡ Iphiclus, and that Died with the regret of finding her ſelf ſlighted by him. HARPALUS, a Grecian Aſtronomer, Corrected the Cycle of Cleoſtratus by an other Cycle which needed to be Corrected. 'Twas Meton that Corrected the New Cycle to me, for I can't conceive that Solinus had any Intereſt to ſhew, that Hanno preceded that Xenophon. And I can ſtill leſs comprehend why, if Xenophon was after this Carthaginian, it had been impoſſible for him to cite him, as Salmaſius's Interrogation ſuppoſes. I think it probable enough, that Solinus had reduc'd Pliny's two Citations into one, by a Spirit of Confuſion peculiar to him; but I will not venture to affirm, that Xenophon of Lampſacus has not ſaid all that he aſcribes to him. You'll ſay, that if this were ſo, Pliny would not have cited two Writers, but would have been content with Xenophon's Teſtimony. I anſwer, that's a miſtake: Order requires, that as for thoſe things that Hanno is known to have ſaid himſelf, he ſhould be quoted preferrably to thoſe that declare he has ſaid them.

(h) Iſaac Voſſius ubi ſupra p. 302. 303.

Iſaac Voſſius is very far from his Father's Opinion; for inſtead of ſaying, that our Hanno lived in the time of Agathocles (h) he makes him elder than Homer and Heſiod. He was not content to make him the Leader of the Expedition (i) the Phenicians made a little after the Ruin of Troy; he found afterwards, that this would not allow him Antiquity enough: He therefore ſuppos'd in another Work (k) that Hanno and Perſeus liv'd in the ſame time. Mr. Dodwell has learnedly and ſolidly confuted this Pretenſion, and all the Proofs brought to ſupport it. He makes a good Uſe of the Paſſage of Pliny's Second Book, wherein it is remark'd, that Himilco and Hanno undertook long Voyages. (l) Et Hanno, Carthaginis potentia florente, circumvectus à Gadibus ad finem Arabiæ, navigationem eam prodidit ſcripto: ſicut ad extera Europæ noſcenda miſſus eodem tempore Himilco. We find, that in the Carthaginian War with Agathocles, they had two Generals (m) one call'd Hanno, and the other Himilco. We may moreover very probably ſuppoſe, that this flouriſhing State of the Carthaginians, mention'd by Pliny, preceded their firſt War with the Romans: for during this War, it is not likely they thought of diſcovering new Countries, and 'tis well known they concluded this War to their great Prejudice. Wherefore theſe two Chronological Characters of Pliny, lead us to ſuppoſe, that he ſpeaks of a Hanno that flouriſh'd in the time of Agathocles. You'll find in Mr. Dodwell (n) a fine Collection of Obſervations, that may convince us, that Hanno is to be plac'd betwixt the 92d, and 120th Olympiad.

(A) She kill'd her younger Brother.] Hyginus (o) ſays ſhe kill'd her own Son which ſhe had by Clymenus, and he adds that ſhe made her Father Eat him, who when he knew it kill'd her. In the 206 Chapter of this Author the word filiam ought to be Corrected filium, agreeably to what he ſays in the 238. and 239. and 246. Chapter. Beſides this difference, I find another betwixt him and Parthenius. The latter ſays that Harpalyce's Father was the Son of Teleus, and that he lived at Argos: The former (p) makes him Son of Schæneus and King of Arcadia. But whereas in the 238 Chapter he makes him the Son of Oeneus, we may be certain that inſtead of Schæneus, it ought every where to be read Oeneus; for we learn from Apollodorus (q) and Antoninus Liberalis (r), that Oeneus had a Son named Clymenus.

(B) She was chang'd into a Bird.] There Reign two great faults in the fabulous Inventions of the Ancient Greeks; one is, that they have not ſufficiently diverſified the Capital Incidents; the other is, that they have not been able to obſerve any kind of Uniformity in the Circumſtances. You'll ſcarce find two Authors who treating of the ſame Fact, are agreed about the Qualities and Names of Perſons, eſpecially about Times and Places. If they meant by that means to make oſtentation of their abundance, they were miſtaken; the Barrenneſs of the Principal is difficultly repair'd by diverſified Acceſſories. Parthenius's Euphorion ſeems at firſt ſight to give us ſomething new: But take notice, it is only Tereus removed to another Scene with ſome Changes of the Actors.

(C) Another Cycle which needed to be Corrected.] Cleoſtratus's Cycle was call'd Octaeteris; It contain'd eight Years, at the end whereof the Sun and Moon return'd to the ſame Point. Harpalus finding that to be a miſtake invented a Cycle of nine Years.

Meton finding that the Cycle of nine Years had ſucceeded no better than the reſt, intended the Cycle of 19 Years. This Cycle was ſtuck to, as Feſtus Avienus

Cycle of Harpalus in the 4*th* Year of the 86*th* Olympiad. Cleostratus discover'd the Signs of the Zodiack, after Anaximander had found out in the 58*th* Olympiad the Obliquity of that Circle. Judge by this of the time of Harpalus. What Alvari says is not true, that Diodorus Siculus makes mention of Harpalus. There is a great Confusion in (D) Vossius upon all this.

HARPALUS, a Macedonian * Lord and one of Alexander's Captains, Ruin'd himself by his prodigious Expences. He took the part of Alexander during the differences that arose betwixt that Prince and his Father Philip, and was disgrac'd on that account ‡. But when Philip was Dead, Alexander recall'd Harpalus and shew'd him an extraordinary Friendship; I believe that he gave him the Government of (A) Cilicia. As for that of Babylon, it is most certain he gave it him †, together with the Office of High-Treasurer. Harpalus imagining the King his Master would never return from his Expedition to the Indies, committed infinite Mismanagements, in order to support the excessive Expences of his Bed and Table. He plunged himself into all sorts of Pleasures, and (B) denied nothing to his Mistresses. Many other Governours fancying, as he did, that Alexander would never be in a Capacity of calling them to an account for their Extortions, had been Guilty of innumerable Acts of Injustice. The first thing Alexander did upon his Return from the Indies, was to Punish very severely some of these Governours. Which gave grounds to Harpalus to apprehend the same Treatment; so that to prevent it he Fled into Greece with immense Sums, which he took from the Royal Treasury which he had in Charge. He Levied also six thousand Men, which he Landed at Tænarum in the Lacedemonian Territories; from whence he went to Athens to try to engage them in a War against Alexander †. He gain'd some Orators to his side by his Money ‡; as knowing there is not a more potent instrument than the Tongue of this sort of Men to disturb the publick Tranquillity, and to excite the Populace to take up Arms. But as he knew on the one Hand what Power they have over the People, he was not Ignorant on the other, what Slaves they themselves are to a good Sum of Money. Wherefore finding himself well provided with Gold and Silver, he hop'd to bring (D) Confusion in Vossius.] I. After he had said in his (e) Thesis that Aleton Publish'd the Enneadecaeteris in the 1*st* Year of the 87. Olympiad, or in the Year before, he says in his Commentary upon his Thesis, that Diodorus Siculus speaks of this under the 3*d* Year of the 86. Olympiad. Is not this to produce a famous Evidence against his own Calculation? Is this very prudently done? This is the part of an honest Man, you'll say. I'll own it is, provided Diodorus made use of that Chronology: But it is certain that he places the Cycle of 19 Years in the last Year of the 86. Olympiad. II. He quotes Pliny Book 2. Chap. 12. Concerning Cleostratus, whereas he should have quoted the 8. Chap. III. He says that the Octaeteris of Cleostratus comprehended 2090. Years and 22. 'Tis plain that the Printer has confounded the Numbers, but the word annorum is doubtless a mistake in the Author: Change then these words, introduxit octaeterida quæ erat annorum CIↃ CIↃ XC XXII. into these, introduxit octaeterida quæ erat dierum CIↃ CIↃ CMXXII. For this Cycle contain'd 2922. Days. IV. He quotes the 12*th* Book of Diodorus Siculus concerning the Octaeteris. I have not found that word in it. V. This Phrase hanc octaeteride desiderandum est rationem ab Harpalo commissum, is ill express'd, as signifying quite contrary to what it is design'd for. There is no Reader but would believe Harpalus was deceiv'd in making that Cycle: and yet the meaning of Vossius is to let us know that Harpalus discover'd the fault which the author of the Cycle had committed. VI. He should not have said that instead of the Octaeteris of Cleostratus, the Octaeteris of Harpalus was made use of: For Avienus's Verses which Vossius immediately quotes, shew plainly that the invention of Harpalus was a Cycle of 9 Years.

(e) De Scient. Mathem. n. 150. vol.

(A) I believe that he gave him the Government of Cilicia.] I ground my Conjecture upon what Athenæus says (f) that Harpalus having lost his Mistress, caus'd another to come from Athens, and Lodg'd her in the Royal Palace of Tarsus. There she was ador'd by every Body and titled Queen. And all those that Crown'd Harpalus had Orders to Crown her also? This supposes that Harpalus lived at Tarsus with all sort of Authority. Now Tarsus was the principal (g) Town in Cilicia? I stand not upon the passage of Athenæus (h) where 'tis said that Harpalus erected a Brazen Statue to his Mistress Glycera in Tarsus a Town of Syria [illegible]. I doubt not but that Passage is corrupted: For besides that there was not in Syria any Royal or considerable Town that was named Tarsus, we find in the 586 Page of Athenæus, that the [illegible] cera was erected in Rossus, [illegible]. We see in the Margin of the 595. Page opposite to the place of the Text, where it is Printed [illegible]. That other Manuscripts have it [illegible] Athenæus quotes the same Author, viz. Theopompus in both these Passages; which shews that the Transcribers have confounded the name of the Town where that Statue was.

(B) Denied nothing to his Mistresses.] If any thing could ruin the conjecture I have advanced in the preceding Remark, it would be the Description that Diodorus Siculus has left us, of the Luxury Harpalus wallow'd in during Alexander's abode in the Indies. Whereby it appears that Harpalus gave himself up to the Debauching of Women, and other more abominable Pollutions; that he order'd great quantities of Fish to be brought from the Red Sea; that his ordinary Expences were Extravagant: and besides that he sent for a famous Courtezan from Athens nam'd Pythonice; that he made her presents of an ineffable Value; that when she was Dead he built her a noble Sepulcher, and sent for another Celebrated Courtezan named Glycera, from the same Country, with whom he lived in so Riotous a Voluptuousness as cannot be describ'd. All this happen'd, according to Diodorus Siculus, whilst Harpalus was Governour of Babylon, and High Treasurer, and whilst Alexander was taken up with his Indian Expedition. You'll say then I was in the wrong to mention his Government of Cilicia. It would be a strong objection, if there was not room to believe that Diodorus, in imitation of those who compose a general History, has too much huddled together particular Events, and too much neglected the distinction of times. The Authors, whom Athenæus quotes, are more credible than Diodorus; for they have treated particularly of the Debaucheries of Harpalus. It's presum'd therefore they have better deserved the Circumstances of them than Diodorus, who has only spoken of Harpalus in general, and who has not given the particular incidents with the greatest Exactness imaginable. That's the method of a General History. But what say Athenæus's Authors? Why, that after the Death of Pythonice whom Harpalus passionately loved, he sent for Glycera, and introduced her to the Royal Palace at Tarsus, causing the People to adore her, and treat her as a Queen. (a) [illegible] Alio profectarum regna qui Tarsi fuit [illegible], ut alio trahent omnes regnam fabricent, &c. If he had been Governour of Babylon when he sent for Glycera, he had conducted her to the Palace of Babylon, and at Babylon it must have been that he had order'd the Honours of Worship to be paid and the Title of Queen bring over the City of Athens to his intereſt. But he was deceiv'd; Phocion was (C) not to be Corrupted; beſides, * the Letters of Antipater Governour of Macedonia and thoſe of Olympias the Mother of Alexander kept the Athenians in reſpect. This oblig'd Harpalus to ſeek (D) another Refuge. He return'd to Tenarum where he had left his Troops, and paſs'd over from thence to Crete. But he was not there long before one of his Friends (E) Treacherouſly Kill'd him ‡. Moreri's Supplement is faulty in that particular, as I ſhall make appear †. Alexander was ſo firmly perſwaded that Harpalus was an honeſt Man, that he caus'd thoſe who brought the firſt News of his Flight, to be put in Chains as falſe Accuſers *. The news he receiv'd that, that Traytor was expell'd to be given her. He did this at Taſus, therefore he was Governour of Cilicia, when Pythionice Died, and when Glycera ſupplied her place. Therefore Diodorus is miſtaken in the Circumſtances of Time, ſince he ſuppoſes that Harpalus's Amours with Pythionice and afterwards with Glycera ſucceeded the time of Harpalus's being made Governour of Babylon, and Alexander's Expedition to the Indies. Let not the Sepulcher which Harpalus order'd to be Built for Pythionice in Babylon be objected to me; For that does not prove ſhe Died after his being preferr'd to the Government of Babylon. I know not whether we ought to reckon amongſt the inſtances of this Governour's Prodigality, the care he took to have all ſorts of Plants brought from Greece for the Ornament of the Gardens, and Walks of (c) Babylon; for if we may believe Theophraſtus (d), he did it by Alexander's Order. If Scaliger had concluded from thence that Harpalus was Surveyor of the Royal Gardens and Orchards at Babylon, he could be blamed but for one thing; but he ſays that Plutarch aſcribes that imployment to him; he has therefore made two falſe ſteps. 1. He did not well remember that Harpalus was Governour of the Province of Babylon, and that therefore the Surveyſing of the Gardens was not his principal Office, but a ſmall dependance upon his great imploy. 2. It's falſe that Plutarch ſays what he imputes to him.

(C) Phocion was not to be Corrupted.] He it was that Harpalus aim'd principally to gain. To the other Orators that he ſaw come over to him, he gave but very moderate Gratuities; but he offer'd Phocion 700 Talents, and would have made him the abſolute manager of his affairs. (f) Τὸν δὲ Φωκίωνα μόνον ἐπὶ τῷ ξενισμῷ προσεκαλέσατο, καὶ τοσαῦτα ἐπηγγείλατο δώσειν ὅσα οὐδεὶς ἄλλος ἐδεξιώσατο πώποτε. Concionalium hirudinum fuit certatim concurſatio operas ſuas ei venditantium. Medicam his ille ex multis obtulit & objecit eſcam, Phocioni vero per internuncios ſeptingenta talenta obtulit. Phocion repuls'd him, and let him know that he would make him repent of his intriguing, if he went on to corrupt the Inhabitants. Hereupon Harpalus acted with more reſerve. He experienc'd that all thoſe Mercenary Tongues he had gain'd, op'os'd him openly, in order to remove all ſuſpicions, and that Phocion who had receiv'd nothing of him, was the leſs his Adverſary. This put him upon contriving new motives and temptations to gain him; but he found him impenetrable on every ſide. Charicles, Phocion's Son-in-Law, could not imitate his integrity, but render'd himſelf ſo ſuſpected that his Father-in-Law refus'd to aſſiſt him when accus'd in open Court of Correſpondence with Harpalus (g). As for Demoſthenes he us'd Harpalus in a moſt diſingenuous manner; for when he had taken large ſums to ſpeak for him, and came to the Bar, he appear'd in the Aſſembly with his Throat muffled up, and complain'd he had a ſore Throat which depriv'd him of the uſe of Speech (h). Which occaſioned a Jeſt upon him, which was made in alluſion to the Squincy (i) Οἱ δὲ εἶπόντες χαριέστερον ἢ ὑπὲρ συνάγχης ἔφασαν ἐσπουδάκεναι αὐτὸν, ἀλλ' ὑπὲρ ἀργυράγχης. Ibi homines faceti cavillantes non anginâ dixerunt, ſed argentangina oratorem nocte correptum. But he did not come off ſo cheap; for his tampering and Engagements with Harpalus were the cauſe of his Baniſhment (k). Note that Pauſanias believes him innocent (l). Harpalus and his Concubine Glycera, order'd great quantities of Wheat to be diſtributed in Athens. Which was one of the things for which he was Ridiculed in a Comedy that was Acted on the Banks of Hydaſpes, which ſome will have Alexander himſelf to be the Author of. 'Tis obſervable that after the Death of Harpalus, a Daughter he had by Pythionice was taken home by Phocion, and Educated with all poſſible care both by himſelf and his Son-in-Law Charicles. (n)

(D) This oblig'd Harpalus to ſeek another Refuge.] He receiv'd orders to depart from Athens as we learn from (o) Plutarch and Quintus Curtius (p). I believe the cauſe was pleaded with great Solemnity: For Pollux quotes an Oration of Hyperides ἐπὶ Ἁρπάλῳ. I will not take notice of Dinarchus's Oration, entitled Κατὰ τῆς μὴ ἐνδόσεως Ἁρπάλου Ἀλλεξάνδρῳ, because it's thought ſuppoſititious. 'Tis however certain that that Orator actually pleaded in that cauſe: there were five of his Orations ἐπὶ Ἁρπάλῳ (q). That Tryal had great Conſequences; for after Harpalus's Departure was reſolv'd upon in Athens, they were inform'd againſt, who had ſuffer'd themſelves to be brib'd by him. If he had not found ſuch as would be corrupted by his preſents, he had been deliver'd up to Alexander (r). One of that Prince's (ſ) Friends earneſtly ſollicited the Athenians that Harpalus might be given up, and having not obtain'd it, he ſhew'd them ſome time after to whom it was Harpalus had given Money and how much. He found that in the Papers of Harpalus's Steward. (t)

LET us here place ſome critical Obſervations upon the Article of Philoxenus in the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary. The Author of that Article aſſures us that Philoxenus a Macedonian Captain, took Harpalus in Candia, who had rob'd Alexander's Exchequer, that he diſcover'd all thoſe to whom Harpalus had intruſted this Treaſure in Athens: that he ſent a Liſt of them to the Magiſtrates, to retrieve the Money out of their Hands, and to cauſe them to be Puniſh'd: But that he would not name Demoſthenes, though he had ſome difference with that famous Orator preferring on that occaſion, the eſteem he had for his Eloquence to his own reſentment. Pauſanias is quoted for this. I find five faults in it. I. It is falſe that Philoxenus took Harpalus either in Crete or in any other place. He only took his Steward who had (a) eſcaped to the Iſle of Rhodes. The Author I animadvert upon, does not mention it. Let that omiſſion be his II. Fault. III. Harpalus did not truſt his treaſure in Athens, he only diſtributed ſome Sums to gain ſome People to his Intereſt. IV. The Liſt which Philoxenus ſent to the Magiſtrates did not contain the Names of the pretended Truſtees of this Treaſure, but the Names of thoſe whom Harpalus had brib'd. V. Pauſanias (b) does not ſay that Philoxenus had a deſire to retrieve that Money. VI. And ſo far is he from ſaying that this Macedonian ſuppreſs'd his reſentment in reſpect to Demoſthenes's Eloquence, that he manifeſtly ſuppoſes that Orator would have appear'd in Philoxenus's Catalogue, if his name had been found in the Papers of Harpalus's Steward. Pauſanias Argues thus: If Demoſthenes had receiv'd any Bribe from Harpalus, he had been diſcover'd in the Papers of his Steward: And if he had been diſcover'd Philoxenus would have named him in the Catalogue he ſent to the Athenians: For he had particular Quarrels with Demoſthenes, and he knew that Alexander was to the laſt degree inrag'd againſt that famous Orator. But he makes no mention of Demoſthenes in imparting to the Athenians the Names of thoſe whom Harpalus had corrupted, and the particular Sums they had receiv'd. We muſt therefore conclude that Demoſthenes was guiltleſs. Who will truſt after this to ſuch Dictionary-makers? Who won't rather deplore the Fate of innumerable Readers, who have honeſtly believ'd that Pauſanias gives us here an Example of a very ſignal generoſity, a Man ſo full of admiration for Demoſthenes, his Enemy, that he ſtifles his reſentment in his behalf, when he has the moſt favourable opportunity of Revenge. So great is the force of Eloquence! Will the young Declamers Cry-out, who ſhall ſeek their Materials in this new Polyanthea, (c)

He was call'd Thimbron, as Diodorus Siculus says, and he was of Lacedemon, as Arrian informs us. He seiz'd upon all the Effects of Harpalus. (F) Broke the Measures he had concerted.] This we are taught by Quintus Curtius. His cognitis, says he, Rex Harpalo Athenienſibuſq; juxta infeſtus claſſem parari jubet; Athenas protinus petiturus. Quod conſilium dum agitat, clam literæ ei redduntur, Harpalum intraſſe quidem Athenas, pecunia conciliaſſe ſibi principum animos, nec conſilio plebis habito, juſſum urbe excedere, ad Græcos milites perveniſſe, à quibus interceptum & trucidatum à quodam viatore per inſidias. His lectis in Europam trajiciendi conſilium omiſit (g). A Man must be stupid, not to perceive, that there is a great Gap betwixt the 1st and 2d Chapters of the 10th Book of Quintus Curtius. For is there any Historian so void of common Sense, as to speak of Harpalus in the manner Quintus Curtius does in the foregoing Passage, unless he had prefatorily explain'd, who that Person was, and what was the Enterprize he had formed? There is no need of saying more upon it. If any one is not sensible of it, he is not capable of comprehending the Reasons I should alledge to prove it.

(H) The Sepulcher which Harpalus erected.] He had been at incredible Expences for Pythionice, whilst she lived, and he was not at less to bury her. The Funeral was solemniz'd with the most exquisite Consorts in the World. Whatever was fine in Musick, either Vocal or Instrumental, contributed to it. (1.) He erected to her Memory, two Stately Monuments, one at Babylon, the other near Athens. The Expence was above 200 Talents. He consecrated a Temple and a Grove to her, under the Name of Venus Pythonice (k). The Tomb that he caus'd to be built in Attica, in the way to Eleusis, exceeded all that were near it. One would have taken it for that of one of the greatest Men that had lived in Athens. What surprize then must it be to Strangers to understand, it was erected to a Strumpet? What Judgment would they pass upon the Athenians? 'Tis Dicæarchus's (l) Reflection. An Author, who was well vers'd in these Matters, assures us, that Pythionice's Tomb in the Eleusian way, was the finest of all the ancient Monuments that were to be seen in Greece. Τὸ μνῆμα ἀπέβαινε κάλλιστον πάντων ὅσα τότε Ἑλλὰς εἶχεν ἀρχαῖα, οὐχὶ μᾶλλον ἑταίρας. Ut mortuæ monumentum poſſuerint omnium quæ in Græcia veterum operum quod ſpectetur dignißimum (m). 'Tis also true, that Harpalus's Intentions were not faithfully executed. The whole Sum that he appointed for it, was not laid out upon that Monument. Charocles, Phocion's Son-in-Law, undertook the supervising of that Work, at the Request of Harpalus, and did not lay out upon it the Thirty Talents deposited in his Hand. He disgrac'd himself two Ways: 1. In taking upon him the Direction of a Monument design'd for a Whore; 2. In appropriating to himself part of the Money deposited with him. Μνημεῖον δὲ χρημάτων πολλῶν ἐπιδεὲς ἐπιτάξας ποιῆσαι τῇ Ἑταίρᾳ τὴν ἐπιμέλειαν. ἔσχε δὲ τὴν ἀπορρίπτου ταύτην χρείαν προσαγόμενος ὁ Φωκίων ἐπιτήδειος. ἔκτισε γὰρ τὸν ἐν Ἑρμείᾳ, ἢ βαδίζουσιν ἐξ ἄστεως εἰς Ἐλευσῖνα, μάλιστα τῶν περικλεῶν καλούντων ἄξιον, ὅτα τῇ Ἁρπάλῳ λογίζονται χαλεὶ εἰς τὸ ἔργον ὑπὸ τοῦ Χαροκλέους. Quum Harpalus monumentum ſumptuoſum locare vellet faciendum, ejus rei demandavit Charicli curam. Extat enim & hac ætate in Hermia, qua Athenis Eleuſina itur, neque in eo exigenda talenta, quantam ſummam expenſam tuliſſe in id opus Harpalo autumant Charicles, comparent (n). Pausanias confesses, that he knows nothing, either of the Country or Family of Pythionice, but only that she exercis'd the Calling of a Woman of Pleasure at Athens and Corinth. Athenæus knew a little more of her. He says, she had been a Servant of Bacchis a Piper, and that afterwards she listed herself under a Bawd of Thrace, who lived at Ægina, and that she follow'd her to Athens, whither she removed her Brother's House, so that Pythionice was a triple Slave, and a triple Prostitute; ὥστε τρὶς ἂν ἑταίρα γεγονέναι τὴν ἐκ τριῶν πραγμάτων, Ut non ſolum ter mancipium, ſed etiam ter ſcortum fuerit (o).

(I) Complaint against Providence reſpects our Harpalus.] The Words of Cicero are these (p) Diogenes quidem Cynicus dicere ſolebat, Harpalum qui temporibus illis prædo felix habebatur contra Deos teſtimonium dicere, quod in illa fortuna tam diu viveret. I am of Menage's Opinion. The Harpalus of Cicero, the Scipalus (q) of Diogenes Laertius, and the Scopalus of Suidas (r) seem to me to be one and the same Man. But the two latter were a famous Pirate, who took Diogenes the Cynick, and sold him. I believe then that the Harpalus of Cicero was a Pirate and not a Captain of Alexander the Great. The Character Cicero has given of Harpalus, by no means agrees with Alexander's Captain. The Harpalus of Cicero was a famous Pirate, as well known for the good Luck that accompanied his Piracies, as for his Piracies themselves: His long Prosperity was well known, as appears from the Consequence Diogenes drew from it; since a Man would render himself ridiculous that should argue in that manner, in a Town where the Successes of a Pirate had not made a Noise above Four or Five Years. Add to this, that there is nothing tempts a Man more to make murmuring Reflections upon Providence, for the Prosperity of the wicked, than the seeing one self miserable by reason of their Prosperity. If therefore there was any Robber that could draw from Diogenes's Mouth the Complaint which Cicero relates, 'twas doubtless he that made Diogenes his Slave. But since he became a Slave to a Pirate, and not to the Governour of Babylon, we must conclude, that the Testimony which he thought might be produc'd against the Existence of the Gods, was the Pirate who had taken him Captive.

'Tis to little purpose therefore, that Father Lescalopier represents to his Readers, that Harpalus, the Governour of (b) Babylon, continued not long unpunish'd, after he had carried off the Treasures of the King his Master. 'Tis in vain he shews, that this Robber fell from one Misfortune into another, and that he was miserably kill'd at the end of the Year. He does but reason against himself. The farther he advances towards his Design, the farther he deviates from his Subject. The Question is concerning a Robber, who had been a long time fortunate: This is the Objection; and here you alledge to us a Robber that was punish'd almost upon the Spot. This is not to answer; 'tis rather to labour unwarily to make of an inconsiderable Difficulty, a Rock of Offence for the Simple, who will be scandalized to see a profane Objection answer'd by overturning the whole State of the Question. And then is not this Conclusion of the Father Jesuit very edifying? Omitte Harpalum, fume Diogenem: ne quærere quod regiæ pecuniæ prædo unum annum vivat in ſua fortuna: quærere quod prædo divinæ providentiæ in ſua impietate longam vitam vivat: ſed neque id certe conquerendum eſt, nam longa vita miſerrimi canis omnibus infeſti, omnibus exoſi, longum ſupplicium fuit, longius tamen ſupplicii breve præludium (c).

HARRAVAD (Isaac Ben) a noted Rabbin towards the end of the 12th. Century. He has written ſomething, but we know not truly what it is. There are two wonderful Qualities aſcrib'd to him: one is, that he could diſcover by Peoples Faces, whether their Soul was tranſmitted from another Body, or began to exiſt at the Moment of its Union with their own; the other, that though he was blind, he certainly diſtinguiſh'd by the Smell, whether a Man were alive or not. * The Criticiſms of Father Bartolocci are ſomewhat dull on that occaſion (A).

HARTUNGUS (John) born at † Miltemberg in the Year 1505, ſtudied firſt in his own Country, and afterwards in the Univerſity of Heidelberg. He afterwards took Arms, which he bore in Hungary againſt the Turks, but ſometime after he ſet himſelf again to the gentle Service of the Muſes, and became Profeſſor of the Greek Tongue in the Univerſity of Heidelberg. He acquitted himſelf gloriouſly of that Profeſſion Fifteen Years together; nor would he have reſign'd it, had not the Proteſtant Religion been eſtabliſh'd in the Palatinate, in the Year 1546. That Change obliged him to ſeek another Employ; and he found one at Friburg in Briſgaw, with which he was ſo well contented, that he kept it as long as he lived. He held an Honourable Rank amongſt the Profeſſors at Friburg, and had many Scholars. He read Lectures upon Homer, and ſome other Poets, and he compos'd Books reputably good (B). He died in the ſame Town the 16th. of June, 1579, after a Philological Profeſſorſhip of 33 Years. The Epitaph he made for himſelf, teſtifies, that in the Inſtruction of Youth, he both ſuffer'd and learnt a great deal ‡.

HEBEDJESU, Patriarch of the Neſtorians, reunited to the Church of Rome, under Pius IV. in 1562. Since the printing of the Article Abdiſſi, I have obſerved in a very curious † Work, that after the Death of (A) Simon Julacha, a Monk of the Order of St. Pachome, who had been created Patriarch of the Neſtorians by Julius III. "Abdiſu, or, to retain the Chaldee Pronunciation, Hebedjeſu was made Patriarch in his "Room (K) There is a Fault in Euſebius.] He ſays under the 3d. Year of the 113d. Olympiad, that Harpalus fled into Aſia. Harpalus fugit in Aſiam. Scaliger approves of that Chronology. But he corrects Aſiam, by Atticam, and it is certain, that if Euſebius did not ſay Atticam, he ought to have done it. Bongars (d) had corrected it, fugit ex Aſia.

(A) The Criticiſms of Father Bartolocci are ſomewhat dull.] Having quoted theſe Words of Rabbin Rekanati; & licet fuiſſet cæcus, ſenſibiliter percipiebat cum aeris illa ſuiſſet vivus an vero mortuus, he adds, (e) cognoſcebat ergo ex olfactu mira res apud Judæos: qui cum Judæi male olentes inter ſe continuo verſentur, illorum olfaciendi ſenſus videtur depravatus, ut inter cadaveris & latrinarum malum odorem diſtinguere nequeant, ſi prodigium ſit. 'Tis a ſilly piece of Raillery; and one that could reſolve againſt Cavilling and Captiouſneſs, might ſee that the Smell of that Rabbin had ſomething very particular in it, provided he had that Nicety of Senſe as is pretended. For it muſt not be ſuppos'd, the meaning of it is, that he could diſcern that a Man who had been dead ſome Days, was not alive. All blind Men can eaſily do this. But the meaning is, that the Change he perceiv'd in the Air as ſoon as a Man expir'd, gave him certainly to underſtand the Man was dead. Will it not be acknowledg'd, that that Change is imperceptible? Father Bartolocci has cenſur'd another thing. He aſks how that blind Rabbin could know the Age of the Soul, by looking on the Face? That Reflection cannot be ſolid, unleſs the ſame Authors, who have mention'd that Faculty of our Rabbin, have expreſly declar'd, that he was then blind, and that he made uſe of the Inſpection of the Face. Now there is no Appearance of any ſuch Declaration in them. (f) Pius iſte Ben Harravad cognoſcebat ex vultu, utrum anima creata in ipſo actu infuſionis informaretur homo, an vero aliunde ex tranſmigratione animam haberet adventiciam. Theſe Words of Rabbi Rekanati, ſhew indeed, that the other Rabbin knew by the Face, whether Peoples Souls were new, or not; but they don't determine whether he knew this, by looking on the Face, or touching it. Now either of theſe Ways is equally wonderful, and the latter even ſeems to be more difficult than the former. It will be objected to me in favour of Bartolocci, that Rekanati making mention of the other Faculty, obſerves, that Rabbin Harravad was blind; but I ſhall ſtill demand, whether he ſays, that this marvellous Phyſiognomiſt was blind at that time, when he could diſcern whether Souls were in the Place of their Nativity? For if he only meant that Harravad had that Faculty before he grew blind, what will become of the Railleries, Exclamations, and Invectives of Bartolocci? He had Reaſon enough to laugh at thoſe Tales, but it ought to have been upon other Motives. Exactneſs is neceſſary, what ever it be, that is to be confuted.

(B) He compos'd Books.] Some Prolegomena, and Notes upon the Three Firſt Books of the Odyſſey. Chiliades locorum Homericorum: decuriæ (g) locorum quorundam memorabilium (h). He tranſlated Apollonius's Poem upon the Argonauts, into Latin. That Verſion is not in Eſteem. This is the Judgment of a good Critick upon it. (i) Miratus ſum hominem & eruditum, & in Græca præſertim lingua cum laude verſatum ita tranſtuliſſe [Apollonium] ut non paulo facilius ſit Apollonium ſui, hoc eſt Græcâ linguâ aſſequi, quam ea qua eam Hartungus loquentem fecit, latinâ. He immediately ſhews ſome Errors of this Verſion, and lets us know, that he could point out abundance more (k).

(C) The Epitaph he made upon himſelf.] It deſerves to be ſet down here,

Πολλὰ παθὼν, & πολλὰ μαθὼν ἐν παιδοτριβίαις
Ἐνθάδε δὴ νέκυας κεῖμαι ἐγὼ Ἁρτόγγας.

(l) The Latin Verſion of it, which is found in Melchior Adam, is very naught; it no ways anſwers the Author's Intention, which was to ſhew, that his Profeſſorſhip had been a heavy Burden. 'I will not inſert here the other Epitaph which Hartungus made upon himſelf in Greek; it may be ſeen in Melchior Adam. I am ſure that Lorenzo Craſſo would have liſted him among the Greek Poets, if he had known as much as has been here ſaid of him. The Forgetfulneſs of That Italian puts me in mind, that Mr. Baillet has not afforded Hartungus a Place among the Criticks.

(A) Simon Julacha.] It ſhould be written Sulacha, as is done by Aubertus Miræus (a). We need not wonder that the Criticks can collect out of Manuſcripts an Infinity of variæ Lectiones, when printed Books are not exempt from them. The Sieur de Moni gives the Name Caremit, to a Town of Meſopotamia, which Aubertus Miræus calls Charemet. The latter calls him Donha Simon, whom the other Names Denha Simon. The one uſes the Word Zeinalbach, the other had rather ſay, Zeinalbech. They have both drawn from the ſame Fountain, viz. from Peter Strozza's Book de Chaldæorum Dogmatibus: Why therefore don't they agree? Is it eaſier to write Sulacha, than Julacha, Donha, than Denha? Mr. Arnaud from the ſame Original ſays (b) that Simon Sulacha eſtabliſh'd his See at Caramit. Mr. Claude (c) makes uſe of the Word Sulak. Father Paul, at the beginning of his Fifth Book (d) ſays, One Simon Sultakam. Mr. Amelot makes no Correction here. He obſerves, that this Hebedjeſu had compos'd ſeveral Books in Defence of " the Religion of the Neſtorians; but that coming to Rome in Julius III's Pontificate, " he abjur'd Neſtorianiſm. 'Tis he that is ſpoken of in the Life of Pius IV. in whoſe " time he made a (C) ſecond Voyage to Rome, to obtain the Confirmation of his Patri- " archate; and he aſſiſted (D) at the Council of Trent. As he was a Man of Parts, " he had the Dexterity to bring over a great Number of Neſtorians to the Church of " Rome. But his Succeſſors could not retain them in it, having neither his Capacity, " nor his Addreſs. Abathalla, who was alſo a Monk of St. Pachome, ſucceeded " Hebedjeſu, and living but a little while, had Denha Simon for his Succeſſor, who was " before Arch-Biſhop of Gelu. But he was oblig'd to leave Carenit (E), and to retire " into the Province of Zeinalbech, at the Extremity of Perſia, having been forc'd " to ſubmit to the Power of the Patriarch of Babylon. His Succeſſor, whoſe Name al- " ſo was Simon, reſided at the ſame Place, which much diminiſh'd the Authority of " this ſecond Patriarch. This is what I have found in this Book. I was of Opinion, when I made the Article of Abdiſſi, that we might rely on the Narrative of Father Paul. But I ought not to paſs over in Silence, what I have ſince obſerv'd in Father Pallavicino, viz. that it is not true, that this Patriarch wrote Letters to the Council. The following Notes will give an Account of the Criticiſms on Father Paul's Narrative (F).

HEGESILOCHUS, was one of thoſe who committed infinite Violences in the Iſle of Rhodes, when its Democratical Government was chang'd into an Ariſtocratical, by the Authority of Mauſolus † King of Caria. Athenæus † has preſerv'd us a Specimen of the Lewdneſs of theſe new Maſters. They debauch'd the Wives of the moſt eminent Citizens, and abus'd many Boys. In fine, they carried their Licentiouſneſs ſo far, as to ſtake the Honour of Women at the Game of Hazard (A). They made it a Rule, that the Loſer ſhould bring the Lady that was plaid for to him that had won her, and ſhould uſe all ſorts of Methods to convey her into his Arms. No Trick or Evaſion was allow'd; Perſwaſions and Violences were to ſucceed one another, according to the Exigence of the Caſe, till the Wager that was plaid for was actually paid. He * that moſt frequently, and moſt impudently put in Practice this new Method of Hazard, was Hegeſilochus. His Drunkenneſs and other Debaucheries, rendred him ſo incapable of Buſineſs, that he loſt his Honour, and was look'd upon by his Friends as an infamous Wretch. This Hegeſilochus ought not to be confounded with one ſputes. Hæ nugæ ſeria ducunt in mala. The Republick of Learning would be better manag'd, if every one had ſuch a Sence of Duty, as to avoid even the leaſt Faults.

(B) A little Syriack Treatiſe of Abdjeſu.] I believe it is the ſame Treatiſe Mr. Arnaud ſpeaks of, when he cites the Notes (e) of Abraham Ecchellenſis a Maronite, upon a Catalogue of Chaldean Books, made by Abdjeſu, or Hebedjeſu, a Neſtorian Biſhop, who came over to the Church of Rome. Some (f) Pages after he touches upon ſome Circumſtances, which deſerve a Place here, as giving us a more particular Account what ſort of Man our Hebedjeſu was. He had formerly been one of the moſt violent Neſtorians (ſays Mr. Arnaud) and written ſeveral Books whilſt he himſelf was in that Error, which he reckons up at the end of the Catalogue of the Chaldean Books he wrote, and which has been tranſlated by Ecchellenſis. It appears by that Catalogue, that the Book entituled Margaritarum, was compoſed by him whilſt he was yet a Neſtorian. The Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary obſerves, (g) that the Catalogue of the Syrian Writers ('tis doubtleſs that whereof Hebedjeſu is the Author) was publiſh'd at Rome, in Syriack, by Hebedjeſu; That there are two Poems compos'd in Syriack, and written with his own Hand, preſerv'd in the Vatican, where he gives the Reaſons of his Reunion, &c. Aubertus Miræus relates (h) that the Picture of that Patriarch was plac'd in the Palace of the Vatican, amongſt the Cardinals and Prelates that accompanied Alexander the Third, when he receiv'd the Submiſſions of the Emperor Frederick at Venice.

(C) A Second Voyage to Rome.] I am ſurpriz'd, that neither Father Paul, nor his Cenſurer, Cardinal Pallavicino, or any one of the many Authors I have conſulted concerning Hebedjeſu, have mention'd his Voyage, which he made to Rome in Julius III's time. It had not been a ſuperfluous nor an uſeleſs Circumſtance; and I am perſwaded, they would not have omitted it, had they known it.

(D) He aſſiſted at the Council of Trent.] I have elſewhere refuted this Falſhood. It ſuffices to add here, that there is no Writer, though never ſo inconſiderable, who ſometimes does not cauſe the greateſt Authors to ſtumble. Peter Strozza, Secretary to Paul V. was very likely nulled by ſome ill Chronicler; and 'tis no doubt upon the Credit of that Secretary, that the Sieur de Mons, and Mr. Arnaud, have publiſhed it, that Hebedjeſu aſſiſted at that Council (i).

(E) To leave Caremit.] This happen'd at (k) the time that Leonard Abel, Biſhop of Sidon, went to the Levant with the Character of Apoſtolick Nuncio. He was a Native of Malta, and underſtood perfectly the Arabian Tongue, which is as it were natural in that Iſland. He died in the Year 1607, or 1606. He compos'd a Work concerning the State of the Oriental Chriſtians, whence Aubertus Miræus, from whom I copy this whole Reflection, confeſſes he has taken many things, which are ſeen in his Notitia Epiſcopatuum. He adds, that this Work of Leonard Abel, is in Manuſcript in the Library of the deceas'd Cardinal Ascanio Colonna, Protector of the Churches of the Eaſt, and that this Library was wonderfully increas'd, by the Addition of the Books of Cardinal William Sirlet.

(F) Criticiſms on Father Paul's Narrative.] That Author relates, that the Letters of Cardinal Amulius were read, (l) who in Quality of Protector of the Oriental Chriſtians, ſent the News to the Council of the Arrival of Abdiſſi ——He related, that the People under this Prelate's Juriſdiction, had been inſtructed in the Faith by St. Thomas and St. Thaddæus, &c. (m) The Hiſtorian adds, that next the Patriarch's Confeſſion of Faith was read, and laſtly, the Letters he addreſs'd to the Council to excuſe himſelf for not being able to come thither, &c. Cardinal Pallavicino (n) tells the Story more at large, and with greater Exactneſs, not confounding what Amulius ſaid by the Pope's Order, with the Conſequences which he drew himſelf from the Narratives of the Neſtorian Prelate. It does not appear, that Father Paul has made that Diſtinction: But his principal Fault lies in his affirming, that Abdiſſi's Letter to the Council was read; Pallavicino (o) maintains, that that Letter never has a being but in the Imagination of Father Paul.

HEIDANUS (Abraham) Divinity Profeſſor at Leyden, was born at Frankenthal, in the Palatinate, the 10th. of Auguſt, 1597. He began his Studies at Amſterdam, whither Caſpar Heidanus his Father was call'd to the Office of the Miniſtry. An Engliſhman, one Matthew Sladus, who was then Rector of the College of Amſterdam, took particular care of Abraham Heidanus, whom he ſaw to be a Youth of promiſing hopes. Daniel Colonius applied himſelf with no leſs Zeal to ſpeed the Progreſs of this his Diſciple, when he was committed to his Inſtruction at Leiden, in the Walloon College. Colonius was none of thoſe (A) fiery Spirits who were for carrying all things to the laſt Extremities, when the Arminian Diſputes began to riſe, which made him ſuſpected, as inclining that way; ſo that there were many Perſons who expreſs'd their diſlike at Gaſpar Heidanus's ſuffering his Son to Study under ſuch a Tutor. But the Temerity of this ſort of Detraction, produc'd a contrary effect to what theſe hot Men aim'd at: The Miniſter of Amſterdam continu'd his Son with Colonius his old Friend, whoſe Orthodoxy he was aſſur'd of: He continued him, I ſay, that he might give his Friend an Authentick Proof of their Agreement in Opinion. This Scholar made good Progreſs under Colonius, not doing as the Generality did, who only ſtuffed their Heads † with the Diſpute about the five Articles of the Remonſtrants. He learn'd that and the reſt: He was made Proponent at the Synod of the Walloon Churches, in the Year 1618. and he preach'd in many French Churches, with great Applauſe of his Auditors. He preach'd alſo in ſome Dutch Churches with the like Succeſs. He travell'd two Years, and ſaw part of Germany and Swiſſerland, France and England. A little after his Return he was promoted to the Miniſtry, and he exercis'd his Function at Naerden, to the Year 1627, when he accepted a Call from the Conſiſtory of Leiden. He was contracted to a Daughter of one of the Principal Merchants in Amſterdam, when he took Poſſeſſion of his new Church, and a little after he celebrated his Marriage. He was a good Preacher, which in Conjunction with other good Qualities, both of Temper and Parts, procur'd him a fair Reputation.

He was fifty Years old, when the Province of Guelderland, having reſolv'd to eſtabliſh an Univerſity at Harderwick, offer'd him the Divinity Profeſſorſhip, upon very advantageous Conditions. The Church of Leiden, to keep him with them, offer'd him either the ſame Advantages, or in general, to giving him an honourable Recompence for his Refuſal. The Curators of the Univerſity, found moreover a better Expedient to prevent his Tranſlation to Guelderland; they gave him the Profeſſorſhip of Divinity, which became vacant by the Death of Conſtantine l'Empereur. He was ſo well ſatisfied at Leiden, that he would not hearken to the Offers which the Elector Palatine made him, with all the Perſwaſives imaginable: And yet that Refuſal did not hinder Age has ſeen in any Country of Europe, a Lewdneſs equal to that of theſe Rhodians. I have heard indeed, that the Footmen of a great Miniſter of State, who has not been many Years dead, us'd to play at Cards or Dice for Captains Commiſſions; but beſides the uncertainty of the thing, it may be reduced to a ſmall matter, viz. that each of theſe Footmen obtain'd for his New-Years Gift the Promiſe that ſuch a Number of Companies ſhould be given at his Recommendation: after which they play'd the whole Fund among them, and when any one loſt a Company, it was no longer in his Power, but the Winner's, to recommend any Body. In all this Diſorder it was ſtill eaſie to hinder the Commiſſions from being given to People unfit for Service. So that this is nothing comparable to the Debauchery of theſe Petty Tyrants at Rhodes, who ſlak'd down at play, the Honour of the choiceſt Virgins, and Wives of the City, and gave no reſpite to the Loſer, till he had deliver'd them their Prey. They were not content to ruine the Honour of the fineſt Women, which is inſeparable, as the World will have it, from that of their Husbands: They ruin'd alſo their own: for the Loſer was under a Neceſſity of turning Procurer. Here was reaſon with a Witneſs, to cry out, O tempora! ô mores!

(B) Ambaſſador——to Rome.] This (a) we learn from Polybius. Geſilochus was the Word in the Manuſcripts; but Fulvius Urſinus (b) having obſerved in Livy (c) that this Rhodian was call'd Hegeſilus, corrected theſe two Authors by one another, and reſtor'd Hegeſilochus to both.

(C) Dignity of their State.] It was called (d) πρυτανεία, and the exerciſing of it was expreſs'd by the Verb πρυτανεύειν. The Latines call'd thoſe who exerciſed that Dignity, Prytanes. Quadraginta navibus autore Hegeſilocho comparatis, Tyſ Livy, qui eum in ſummo magiſtratu eſſet (Prytanem ipſi vocant.)

(A) None of thoſe fiery Spirits——made him ſuſpected.] This is one of the moſt fatal Inconveniencies that attend the Diſputes about Religion. They who either through their natural Temper, or an exact Knowledge of the true Intereſts of the Church, are for healing and uniting Things, and talk not of the Exciſion of corrupted Members, become ſuſpected of Heterodoxy. They of a hot, cholerick, and furious Spirit, thoſe Zealots, who have always at their Tongues end Principiis obſta, and this Maxim, that Evil muſt be ſtifled in its Cradle, cry down the Men of Moderation, and make them odious to the People; and this cauſes many who cannot kindle into Paſſion, to abandon however the ſhew of Moderation: They had rather offer ſome Violence to their Natures and Conſciences, than be regarded as baſe Prevaricators. The hot Men know well enough, that their Calumnies will have that effect, and therefore they ſcatter them might and main, both in Converſation and in the Pulpit, without any Scruple. This is what happen'd at the beginning of the Arminian Diſputes, if we will believe Wittichius. (f) Vigebat, illo tempore ob diſcrepantes de prædeſtinatione ſententias non tantum inter diſſentientes magna contentio quæ animos à ſe invicem alienabat, & diſjungebat, ſed etiam inter eosdem ipſos, & idem de controverſia illa Sentientes obſcura quædam diffidentia, qua locus dabatur ſuſpicionibus quibus alii alios tanquam bona cauſa minus addictos differebant. Qui enim ferventioris erant ingenii, & omnia ſumma tentanda in initiis putabant, ut in herba opprimeretur malum, quoſcunque videbant moderatius & lentius agere, ac de reconciliatione animorum potius laborare ſi vulnus forte poſſet conſolidari, ac ſchiſma, quod ad opera carnis pertinet, evitari, eos tanquam prævaricatores bona cauſæ apud plebem criminabantur. This ſeems to be a faithful Repreſentation. hinder that Prince from making (B) much of him when he paſs'd through Heidelberg in the Year 1656, in the Journey he made to Strasburg with his Family. The Profeſſor Smidius (C) who invited him to a publick Diſputation, and deſired him to diſpute, did not come off honourably from the Opponent: But Heidanus's Victory on that occaſion was not ſo plain as that in (D) the Jeſuits College at Cologne. This learned Man died at Leiden very piouſly, the 15th. of October 1678, having exceeded his 81ſt Year, which of all the Climacterick Years, is look'd upon as the moſt dangerous, and with good reaſon. He left Four Children, two Sons, and two Daughters, Thirteen Grand-Children, and Three Great Grand-Children. He had a great ſhare in Mr. Deſcartes's Friendſhip, and by that means he finiſh'd the Work he had begun, under Fachæus, Philoſophy Profeſſor at Leiden, one of the moſt ſubtle Peripateticks then living. This Fachæus brought the Queſtion concerning Subſtantial Forms into great Repute in the Univerſity (E). The Young Heidanus, excited by the Noiſe it made, examin'd the Objections to the bottom, and compar'd them with the Anſwers of Fachæus. He found, that Philoſophizing upon theſe Principles, was but loſing Time, and he was in hopes, that ſome time or other there would appear a more certain Method*. He thought he had found it in the Converſation and Writings of Deſcartes. But if this was conducible to lead him to the Truth, it was not ſo commodious with Reſpect to his Fortune. For it expos'd him to (F) a thouſand Croſſes and Perſecutions, over which his Panegyriſt Wittichius, who ſupplies me with this Article, thought he ought to draw a Curtain. Heidanus was of a good Family which are wonderfully fruitful. They produce, amongſt other things, as I ſaid juſt now, a great change in thoſe whom Reaſon inſpires with a Spirit of Moderation. They are decried as ſecret Traitors, (g), and there are many to be found, who will not continue reaſonable at that Price, and who believe their Honeſty would coſt them them too dear, if they muſt loſe their Reputation for it; and therefore they turn Perſecutors, to refute the Calumny: (b) Tanto major famæ ſitis eſt, quam virtutis. This was the Conduct of a great many Catholicks in France, who had diſapprov'd the Rigour that was exerciſ'd againſt the Proteſtants under Francis I. and Henry II.

(B) Making much of him.] They who ſhall think it ſtrange in me to give the Particulars, will drop their Cenſure upon Mr. Wittichius, rather than on my ſelf. For there muſt be a greater Privilege to relate theſe things in a Dictionary of Two Volumes in Folio, when one meets with them in a Funeral Oration, than to diſplay them in a Funeral Oration, when they are only taken out of a Memorial in Manuſcript. Let it be how it will, Mr. Wittichius relates, that Abraham Heidanus was invited to Dinner every Day by a new Meſſenger, and he does not forget the Preſents he receiv'd. Dum Heidelbergam appulit, nihil omiſit Sereniſſimus Elector quod non ferventiſſimum erga ipſum ſpiraret affectum. Ad menſam quotidie, novis ſemper miſſis nunciis, invitabat, in colloquiis benevole complectebatur, donabat medio cervo & aliquot leporibus, nunciato hanc omnem eſſe prædam quam illo die cepiſſet; quæcumque in diverſorio cum familia conſumpſerat liberaliſſimè ſolvit, & cum Bacheracum rediiſſet, ad ſuos Leidenſes reverſurus, magno dolio optimi & generoſiſſimi vini Bacheracenſis voluit donatum.

(C) The Profeſſor Smidius——did not come off honourably.] After Heidanus had excus'd himſelf ſeveral times from entring the Liſts, he at laſt gave way to his repeated Civilities, and attacked him upon the Point of Univerſal Grace, which the Lutherans teach: Great was the Attention of the Auditors, and the Succeſs very glorious to the Opponent (a).

(D) Heidanus's Victory——was not ſo plain as that in the Jeſuit's College at Cologne.] If this laſt Victory was eaſier to be obſerved than the foregoing, it was not ſo honourable; for it conſiſted in a Jeſt, to which the Jeſuit, who had ſhewn him whatever was to be ſeen in the College of Cologne, and perhaps was a Lay-Brother, could not anſwer a Word. Heidanus ask'd the Jeſuit, whether Jeſus Chriſt had done and ſuffer'd all that was neceſſary for our Salvation? Yes, ſaid the Jeſuit: Then, reply'd he, you are not his Companions. The Jeſuit, confounded with Shame and Aſtoniſhment, had nothing to ſay for himſelf. Malincrot, Dean of Munſter, who heard this Diſcourſe, and had gain'd (b) Acquaintance with Heidanus, congratulated him upon that Victory, obtain'd, ſaid he, over my Enemies. Wittichius, who alſo heard the Diſcourſe, relates it in this Manner: Accidit ut poſtquam Collegium inſpexerimus Jeſuitarum, & jam in area eramus conſtituti ut patribus valere diceremus, converſus Heidanus ad Jeſuitam qui nos ducebat, ex ipſo egregiè annoſo Jeſu omnia illa quæ ad ſalutem eſſent, ne dicam, eſſe & paſſus fuiſſet? At ille ſatis nihil ſuſpicatus metuens, reſpondiſſet, Omnia: Heidanus regeſſerit: Ergo vos non eſtis Socii Jeſu; atque ille in rubrum dictu & attonito ut ne verbum quidem reſpondere poſſet, diſceſſit noſter & nos cum ipſo, atque patribus valere dixit. Quod Malincrotium tanto affecit gaudio, ut hoc nomine gratias ſolemnes illi egerit, quod ſic Jeſu hoſtes (ita vocabat Jeſuitas) ad incitas ex improviſo redegiſſet. I muſt confeſs, that hitherto I have fought in vain wherein the Jeſt lies. I can't gueſs at what he alluded, or what Rules of Logick he followed.

(E) The Queſtion concerning Subſtantial Forms.] There is no Queſtion in Natural Philoſophy, that is a clearer Proof of the Power of Prejudices than this. They muſt needs darken the Mind with reſpect to the moſt evident Notions, ſince there are ſo many People, who can't ſee the Impoſſibility of extracting a Subſtance from the Boſom of matter, unleſs it was there before, or unleſs it be produc'd by a true Creation. The Peripateticks tell you very coldly, or rather they paſſionately maintain, that Forms do not exiſt in their Subject, and that nevertheleſs they are produc'd by an Action which muſt not be call'd (c) Creation but Eduction. This Opinion would be the moſt monſtrous thing in the World, if it were not a more amazing Prodigy to ſee ſuch a Number of Learned and Ingenious Men, eſpouſe ſtill at this Day, the Doctrine of Subſtantial Forms. Wittichius could not better prepare his Auditors to ſee in Heidanus, a Diſciple of Deſcartes, than in telling them what Heidanus, as yet but a Scholar, judg'd of the Principles of the School, from the inexplicable Confuſion in which Fachæus was involved. (d) Exorſus eſt in Academia quæſtio de formis ſubſtantialibus, earum que ex potentia materiæ productione, quæ miriſice non tantum Auditores, ſed & ipſum defenſorem earum acerrimum Fachæum vexabat & torquebat. Quam cum univerſi diſtinctionum ſuarum panoplia expedire non poſſet, & ad liquidum oſtendere quænam illæ formæ ſubſtantiales eſſent, à materia realiter diſtinctæ & tamen materiales, quænam illa potentia materiæ, an pars ejus quædam converſa in formam, an vero ejus cum producitur tantum ſuſtentaculum, an autem ut ex aſſervo figura ſcamni educitur, ita eodem modo præexiſteret in materia forma; cumque alia plurima ſupereſſent difficultates, nec ullum ſuppeditaretur filum ex hoc labyrintho emergendi, factum eſt ut auditores & perſpiciores diſcipuli, inter quos Heidanus primas obtinebat, de tota hac philoſophandi ratione quam intelligendo aſſequi ſe non poſſe videbant, plane deſperarent.

(F) A Thouſand Croſſes.——] I don't know the Particularities [illegible] Page of his Conſideration, where he relates that he had made himſelf many Enemies, and had been expos'd to horrible Reproaches, for having always been averſe to too rigid Maxims. owed in the Pulpit againſt Perrwigs; he was not of Opinion, that the Remonſtrants ought to be rigorouſly examin'd, who return'd to the Boſom of their ancient Mother. Hereupon he paſs'd for an Enemy to the new Model of Reformation, that was to be introduc'd; all his other Opinions were ſcann'd and ſifted; he was accus'd of being addicted to Deſcartes's Opinions, and of contemning the Lord's-Day. But 'tis better to hear Heidanus himſelf. (a) Æ item illam meam ancipitem duxi, modo tempeſtate, modo exoratus halcyonio, intra & extra nos pluſus adverſarios, hinc hoſtes, inde fratres, nec nunquam mordacis linguæ exceptus flagellis. Fuit, cum ſeſſam in partes chariſſimam hanc noſtram Eccleſiam metu procedimus: tum nobis ſed cum ſapientiam ſimul largitus eſt Deus, ut quidvis pati potius, quam ipſum fermittere, maluerimus: Hinc jam Mysteriarchas, ſed contemtum (ac ſi probroſum hoc nomen foret) ſubimus: Jam ut Cartſii plus ſatis addicti Philoſophiæ; hinc Sabbathi contemptores; inde novæ quæ nugæ quidam Reformationis hoſtes traduci jamus: quæ ſummatoribus trapezitis pluſculum illis ſonare videri, nec Campidoctum bellum indicere, neque de ſucceſſu in comis detonare, neque Eccleſiæ diſciplinam ſtrictiorem exercere, nec Remonſtrantes adhuc tranſeuntes recipere, illius examinare, & quæ ſunt id genus alia. Things were driven ſo high, that he was turn'd out of his Divinity Profeſſorſhip, upon the following Account. The Curators of the Univerſity of Leiden, publiſh'd a Decree the 16th. of January, 1676, forbidding the Profeſſors to treat in any wiſe (b) of certain Propoſitions, that had for ſome time been the Subject of Diſpute, or of Deſcartes's Metaphyſicks. Heidanus acted againſt that Decree, almoſt in the ſame manner as the Janſeniſts did againſt the late Archbiſhop of Paris, who forbade the reading of the New Teſtament of Mons. He animadverted upon it; and pretended to find Nullities and Irregularities in it: He maintain'd, that the Twenty Propoſitions which had been condemn'd, had not been diſcuſs'd in the Univerſity of Leiden, as the Curators affirm'd. He complain'd, that theſe Gentlemen had ſuffer'd themſelves to be impoſed on by unfaithful Extracts, and he made odious Compariſons between the Jeſuits, and the Furniſhers of theſe Extracts; the Jeſuits, I ſay, who had caus'd to be condemn'd Janſenius's Propoſitions, what was not found in his Writings. He made another Compariſon: For he brought in Giles Hunnius, a Lutheran, who from the artificial Extracts out of the Works of John Calvin, pretended to convict him of Judaiſm. Laſtly, he illuſtrated the condemn'd Propoſitions, and try'd to ſhew, that in the Senſe of the Authors they were taken from, they were Orthodox. That Work of Heidanus was printed in Dutch, and afterwards in Latin (c). This offended the Curators to that degree, as to depoſe him. Heidanus's Friends pretended, that nothing could more ſeaſonably happen to him; whilſt his great Age would not ſuffer him to acquire a new Reputation by his Lectures, nor even to ſupport that which he had already gain'd; and beſides that, his Depoſition render'd him more Dear and (d) Venerable to his own Party, and might call an Odium on the adverſe ſide.

(G) Heidanus was of a good Family.] His Great Grandfather, Gerhard vander Heyden, was of Mechlen (e): So was his Grandfather, Gaſpar vander Heyden, who was expell'd his Father's Houſe on the account of Religion. He was Miniſter at Antwerp, from whence he retir'd to Frankfort by reaſon of the Perſecution. Here he found many Refugees, whom the rigid Lutherans would not ſuffer; which oblig'd them to Petition Frederick II. Elector Palatine, for a Place of Retreat. Peter Dathenus was at the head of them. The Elector granted them the Monaſtery of Frankenthal, the Monks being order'd to depart: Theſe Refugees perform'd their Religious Exerciſes in Flemiſh, and by Degrees enlarg'd that Monaſtery into a Town. Dathenus being call'd to Heidelberg, our Gaſpar ſucceeded him as Paſtor of that Church. He was deſign'd to be preſent at the National Synod of Embden, in the Year 1571, and he was choſen Preſident of that Aſſembly. There the Canons of Diſcipline were form'd. A little after, returning to the Palatinate, the Elector appointed him to attend his Son, whom he ſent with ſome Troops to the Aſſiſtance of the Proteſtants in the Low-Countries. Theſe Troops were beaten. Vander Heyden retir'd into Holland, and preſided in the National Synod aſſembled at Dordrecht, 1574. He ſerv'd for ſome time the Church of Middleburg; but then thinking himſelf ſafe under the Benefit of the Pacification of Ghent, he return'd to the Charge of his firſt Flock at Antwerp. When that Town was taken by the Spaniards, he return'd to the Palatinate, and was made Superintendant of the Churches about Bacharac. He was diſpos'd to quit that Imploy, to comply with the Deſires of the Church of Frankenthal, who would have him for their Miniſter again; when he died, leaving an only Son of the ſame Name, Gaſpar who was born in the Year 1566. The latter was firſt Miniſter at Wolmerſheim, afterwards at Frankenthal, and then at Amſterdam, where he died in the Year 1626. He married Claire Vanden Borne, a Daughter of the Baily of Frankenthal, by whom he had Six Sons, and Eight Daughters. Our Abraham Heidanus was one of his Sons (f).

(A) The fineſt Woman of her Age.] There are ſome Authors who (i) have deſcrib'd the Particulars of Helena's Beauty. He that has done it moſt largely, is Conſtantine Manaſſes: He has included in eleven Greek Verſes, a good number of Epithets, repreſenting the corporeal Perfections of this Woman. He does not forget to tell us, that her Beauty owed (k) nothing to Art, and that her Complexion, without the help of Waſhing, had a noble Luſtre. They have aſcrib'd to her Legs neatly made, a little Mouth (l), a long, and very white Neck (m), large Eyes, and a fine Breaſt (n). Brantome furniſhes me with a Paſſage upon that part. Helena, ſays he (o), deſiring once to preſent to the Temple of Diana a handſome Cup, by reaſon of a Vow, employ'd a Goldſmith to make it for her, cauſing him to take the Pattern from one of her handſome Breaſts, and to make it of White Gold. In which it was hard to tell which was moſt to be admir'd, the Cup, or the Reſemblance of the Breaſt, which appear'd ſo pretty, and ſo like, that the Artificial one could not but create a deſire for the Natural. Pliny ſays this with great Admiration, and is very particular, where he diſcourſes that there is white Gold, which is very ſtrange, and that this Cup was made of it——He that would make Golden Cups by the great Udders of ſome Women, had need furniſh the Goldſmith with a great deal of Gold, and would not eſcape afterwards the Laughter of the World, when it ſhould be ſaid, Behold here Cups modell'd by the Breaſts of ſuch and ſuch Ladies. Theſe, inſtead of being like Cups, would reſemble your round Wooden Pails the Hogs are ſerv'd with, and the Nipple would imitate a rotten Cherry. Brantome is miſtaken in two Things; for Helena did not conſecrate that Bowl to the Temple of Diana; nor is it true that Plin. ſays, it was made of white Gold. Minervæ templum habet Lindos inſulæ Rhodiorum in quo Helena ſacravit calicem ex electro. Adjecit hiſtoria mammæ ſuæ menſuram. Theſe are Pliny's Words in the 4th. Chapter of the 33d. Book.

But to return to Helena, I ſay that the Deſcriptions which have been made of her Beauty, don't give a comparable Idea to what we form in reading a Line of the Iliad, which has nothing of a Deſcription in it. Homer is content to make the Councellors of Priamus unhappy Adventures. There (AΔ) are ſome Authors, who have been ſo particular in deſcribing the Perfections of her Body, that they can by no means be excus'd, tho' they ſhould ſay in expreſs Terms, they only did it by way of Amuſement. She was courted by a great Number of Princes, and as her Father did not know what courſe to take, for fear of provoking thoſe that ſhould not obtain her; he was taught by Ulyſſes a very good Expedient, † which was to make all the Rivals ſwear they would approve the Choice he ſhould make of a Son-in-Law, and that they ſhould be ready to aſſiſt him againſt all Pretenders that would go about to diſturb his Daughter's Marriage: Tyndarus (B) thereupon diſpos'd of her to Menelaus. She had already been ſtole away by Theſeus; but it was honeſtly believ'd upon her Word, that ſhe diſinga'd her ſelf from that Affair (C), without the loſs of her Virginity. And yet there was nothing of Truth in it: Theſeus did not part with her, without ſo much Familiarity as to get her with Child, of which ſhe lay in at her Siſter's *. The thing was kept ſecret, becauſe her Siſter own'd the Child ‡ as hers †. The common Fate of young Women when they are ſtolen thus, is to change their Condition, whether they own it or deny it. The Handſomer they are, the more credible it is they have ſubmitted to that Law. One Romance-

(A) There are ſome Authors who have been ſo particular.] A Religious of Spain obſerves, that the Beauty of this Woman was a Miracle of Nature; and that for a Multitude of Ages, it was a common Proverb, when any one meant to be exceſſive in the Praiſe of a Beauty, to ſay, She is an Helen. He adds, that John Nevizan ſaid, that of the Thirty Accompliſhments which muſt be united to the making a Woman perfectly handſome, not one was wanting in her. (a) Nacio eſta tan aventajada, y enriquecida de hermoſura, que fue un portento, un prodigio, y milagro de naturaleza, quedando deſde aquel tiempo à eſſe, y aun para muchos ſiglos, en proverbio, ſu belleza, y gallardia: de tal ſuerte, que quando queremos ponderar, y encarecer la hermoſura de una muger, dezimos que es una Helena: y en tal lugar la pone, el (b) Nivernienſe, Natal Comite, Bartolome Caſaneo, Juan (c) Nemizano, el qual pone las treynta coſas, que ſe requieren para que una muger ſea perfectiſſima en ſu hermoſura: y dize que las tenia todas ſin faltar ninguna, la hermoſa Helena. I believe he never ſaw the Work of John Nevizan, and he ſpeaks of it only upon the Credit of Chaſſaneuve, who not only quotes it, but alſo repeats the Latin Verſes, wherein are contain'd the Thirty Things, which as is ſaid, conſtitute a perfect Beauty, and which were all found in the Body of Helena. Dicit [illegible] eſſ cuſtodire quæ plurimi amant: (The Chaſſaneuve [illegible] that ſpeaks (d).) *ut ſcitis coliguntur ex dictis Jo. The Fountain-Head to which he reſorts, is a French Writer, whoſe Book has this Title, De la beauté & beauté des Dames. The 18 Verſes he mentions, and which Chaſſaneuve mentions after him, are a Tranſlation out of French, made by Francis [illegible]. Romance-makers (CΔ) have not obſerv'd this, or at leaſt they prefer the noiſe of Adventures, to probability. Every Body knows that Helena was Stole away by Paris the Son of Priamus, and that all Greece reſented the Injury Menelaus had receiv'd. Hence roſe the Trojan War, which has been ſo Celebrated by the Poets. Paris loſing his Life in the laſt Year of that War, his Brother Deiphobus ſupplied his place with Helena. The Grecians barbarouſly Murder'd him the Night that Troy was taken (D): in that that good Woman accompanied (q) Helena even to Troy (r).

Hellanicus makes (ſ) Theſeus to be 50 and Helena ſeven Years of (t) Age at the time of her being Stolen, and yet does not ſcruple to ſay that he deflour'd her. Duris the Samian (v) affirms that Helena was with Child of Iphigenia, when ſhe was recover'd from the Hands of the Raviſher. Pauſanias (w) ſays the ſame thing, and adds that ſhe lay in at Argos, at her Siſter Clytemneſtra's, Agamemnon's Wife, and that ſhe committed her Daughter's Education to her. He ſays that Euphorion, Alexander Pleuronius, and Stesichorus had teſtified in their Poems, that Iphigenia was the Daughter of Theſeus and Helena. The Argians were ſo far of this opinion as to believe that Helena caus'd a Temple to be built to Lucina in their City, after her lying in (x). A great many were impos'd upon on that occaſion. Agamemnon thought Iphigenia was his Daughter, for his Wife told him ſo. Caſtor and Pollux were perſwaded that their Siſter return'd a Maid: For when they queſtion'd her in that nice Particular, ſhe affirm'd that no Man had touch'd her (y). What ſhall we think then of Menelaus, who Married her ſome time after? He honeſtly believ'd he had bedded a pure Virgin, and yet he had Married a Mother.

When I ſaid Helena was queſtion'd by her Brothers, I followed the learn'd Mr. Meziriac (z) who underſtood the Greek in that Senſe: But others perhaps with more reaſon, ſay, Caſtor and Pollux adviſ'd their Siſter to give out that ſhe had preſerv'd her Honour. 'Twas a very wiſe advice, and which might have been well ſpared to Helena as young as ſhe was: ſhe would have boaſted of that advantage, without any one's ſuggeſtion. She declares in Ovid that Theſeus obtain'd only ſome Kiſſes of her by Force; and that ſhe came off clear, abating only her Fear.

Non (aa) tamen è facto fructum tulit ille petitum,
Excepto redii paſſa timore nihil:
Oſcula luctanti tantummodo pauca protervus
Abſtulit: ulterius nil habet ille mei.

She confeſſes however that Theſeus was very young (a). Ovid has obſerv'd a Decorum in making her ſpeak in that manner; nor has he obſerv'd it leſs, in introducing another Woman, who believ'd Helena told a Lye:

Illam (b) de patria Theſeus, (niſi nomine fallor)
Neſcio quis Theſeus, abſtulit ante ſuâ.
A juvene & cupido creditur reddita virgo.
Unde hoc compererim tam bene, quæris? amo.
Vim licet appelles, & culpam nomine velis;
Quæ toties rapta eſt, prabuit ipſa rapi.

The following Remark will ſerve for a Supplement to this.

(CΔ) Our Romancers have not obſerv'd this.] 'Tis certain that Mr. or Madam de Scuderi and the other Romancers their Contemporaries, have too violently ſhock'd probability, whilſt they have feign'd their Heroeſſes carried off, without permitting us to believe they granted any favour to their Lovers either by conſent or force. I confeſs they would be infinitely more inexcuſable, if they did not ſuppoſe as they do, that, they were Stolen, without any manner of conſent of theirs. There are Countries where there is no Puniſhment appointed for ſuch as Steal away young Women that are willing: Which is the cauſe that theſe ſorts of Thefts are very frequent: and there is no body that believes the Raviſhers are very dilatory in point of Enjoyment: The firſt Lodging they come to is the utmoſt, and even moſt are given to ſuſpect, that Enjoyment preceded the eſcape. However it be, that ſort of Rape is generally followed with Matrimony; becauſe if the Parents did not conſent to the Marriage, they would find themſelves burden'd with a Daughter that is defil'd in all Mens opinion, and who is not like to have any other Husband than what could be content with another's leavings. We confeſs then that Romancers ſecure themſelves from being laugh'd at, by the care they take to ſuppoſe that the Damſel oppoſes as much as poſſible her carrying off: But yet they can't come off clear; they overturn common notions to make a Syſtem diametrically oppoſite to the publick Judgement, and good Senſe. What motive have the Heroes when they carry off a Miſtreſs? Will they declare to her that they die with Love of her, and that her Cruelties throw them into deſpair? They have declar'd that over and over, and they have no recourſe to this violent Method, till they know ſhe is determin'd to make another Man happy, and to be for ever indifferent to them. Do they hope their Sighs ſo vainly waſted before they had provok'd her, will move her under the lively reſentment ſhe is in againſt her Raviſher? This is not probable: what they propoſe to themſelves muſt then be to take advantage of the condition, which ſubmits her to their diſcretion, and to bring her under ſuch Terms as ſhall make it her intereſt to be the firſt Proponent of Marriage: This is indeed one of the views of thoſe who have taken a young Woman againſt her Will. They perſwade themſelves that after ſhe has been ſome Months in their power, her Reputation will at leaſt begin to ſuffer, and will not be reſtor'd without the nuptial Benediction. And 'tis ſeen, that if others marry Women in this Capacity, they are ſuſpected to have taken up with the gleanings of the Raviſher. They are laugh'd at for it, and regarded as Men of no delicate Taſt: A new charge againſt the Romancers, whoſe Heroes are out of patience to Marry thoſe Miſtreſſes, which their Rivals had carried off more than once. You'll find Reflections upon all this in Parnaſſus Reform'd. Cynus complains there that an Heroine had not been given him, that was of an unblameable Character. You will doubtleſs, ſays he, judge by this Diſcourſe, that I am not ſatisfied with Mandana, and truly what would you have me to think of her, after ſhe has been ſo often run away with? Should I believe that ſhe return'd untouch'd from the Hands of four Raviſhers? Or will thoſe that are the leaſt clear-ſighted in theſe Myſteries, queſtion whether you have given me another's leavings? Methinks you ſhould not have expoſed her Modeſty to ſuch violent Attempts, and Mandana was not a Fort that could withſtand ſo many Aſſaults? It may be ſhe had came off well from the firſt Attack: I am willing to believe her ſo Fortified with Virtue, as not to ſurrender at the firſt blow, and her Honour might be ſafe without a Miracle, in that unhappy incident? But Relapſes are Mortal in theſe matters: a ſecond Raviſhment ruins all: and an Heroine who has no more than the remains of a ſhaken Conſtancy, or perhaps leſs, makes but uſeleſs efforts to defend her ſelf. Apollo lent an Ear to that complaint, and pronounc'd this Decree. "(d) We declare that we acknowledge "none for Heroes that are Cuckolds, nor for Hero- "eſſes, thoſe that have been carried off more than once. Sarraſin's Ballad upon the Stealing of Mademoiſelle de Bouteville by Monſieur de (e) Coligny, is another Decree of Condemnation: Here is the opinion of that fine Wit.

Antiquity must needs be strongly possess'd with the good humour of Cuckolds, since it represents the God Vulcan so easy to his Wife. (b) "The God of our Poet, when he caught one of his "Wife's Gallants in Bed with her, was content only "to make them asham'd.——And for all that "grew warm with the soft Caresses which she "offer'd him, saying, that this should not make "her distrust his Affection.

But not to dissemble, I must needs own, there have been some so officious, as to do Menelaus the Honour, to arm him with Resentment against his unfaithful Wife. In the Troades of Euripides, he threatens to kill her; and she is forc'd to make use of all sorts of excuses to obtain her Pardon. She says amongst other things, that after the Death of Paris she often endeavour'd to make her escape from Troy to the Grecian Camp, and that the Sentinels surpriz'd her, endeavouring to come down the Walls by a Cord. She adds that Deiphobus Married her by force. Pausanias (c) makes mention of a Statue of Menelaus, pursuing Helena with his Sword in Hand, to kill her when Troy was taken. But others suppose he threw away his Sword when he saw her Breast, and suffer'd mutual Kisses and Caresses to pass betwixt him and that Trayterous Bitch.

(F) Where she came to a miserable end.] Nicostratus and Megapenthus, Menelaus's Husbands, had expell'd her from Lacedæmon. She retir'd to Polyxo her Relation, the Widow of Tlepolemus King of Rhodes, and Regent of the Kingdom during her Son's Minority. Polyxo remembring that her Husband died at the Siege of Troy, and so looking upon Helena as the cause of her Widowship, resolv'd to be reveng'd of her; and to that end, when Helena was Bathing, sent Women dress'd in the habit of Furies, who Hang'd her on a Tree. The Rhodians desirous to immortalize that accident built a Temple which they call'd the Temple of Helena Dendritis. This (e) I have from Pausanias. The Author of the old and new Athens, has reason to say that a Thousand People (f) who treat of the fair Helena, know nothing of her being Hang'd. What is said in Moreri's Dictionary, that one of her Companions was the cause of her Death, is not true. You'll find in Photius (g) that she Strangled her self, and that near the Oak on which she hung, there was an Herb, which they call'd Helenion, which made those People quarrelsome that Eat of it. Pliny attributes quite other Qualities to that Herb; it (h) beautified Women, and exhilatated those that took it in there Wine. He observes, that it was said (i) to spring from the Tears of Helena. You'll find in the same Photius (k) that Thetis caus'd Helena to Die, during the return of the Greeks: and according to others that she went with Menelaus into Taurica Chersonesus to seek Orestes, and that there they were both Sacrific'd by Iphigenia. I have read in Vigenere (l) that Herodotus reports that Nicostratus and Megapenthus expell'd Helena, and that she retir'd to Rhodes to Polypo the Widow of King Tlepolemus, and that Polypo's Maids of Honour hating Helena, because she had been the cause of their Lord's Death, as one Day she went out to Recreate her self in an Orchard without their Mistress, they hung her up and Strangled her on one of the Trees. I find no such thing in Herodotus.

THE Spanish Monk whom I have above-cited, is grossly out about Helena's Death. He says (m) that retreating to Rhodes to Polyxena Wife of Ptetolemus King of that Isle, she managed her self ill as she had always done from her Child-hood; that she became Amorous of the King, and was entirely at his Service. Polyxena enrag'd with Jealousy caus'd her to be Hang'd. Pausanias, he goes on, affirms that by reason of her having committed Adultery with Ptetolemus during the Trojan War, Polyxena put her to Death. Judge by this, if that Spanish Author is faithful, or skilful in his Citations.

paying her (H) Divine Honours after her Death, and attributing Miracles to her. 'Tis not probable that Paris waited (I) to enjoy her, till they landed in an Island. Nevertheless, it is said, that he built in that Island a Monument of his first Enjoyment. 'Tis added, that (K) Menelaus did not ruine that Monument, but contented himself to shew, that he had Satisfaction for the Injury. A modern Author * does not seem to have ——Ptolemæus Hephæstion in Photius, tells a very particular Story, which gives Testimony to Helena's Incontinence. The Fact is, that a certain Arcadian, call'd Peritanus, finding Helena with Paris Alexander, in the Country of Arcadia, had to do with her. But Paris, to chastise the Adulterer, cut off his Parts of Generation. And hence they that are castrated, are in Arcadia, call'd Peritanes. Lycophron has us'd her more severely, than to call her a Wife of Five Husbands; 'tis said, he has call'd her Dove, because of her Lasciviousness, and Bitch because of her Impudence, or her promiscuous use of Men (p).

I don't see that those who would excuse Helena, alledge any other Reason than this, that she was fated by the Gods (q) to follow Paris (r). There is no Crime whatever, but may be justified by the same Apology. But I confess, that taking the Method of Homer's Scholiast, one might make a good Apology. This is what he says, "Alexander, Son of Priamus, travell'd out of Asia to Lacedæmon, where he "form'd the Design of stealing Helena, who had "lodg'd him in her Palace: But she who had been ver-"tuously educated, and lov'd her Husband very well, "would never consent to it, saying she lik'd a Law-"ful Marriage better than a shameful Adultery, and "that she had rather stay with Menelaus. So "Paris not being like to succeed, it is said, that Venus found out a Stratagem, which was to "Metamorphose Alexander into the Shape of Menelaus, and cheated her by that Means: For believing "him to be the true Menelaus, she made no scruple to "follow him, and to enter with him into his Ship; which she no sooner did, but Paris hois'd his Sails to "the Wind. Eustathius also, upon the same Book "of Homer, touches upon the same Story, and observes, that Penelope govern'd her self more prudently: For though she thought she knew again "Ulysses, yet she would not venture to gratifie him "with any thing, and especially to lie with him, till he "had told her many Particulars, and given her "many Signs, to assure her, that he was her Husband indeed, and that she could not be mistaken (t).

(H) Divine Honours——and attributing Miracles to her.] I have already spoke of the Temple consecrated to her by the Rhodians. Pausanias (v) makes mention of that which was built to her in Lacedæmon. As to her Miracles, it suffices to observe, that she struck Stesichorus blind (w) who had ventur'd to speak ill of her in his Poems; and that she restored his Sight when he (x) had made his Recantation. She gave an extraordinary Beauty to an ugly Maid, which was every Day brought to her Temple (y). See the Article Achillea, where we have said, she was the Wife of Achilles in the other World; and that she knew how to make her self considerable there. See also Isocrates, in his Panegyrick on Helena. You will there find, that she not only obtain'd an Immortality, but also a Divine Power, which she imploy'd to the placing her Brothers and Husband in the Number of the Gods: So that if Castor and Pollux were capable of succouring those that in Tempests made their Prayers to them, 'twas because their Sister had communicated that Power to them, to prove to the World the Metamorphosis she had wrought upon them. They were in their Graves, when she made them Gods. And that which is laudable in it is, that conferring the same Bounty on Menelaus, she was resolv'd to live with him eternally (a). Τὰς ἀδελφὰς ἤδη κατεχομένας ὑπὸ τῆς Περσεμάνης, εἰς θεὰς ἀνήγαγε. βουλόμενη δὲ τιμᾶν τοιοῦτον τῶν μεγάλων, ὅτως αὐτοῖς τὰς τιμὰς ἐναργῶς ἔδωκεν, ὧν ἐρωμένους ὑπὸ τῶν ἐν τῇ θαλάττῃ κινδυνεύοντας σώζειν, οἱ τινες ἐν εὐσεβεῖ αὐτὰς ἐπικαλέσωνται. μετὰ δὲ ταῦτα Μενελάῳ τοσαύτην χάριν . . . ἔσχεν . . . μόνον . . . ἀλλὰ καὶ θεὸν αὐτὸν ἅπαντα . . . ἀποφῆναι. Fratres, qui fato jam concesserant, . . . Deos retulit. Cui mutationi cum autoritatem . . . non afferre vellet, honores ita manifestos eis dedit, ut in mari conspecti, periclitantes servent, quicumque ipsos piè invocarint. Deinde Menelao tantam gratiam retulit, ut . . . non tantum . . . sed mortalem ejus sortem divinitate mutavit, eumque contubernalem sibi & assessorem in omne ævum constituerit. Isocrates alledges, as a Proof, the Practice of the Lacedemonians, who offer'd Sacrifices to Menelaus and Helena, not as to Heroes, but as to Gods. The same Author observes, it was at Therapnæ these Divine Honours were paid them. But Pausanias does not say, that Helena had a Temple in that City; he only (b) says, that that of Menelaus was there, and it was believ'd that Menelaus and Helena were buried in it.

'Tis pity but Theodoret had built upon Isocrates, and not upon Euripides, to insult the Pagans with their numbring so famous an Adultress as Helena with the Gods. For though Euripides feign'd that she did not die, but was exalted to the Skies, by the Favour of the Gods, and immortaliz'd, it does not follow, that this was the Opinion of the Pagans. The Episodes of a Tragedy were so much at the Poets Disposal, that unless they were known to be true on other Grounds, they were look'd upon as the particular Fictions of the Tragedian. These are Theodoret's Words: (c) Καὶ τὴν Ἑλένην δέ, μετὰ τὴν πολυθρύλλητον ἐκ παμπόλλων μοιχείαν, τῷ Μενέλεῳ χαρισάμενος, εἰς τὸν οὐρανὸν, ἢ φησιν εὐκτίδης, ἀνήγαγον.

(I) That Paris waited to enjoy her] Homer, that gives him so much Patience, did not do him much Honour, according to the Principles of Gallantry (d). But see to what end he mentions that Circumstance of Place. Paris, beaten by Menelaus, was miserably reproach'd by Helena. He prays her not to insult him, but to go to Bed with him, pretending he never felt so much of the Fire of Love, not even when he enjoy'd her first in the Isle of Cranae. Hereupon he rose from his Seat to go to Bed, and was followed by Helena, without any Repugnance.

Jason has a Patience ascrib'd to him, more wonderful still than that of Paris; which makes it hard to discover, what it is wherein your Romancers imploy their Judgment. Ought they not above all things to stick to Probability? And don't they transgress it, when they suppose, on one hand, Medea so much in love with Jason, as to be carried by her Passion into the greatest Crimes, and on the other, spending many Months with him, without consummating the Marriage? Observe too, that it had not been consummated so soon, but for the Advice which was given by one to Jason (f).

(K) That Menelaus did not ruine that Monument.] Here is a Passage which would bring Homer off, if it were true. have taken right Menelaus's meaning. Some Authors say, that Paris (I.) hardly preserv'd his Booty. Many Fables (M) have been vented about the Birth of Helena, I mean

'signifie that he would not suffer the Affront to pass 'unrevenged. But he had not the good Fortune to 'see himself reveng'd of Helena; for she surviv'd him. The Author of the News from the Republick of Learning, having cited this Passage, adds this Reflection: (b) 'These last Words would furnish an 'occasion of criticizing to any one that would seek 'it. For it is certain, that Eighteen Years after 'Helena was stolen, Menelaus had reveng'd himself, 'as amply as he could wish, by the Ruine of the 'Kingdom of Priamus, the Father of the Ravisher. 'Tis therefore very likely, that that Image of the 'Goddess Praxilice, had no reference to future Revenge, but to that which was past, and it is not 'apparent, that it had relation to any Design of 'punishing Helena. For if Menelaus was not reconcil'd to his Wife in Earnest, he would not have 'delay'd so long to punish her. The History of that 'Age assures us, that that artful Woman made her Peace with her Husband, the very Night the Greeks 'became Masters of the Town, which is very probable, considering the Character Good Menelaus 'has in the Iliad. Be it how it will, I will not maintain on one hand, that there was no Temple of Venus near the Ile of Cranae, nor acknowledge on the other, that Paris had it built for the reason that is given. I keep to Probability, which inclines one to a violent Presumption, that Paris enjoy'd Helena before he left Lacedæmon. What should hinder him? Menelaus was in the Ile of Crete; his Presence could not hinder Helena from countenancing her handsome Guest, that inveagled her; and his Absence must be left capable of doing it. See how Paris used and ridiculed his Absence:

Sed (k) tibi & hoc suadet rebus, non voce, maritus,
Neve sui furtis hospitis obstet, abest.
Non habuit tempus, quo Cressa regna videret,
Aptius, ô mira calliditate virum! &c.

He was not bashful with the Ladies: Helena confesses he was not so reserv'd as Theseus, who did no more than kiss her:

Di melius! similis non fuit illa tui,
Reddidit intactam.

Paris press'd her so urgingly one Day, that she ran away from him, and lost one of her Slippers. The Place she lost it in in Sparta, was call'd Sandalion, from that Slipper (m).

(I.) That Paris hardly preserv'd his Booty.] 'Tis (n) pretended that he sail'd towards Ægypt, and landed at the Mouth of the Nile, call'd Canopus, where there was a Temple of Hercules, which was a Sanctuary to Fugitive Slaves. Some of Paris's Slaves having fled thither, acquainted the Priests with the Action of their Master; whereupon King Proteus order'd him to be seiz'd, gave him a great deal of hard Language, and afterwards commanded him immediately to depart. But he kept Helena, with all the other things that had been stole from Menelaus. 'Tis (o) added, that Paris did not enjoy that Woman, before his arrival in Ægypt; a Tale that I have already refuted. I don't know very well, how Proteus us'd her, and whether, whilst he waited to restore her to her proper Owner, he did not obtain some of the choicest Favours from her (a). I only know, that Herodotus (b) thinks it very probable, that she was never brought to Troy; for he could not perswade himself, that Priamus could be so stupid, as to choose rather to keep that Woman, than avoid the fatal Consequences of a Refusal. He thinks then, that the Trojans answer'd the Grecian Embassadors sincerely, that (c) Helena was not at Troy, and that she should be search'd for in Ægypt, where she was kept by King Proteus. The Grecians taking that Answer for a piece of sharp Raillery, prepar'd to besiege the Town, which when they had taken, without finding Helena in it, they were perswaded she was with King Proteus; whereupon Menelaus set sail for Ægypt, and recover'd his Wife from thence (d). There is such a prodigious Inconsistency of Variations in Mythological Authors, that I don't wonder to find Servius (e) relating, 1. That Theseus, after he had stolen Helena, gave her to Proteus King of Ægypt, and that Menelaus recover'd her out of Proteus's Hands, after the War of Troy: So that that War was not kindled upon the account of Paris stealing Helena, but of the affront which the Trojans offer'd Hercules, in shutting the Gates against him, when he was in quest of Hylas. 2. That Helena was remov'd out of the Hands of Proteus, to whom Theseus had given her, into the Power of Menelaus, from whom Paris stole her.

I forgot to observe, that Proteus did not send Paris away, without some sort of Consolation; for he restored him the Lady's Picture (f). One of Lycophron's Commentators applies to that very untowardly, what Helena says in Euripides, that Juno, to punish Paris for not giving her the Victory in the Contest of Beauty, gave him only a Living Image of Helen, instead of her real Person, which Image was form'd in the Air.

Πῆρε (g) δὲ μεμφθέσ', ὅτεκ' ἐ νικᾷ Θεάς,
Ἑ ξενήμασε τᾶμ' Ἀλεξάνδρε λέχη.
Δίδωσι δ' ἐκ ἐμέ, ἀλλ' ὁμοιώσασ' ἐμοὶ
Εἴδωλον ἔμπνευν, ἐρανὲ ξυνθεσ' ὑτο,
Πειθὼ τυρσενν παιδὶ, ᾧ δόκει μ' ἔχειν
Κενὴν δόκησιν ἐκ ἔχων.

Sed Juno molestè ferens, quo non occidisset Deas,
Irritum fecit meum conjugium Alexandro:
Dedit enim non me: sed assimilatam mihi
Imaginem vivam, sub cælo compactam,
Filio regis Priami: putavit autem se habere me,
Falsa opinione deceptus, cum non haberet.

'Tis manifest, that the Difference between these two things lies not in this, as Canterus would have it, that Proteus is the Actor in one, and Juno in the other. It appears likewise, that Juno forgot her Spirit of Revenge on that occasion: Paris was as happy with a Living Image of Helena, as he would have been with the Original. I remember I have read, that the Poet Stesichorus said, that the Trojans not knowing the true Helena, quarrell'd among themselves about her Picture. (b) Ὥσπερ τοὺς Τρῳαδας ... ἐριζειν περὶ τῆς ἀληθείας. Quem admodum Stesichorus Trojanos, inquit, vera ignaros Helenæ de imagine ipsius inter se decertasse. This is in the Notion of some Libertines, an Image of the Disputes about Religion.

(M) Fables——about the Birth of Helena.] It has not been thought enough to say, she was born of an Egg; 'tis added, that this Egg fell from the Orb of the Moon, and that the Women of that Region lay Eggs, that breed Men Fifteen times bigger than the Inhabitants of the Earth. This we learn from Athenæus (i), who says upon the Testimony of Herodotus of Heraclea, that Nicocles of Cyprus had publish'd it in one of his Works. Observe here some false Quotations about that Chimera. Cœlius Rhodiginus (k) instead of Herodotus, says Herodotus. That Fault has been copied by Salmuth (l). Who could forbear laughing to read this Passage in a Spanish Physician (m), Nonne admirabilius adhuc in tota naturæ majestate varissimum, quod mulieres quasdam produxerit, quæ non more aliarum fœtus, sed ova edant & incubent, ex quibus homines nascantur, qui magnitudinem procerissimam excrescant? Et tamen hoc in Seleucidis mulieribus accidere referunt ex Lycosthene Rawisius Textor, & ex Herodoto Heracleotes, ut quoque testatur Rhodiginus, lib. 27. cap. 17. licet pro mera fabula hoc habeat Adrianus Junius, lib. 1. animad. cap. 15. citatus apud Pancirolum part. 2. memorab. titulo 2. histor. tamen cum nemo exhibet. Does he not begin his Citations well, who sets out with Lycosthenes, who lived in the XVI. Century? Is it not a strange Blunder, to put Rawisius Textor after Lycosthenes, who was Junior and Abridger of the other? What a Leap is there immediately to Herodotus? What Confusion in taking Herodotus for Heraclcotes? What a Fiction to give us one Heracleotes, who has cited Herodotus! Is not this to make two Authors, where the Writer quoted gives but one? for Cælius Rhodiginus has said expressly, Herodotus Heracleotes. And what sort of reasoning is this? Though Hadrian Junius looks upon this as a meer Fable, Lycosthenes, Rawisius Textor, Herodotus, Heracleotes, Rhodiginus have nevertheless reported it. How was the Authority of Junius like to hinder them, mean about the Egg from which 'tis pretended ſhe was Hatch'd. The inventions (N) that are attributed to her moſt faithful Maid, are a title of Infamy. If the Authors who have written of her were good Chronologers, her Beauty muſt have laſted (O) prodigiouſly; and we muſt ſay that the Grecians and Trojans had Fought ten Years for the poſſeſſion of an old Woman: Which would make them very Ridiculous; as they were however, tho' we allow her all the Beauty that the Poets aſcribe to her. See in Herodotus what one ought to think of a Woman that ſuffers her ſelf to be run away them, who liv'd after them all except Lycoſthenes. But to return to Helena.

Some Ancient Poets have ſaid ſhe was the Daughter of Jupiter and Nemeſis, and that Nemeſis to avoid the ardent purſuits of Jupiter, fled by Sea and Land, and diſguiſed her ſelf in all Shapes: But at laſt by an overpowering force Jupiter made her big with Caſtor and Pollux, and afterwards with Helena;

Τὴν (n) φασι καλλίνυσον ὑμνοις ἀείδοντες πτερόεσσα
Ζηνὶ θοὸν βαστάσαι, πίλνα κεκρυφὼς ὑπ' ἀνθερεῶνος.

Auricomi hanc Nemeſis peperit compreſſa tonanti
Ab Jove vi.

We read in Pauſanias that (o) according to the vulgar opinion, Helena was the Daughter of Jupiter and Nemeſis; and as for Leda, ſhe was but her Nurſe. Phidias, conſonant to this Tradition, repreſented Leda in ſuch a manner on the Baſis of Nemeſis's Statue, that ſhe ſeem'd to lead Helena to that Goddeſs. Some ſay (p) that Nemeſis, being big by Jupiter, lay'd an Egg, and that Leda finding this Egg, ſat on it, and hatch'd Caſtor, Pollux, and Helena. Others ſay (q) that Jupiter not being able to compaſs Nemeſis, gave Venus the ſhape of an Eagle, and Metamorphos'd himſelf into a Swan, which Flew before the Eagle. He reſted himſelf in the Lap of Nemeſis, and was kindly receiv'd; the Lady embrac'd him and fell aſleep: The pretended Swan taking the advantage of that Sleep injoy'd her; becauſe he did it under the ſhape of a Bird, Order requir'd that Nemeſis ſhould lay an Egg. Mercury took this Egg, and carried it to Lacedæmon, and laid it in Leda's Boſom. Hence came the fair Helena, which was the reaſon Leda adopted her for her Daughter (r) Nemeſis autem ut quæ avium generi eſſet juncta menſibus actis ovum procreavit, quod Mercurius auferens, detulit Spartam, & Ledæ ſedenti in Gremium projecit, ex quo naſcitur Helena, cæteras corporis ſpecie præſtans, quam Leda ſuam filiam nominavit. Auſonius has obſerv'd the diſtinction (ſ) betwixt Nemeſis and Leda.

Iſtos tergemino (t) naſci quos cernis ab ovo
Hos genuit Nemeſis, ſed Leda puerpera fovit,
Tyndareus pater his, & Jupiter. Hic putat, hic ſcit.

So here many Authors of this opinion; and yet there are as many, who ſay Leda was the true Mother of Helena. The ſame Hyginus whom I have quoted, having ſaid there was alſo a Tradition that Jupiter had to do with Leda in the ſhape of a Swan, adds, he knew not what to pronounce concerning it, De quo in medio relinquimus (u), becauſe he ſaw equal Arguments on both ſides. Theon of Alexandria obſerves that Jupiter, transform'd into a Swan, lay with Nemeſis according to ſome, and with Leda according to others; and that Helena, Caſtor and Pollux were produc'd from an Egg which Leda laid (w). Pauſanias, who, as we have ſeen, relates a Tradition concerning Nemeſis, reports another in another place (x) concerning Leda, and he moreover obſerves that there was a Memorial of it in a Temple of Lacedæmon (y); for there was to be ſeen in the Roof an Egg hang'd with Ribbons, which paſs'd for that of Leda. Iſocrates ſpeaks more poſitively. He mentions two Metamorphoſes of Jupiter into a Swan, one with regard to Nemeſis, the other to Leda. (z) Κύκνος ... ἐπὶ τὰς ... ὑπὸ ... Oloris figura in ſinum Nemeſis ... atque iterum ejuſdem avis ſpeciem ... eſſe ſubiret ... effinxit. Which being ſo, there is no ... ſuppos'd Helena proceeded from that ſecond Metamorphoſis. Euripides in his Tragedy of Oreſtes expreſly affirms that Leda was the Mother of Helena, and he gives Helena the Epithets ... and ..., which expreſs Jupiter's Metamorphoſis into a Swan. I don't make uſe of Plutarch's Authority, becauſe by the Egg of Tyndarus he might mean that which Mercury had caſt into Leda's Lap: and indeed he Remarks that that Egg fell from Heaven: So that (a) Hadrian Junius ſhould not have brought Plutarch to countenance the ſecond Opinion. Ovid has been properly made a Witneſs in the Caſe, becauſe he introduces Leda in a ſupine Poſture under the Wings of a Swan, (b) Ovidius quoque Ledam recubantem facit ſub olorinis alis. Junius might have cited (c) Lucian, and the Scholiaſt (d) upon Homer. This latter ſays a thing which many others omit, viz. that the Egg which Leda laid, and put into a Cheſt, produc'd there Caſtor, Pollux, and Helena, without being Brooded.

To reconcile theſe two Opinions, Junius ſuppoſes that Nemeſis and Leda were one and the ſame Perſon, and for that he quotes Lactantius (e), and the Scholiaſt of Euripides, and Germanicus. The words of the laſt are very clear. (f) Cygnum dicunt inter aſtra conſtitutum eo quod Jupiter in Cygnum transfiguratus evolaverit in Rhamnuntem Atticæ regionis, ibique compreſſerit Nemeſin quæ & Leda dicitur, ut refert Crates tragœdiarum ſcriptor, quæ enixa eſt ovum, unde nata eſt Helena.

I will not end this Obſervation, without noting, that Jupiter, who acknowledg'd many Boys for his Sons, upon the Intrigues he had with Women, owned but one Daughter, which was Helena. I ſpeak of Daughters, which proceeded from his Love of Women; Iſocrates is my Author (g). I omit thoſe who pretend Helena (h) was the Daughter of Venus, or of the Sun and Leda.

(N) The Inventions that are attributed.] 'Tis pretended ſhe invented I know not what Poſtures, and that ſhe wrote upon that matter. I ſhall explain my ſelf clearer in Latin, in the Words of Leonicus Thomæus. Aſtyanaſſa quædam nomine, ſays he, (i) inter Helenæ miniſtras & famulas fuiſſe commemoratur, quæ dominam à Theſeo primum, poſtea à Paride raptam ſemper proſequuta eſt: hanc in Venerea palæſtra primam complures reperiſſe ſigurarum modos omnis perhibet antiquitas. Voluminibus quinetiam quibuſdam editis de variis concubitus generibus perſcripſiſſe narratur, quam poſtmodum Philenis & Elephantis pervulgatiſſimæ mulieres ſunt inſequutæ, quæ hujuſmodi de rebus non minus accurate, quàm Jupiter conſcripta commentaria reliquere. If that be true, it will caſt an indelible Stain on Helena's Memory; for it is probable if that Servant read Lectures to her Miſtreſs, her Miſtreſs intruſted her with the ſecret of her practiſing them; and that thereby, they both clubb'd their aſſiſtance to perfect thoſe horrid inventions. I have read in Photius (k) that Aſtyanaſſa ſtole an imbroider'd Girdle, which Juno had obtain'd of Venus to give to Helena; but that Venus took it away from that Maid.

(O) Her Beauty muſt have laſted prodigiouſly.] 'Tis pretended that Helena and Caſtor were hatch'd from the ſame Egg: We may well ſuppoſe then that Helena, was a Woman grown when the Argonauts went to Colchos; for her two Brothers Caſtor and Pollux, ſignaliz'd themſelves in that famous Expedition. Let us allow her 20 Years at leaſt, which can't be too much. We will not make advantage of Euſebius's Error; I will ſpeak of that hereafter. Let us uſe the Chronology that is moſt exact. About 30 Years are reckon'd betwixt that Expedition and that of Troy. Helena then was 50 years Old, under or over, when Paris ſtole her. The Siege of Troy laſted 10 Years, and 'twas the laſt Year of the Siege that Agamemnon and Achilles Quarrell'd. Now the Admiration Priamus's Counſellors expreſs'd for the divine Beauty of Helena, muſt be computed to happen after that Quarrel (l). Thus Helena, at 60 years of Age, by the extraordinary Luſtre of her Beauty, obliged a whole Senate to confeſs that ſhe was a prize of Love, that was worth while for two powerful Nations to run one another in a ten Years War. Is not this very wonderful? Paris having been kill'd ſome time after, there aroſe a warm Dispute between his Brothers, who should Marry the Widow. (m) Priamus, appointed a Combat, and promis'd her to him who should obtain the Victory. Deiphobus had the best on't and carried Helena. One of (n) the Brothers was so enrag'd with his exclusion, that he departed from Troy, and contributed all he could to the ruin of his Country. Does not this prove that Helena at 60 years of Age was a prodigy of Beauty. Lucian proves that at the Siege of Troy she was an Old Woman, almost as Old as Hecuba. (o) Εἶδον γὰρ ἔγωγε μίαν τινὰ ἐκ τῶν ἐπὶ τοῦ τείχους τὴν εἰς ἀκμὴν κάλλους ἀφικομένην, ἀλλὰ δὲ πάνυ πρεσβυτέραν ἀληθῶς γενέσθαι τῆς Ἑλένης. Siquidem vidi quandam candida & procera cervice ut cygno prognatam illam hinc conjicerent. Cæterum annum Hecubæ propemodum æquaverat. She must have been much older than Hecuba, if that was true which (p) has been said, that Hercules was the last Child of Jupiter. Our admiration of so Aged a Beauty would cease, if we could believe the Story that is told, that Helena was Guarded by a notable priviledge from (q) growing Old; but every body does not give credit to it. "'Tis said of Helena, that in her latter Days, as "often as she saw her self in a Glass, she wonder'd "what was become of her self, and complain'd of "Time which had been her third Ravisher, and had "Stolen Helena from Helena her self. I have read that in the Book of (r) a Jesuit who has a very affected Stile. Another Modern tells the same Story, almost in the same manner (s). She of whom you speak, deserves to be look'd on with such an Eye as yours. You'll quickly see in her a Change quite contrary to that which has given you (t) so much Astonishment. 'Tis that which a few Years will make you observe; that which made Helena Weep when she saw her self in her Glass, and obliged her to call Time her third or fourth Ravisher, for the number of 'em is not very certain. A strange sort of Rape, to see Helena Ravish'd from her self, to see Helena, whom three parts of the World, which then were all, acknowledged for the finest Woman of her Age, seeking for her Face in a Glass, which represented nothing but a frightful Object. That thought Quadrates with two Verses of Ovid (u).

I must observe that if we follow Eusebius's Chronology, we shall find that Helena had lived above an Age, when Paris stole her; for in his Calculation the expedition of the Argonautæ, was 89 Years before the taking of Troy. He had observ'd the miscreckoning of the Greek Authors, and therefore he objected to them: Si inter Argonautas fuerunt Castor & Pollux, quomodo potest eorum soror Helena credi, quæ post multos annos virgo rapitur à Theseo (w)? Observe here Scaliger's Annotation upon this Latin. In Græcis, says he, (x) ἁμάρτημα μέγα τοῦτο τῶν Ἑλλήνων συγγραφέων, quæ non multis post annis virgo capitur. Sive culpa librariorum, sive quod verisimilius, Hieronymi properantis accidit, ut negatio in latina interpretatione expressa non sit, omnino ridicula sententia efficitur. Nam quo remotior fuerit raptus Helenæ eo credibilior erit. Contra quo propior his temporibus eo remotior à Trojæ excidio, eoque minus credibile Helenæ tempus in hujus fœrali vadum incidisse. That Animadversion appears to me very false, and the more I examine it the more I am surpriz'd at it. I don't deny but the negative Particle, the omission whereof Scaliger thinks a fault in St Jerome, may make it good Sense; but I can't comprehend that the Sense would be Ridiculous if that Particle were suppress'd; and on the contrary Eusebius's Objection seems more intelligible to all sorts of Readers, without that Negative Particle than with it. Eusebius's Design is to prove that those who said Castor and Pollux, Helena's Brothers, were in the Voyage of the Argonauts, and that Theseus Stole Helena yet very young, have but ill concerted the Times. If Castor and Pollux, says he, were in the number of the Argonautæ, how can we believe they were the Brothers of Helena, who was Stole away young by Theseus many Years after? The most stupid Readers will perceive the force of the Objection, without any need of Reasoning, without any recourse but to the very Words of Eusebius: But if we suppose with Scaliger, that Eusebius express'd it in this manner. If Castor and Pollux were in the number of the Argonauts, how can we believe they were the Brothers of Helena, who was Stole away young by Theseus a few Years after? Every one sees, that to be sensible of this Objection, we must take our Eyes off from the Words that contain it, and recur to the Arguments and Calculations that are found in the following Pages; for if one only consider'd Eusebius's Expressions, one would imagine that he reason'd ill, and brought a Proof directly contrary to what he pretended to assert.

Here are some other Words of Scaliger that to me seem unexact. Ab hoc (a) tempore, says he (b), ad excidium Ilii, anni sunt LXXIX. ut Helenam admodum annum fuisse oporteat, si Argonautica hoc tempore contigerunt. Nam adultis Castoribus, Helenam quoque maturam viro fuisse necesse est. Quod si Argonautica hic collocentur, tempore excidii Iliaci Helena fuerit major annorum CXX. Hoc est quod objicit Eusebius & merito. That is, if there was 79 Years betwixt the Voyage of the Argonautæ and the taking of Troy, Helena must needs be above 120 years Old when Troy was taken. What consequence is here? Is this worthy of the great Scaliger? Must a Maid be above 40 Years Old to be said to be Marriageable, matura viro? 'Tis that Expression of the Author which I confute.

(a) That is from the number 750. of Eusebius. But I wonder that Scaliger did not mind, that Eusebius had already spoken of the Argonautæ under the number 740.

(b) Ibid. pag. 40.

He has succeeded much better in his Animadversions upon Eusebius's Calculations; for it is not true, that the Expedition of the Argonautæ, and that of Troy, were at such a distance from one another as Eusebius imagines. But it is certain that Eusebius follow'd the most famous Writers; and consequently I can maintain that if the Ancient Authors, which speak of Helena, were good Chronologers, her Beauty must have lasted a prodigious while; viz. above a Century! Let us view a little the Calculations, which Clemens Alexandrinus borrows from Apollodorus, and some other celebrated Historians. In one place (c) he says that there were 38 Years betwixt the beginning of Hercules's Reign in Argos, (after the Expedition of the Argonautæ,) and his Deification; and that Castor and Pollux were Deified 53 Years after Hercules, about the time Troy was taken. Which is to reckon 91 Years betwixt the Voyage of the Argonautæ, and the taking of Troy, and to make Helena an Hundred years Old or thereabouts, at the time that Paris stole her, under the notion of an accomplish'd Beauty. In an other (d) place the same Father makes a computation, which puts 68 Years betwixt Paris's stealing Helena, and the Expedition of the Argonautæ.

(P) Of a Woman that suffers her self to be run away with.] Herodotus (e) tracing up to their first Original, the long continued Wars betwixt Europe and Asia, owns the Asiaticks for the Aggressors, as having Stole away Io the Daughter of Inachus King of Argos. The Europeans who Stole away the (f) King of Tyre's Daughter, only did it by way of Reprisal. But they did not stop there, they engag'd in a second adventure, the stealing Medea, Daughter to the King of Colchos. That Prince demanded satisfaction for the injury. 'Twas answer'd they would give him none, because they had never receiv'd any for the Rape of Io. The Stealing of Helena was undertaken by way of Reprisal upon the Greeks: redemanded her, it was answer'd that they would deal by them as they had dealt by the Asiaticks, when they demanded back Medea. They were not satisfied with that Answer, but raising a great Army fell to ruining the Kingdom of Priamus. See now what Pleas the Persians had to justify their Wars. They pretended that the Expedition to Troy gave them a right

† Id. ib. Name †. There has been much talk of Helena's Necklace (Q), and of her (R) Crater, and of the Nepenthes which she made Telemachus the Son of Ulysses Drink. It is said also that ught to hold the Europeans for Enemies, and to use them as such. They disliked the violence of such as stole a Woman, but they look'd upon those as Fools, who busied themselves about recovering her; for as much as no Women are Stolen but such as are willing. As for us, said they, we never minded the Women that were Stole from Asia: 'Twas the Greeks that began the War for the sake of a Woman of Lacedæmon. (g) Ἐκεῖνοι μὲν ἀρπάζειν γυναῖκας, ἀνδρῶν οὐδὲν ἧσσον νομίζοντας εἶναι τοὺς ἀρπαζομένων τοιούτων τυγχάνειν, ἀνόητον, τοὺς δὲ μηδεμίαν ἐπιμέλειαν ποιουμένους ἐκείνων, εἰ μὴ μετὰ πολλῶν χρημάτων ἐθέλοιεν ἀπολαβεῖν, οὐ νοῦν ἔχειν. Eoque suarum fœminarum ex Asia raptarum Persæ negant ullam se habuisse rationem.* We must not omit Isocrates's Observation here. The War of Troy, says he, was very advantageous to Greece: Many things were found out in it; and Europe began to have the Superiority over Asia. Before that War, the Barbarians made Conquests upon the Grecians. It was Helena that gave occasion to a new turn of Affairs; for after that War, the Greeks took Towns and Provinces from the Barbarians (h).

We must not forget that passage of Euripides, where Helen speaks such Home-truths to Menelaus. He blames him especially for two gross Faults: The first was for having acted by his Wife as if she had been an honest Woman; the second was for having rais'd an Army to recover her. You left her, says he, upon Parole, and Honour; you left your House without ordering your Doors to be lock'd, and your Servants to look after her, as if she, who was the Wickedest of Women, had been Chast and Honest.

Menelaus answers in a soft manner, that the Misfortunes (l) of his Wife had been unvolantary; that it was a blow of Fate, which occasion'd great Advantages to the Greeks (m), who first began to learn the Art of War, at the Siege of Troy. This confirms Isocrates's Observation.

(Q) There has been much talk of Helena's Necklace.] Menelaus preparing for the Expedition of Troy, went to Delphi with Ulysses to consult the Oracle, and to offer Helena's Necklace. The Oracle order'd him to do it, and promis'd by that means the Punishment of the Ravisher. Athenæus has (p) preserv'd the Oracle's answer: It contains only three Verses, shewing that this Necklace was made of Massy Gold, and that Venus gave it Helena: when the Phoceans pillag'd the Temple of Delphi, in the 105 Olympiad, this Necklace was one part of the Plunder; but it produc'd a strange effect; the Lady that wore it became an infamous (q) Prostitute; she quitted her House to run all the World over, with a young Epirote that she was in Love with (r). 'Twas either a very active Contagion, or a manner of Punishment very unworthy of the Goddess to whom Menelaus had devoted it. Rather a natural than a moral Evil, should have been appointed the Punishment of that Womans Confidence, who durst appropriate to her self the Spoils of so Sacred a Place.

NOTE that there are some, who will have it that the Lady who had this Necklace, was a Lewd Woman before. 'Tis said that the Wives of those who plunder'd the Temple disputed who should have the Necklace of Helena and that of Eriphile, and they at last decided it by Lot. That of Eriphile fell to a grave, severe, wild Woman, who afterwards kill'd her Husband; the other fell to a very handsome Woman, but very lascivious (s).

(R) And of her Crater, and the Nepentes, she made Telemachus drink.] The Crater was a Work of Vulcan, and a Nuptial Present; for when Pelops married, Vulcan made him a present of it. Menelaus deriving his Pedigree from Pelops, succeeded to that part of the Inheritance, and lost it, when Paris stole Helena, with the Jewels and Moveables of his Entertainer. But 'tis pretended, that Helena threw this fine Present into the Sea, near the Isle of Cos; which being found in the Net of some Fishermen, there arose a Dispute, the Conclusion whereof was, that it should be consecrated to Apollo. According to the Author from (a) whom I have this, it was a tripos; nevertheless, the Interpreters (b) pretend, that Lycophron, Diogenes Laertius, Apuleius and Philostratus have understood the same thing. Now Lycophron call'd it, (c) τρίποδον κρατῆρα, and these are the Words of Apuleius, (d) Nunquam apud eum (Homerum) marino aliquo & piculento medicavit nec Proteus faciem, nec Ulysses scrotum, nec Æolus follem, nec Helena Craterem, nec Circe poculum, nec Venus cingulum. As to Philostratus, this is what he says in the Epistle Dedicatory of the Life of the Sophists. Τὸν κρατῆρα τοῦτον ἄγαλμα ἔστιν, ᾧ τὰ ἄκρα τοῦ κεκλῶσθαι τὴν γνώμην, ὅσπερ ὁ κρατὴρ οὗτος ἐν τοῖς Λιμνητικοῖς φησιν. It does not seem to me, that either he, or Apuleius, spake of a particular Vessel which belong'd to Helena, as a piece of exquisite Work. 'Tis plain, that they allude to what Homer relates, in the 4th. Book of the Odyssey, touching the Nepenthes, which is, that Helena, to exhilarate Telemachus, the Son of Ulysses, and her other Guests, and to hinder them from attending to their Misfortunes, mingled in their Wine a little Nepenthes, which was I know not what, that had an extraordinary Virtue.

Helena had brought that wonderful Remedy from Egypt, which she had learnt of Polydamna, the Wife of Thon. Homer says nothing at all about the Vessel, containing the mixt Wine; and therefore Apuleius and Philostratus consider only the Virtue of the Nepenthes, and consequently speak not of that fine Vessel mentioned by Diogenes Laertius, I mean the Nuptial Present, which Pelops received from Vulcan, &c. Call to mind here, what I have said in the first Note, in mentioning the Cup which Helena offer'd to Minerva: And if you would know the reason why I have made use of the barbarous Word Crater, I must tell you, 'tis because the Words, Glass, Cup, Pot, Goblet, do not express what was meant by the Word Crater in Homer's Time. (f) The Crater was a great Vessel, which was not used to drink in, but only to mingle Wine with Water, from which Vessel they drew out the Wine thus mingled with Bowls, or they first pour'd it into Pots and Pints, and then into drinking Cups, that when she was at the point of being sacrificed, she was saved by a Miracle (S): And an Excuse has been endeavoured for her Adulteries, by saying she was forc'd to them by the Gods (T). The Heathens have made use of such like Suppositions on so many Occasions, that it will not be unseasonable to enquire from what Motive it was that they reasoned in that manner. I design to bestow (T△) a Note upon this Head.

Some

Cups. Note, that the Vessel mentioned by Diogenes Laertius, was thrown into the Sea before the Trojan War, but that spoken of by the others, was in Menelaus's Hands after that War.

I OUGHT not to forget, that some learned Men have made Homer's Nepenthes the Subject of their Studies and Meditations; they have made many Conjectures, and have built several Hypotheses upon it. See Peter Petit's Dissertation, intituled Homeri Nepenthes, and printed at Utrecht in the Year 1689. in Octavo. There is both Wit and Learning in it. The Author speaks of a Neapolitan Civilian, who has treated of the same matter, and has given himself up to all the Excesses of a rambling Humour. I mention this Picture of that Author, because it very fairly represents the Character of Affectation, to say out all that a Man has read; and because one may observe in it many frothy Imaginations, concerning the Nepenthes. (g) Non morabor hic studiosos variis quæstionibus, ut Petrus in Sena, an Nepenthes ex eorum numero esset medicamentorum quæ chimica arte parantur, an simplex quid & solius naturæ proprietate efficax. Ut scilicet habeat occasionem, quæ de artis ejus origine & antiquitate legerat, effundendi: qua in disputatione plures onerat paginas, abutiturque patientia lectorum. Nec minus inanis & superflua opera arguendus, cum tam solliciti de gemmarum viribus differit, seu non satis ex Homeri descriptione constaret Nepenthes plantis esse annumerandum, quod ipse postea fatetur. Cum etiam professus non esse hominis frugis, tempus terere investigando an forte hac Helenæ potio (verba ejus refero) μαγικὸν, hujusmodi curationis efficaciam retinuerit, multa nihilo secius subjungit de Magia Ægyptiorum, veterumque Medicorum incantationibus, locaque Homeri profert ex Odyssea, quæ ad magiam pertinere existimantur, eorum scilicet testimonio, qui, ut Plinius lib. 30. cap. 50. refert, Protea & Sirenum cantus apud Homerum non aliter intelligi voluerunt. Tum multa interpunit de cratere Helenæ, captata occasione sermonis ex quodam Calii Rhodigini loco. Et quid magis ἀπροσδιόνυσον, quam de Clematide Ægyptia dicere, quæ fecundate Zenonem Cittiæum solitum peti, quod procero graciliique & fusco corpore esset, tradit Laertius? His igitur (inquam) quæ nihil ad rem attinent, prætermissis, aio Nepenthes fuisse unum è terra nascentibus; quoddam scilicet herbæ aut virgulti genus. The Chevalier de Meré imagines, that the Nepenthes was nothing else but the Charms of Helena's Conversation. See how he expresseth himself in a Treatise, where he addresses a Lady (b) "Though Homer doth not enlarge upon the Eloquence of Helena, "he who speaks so much of that of Ulysses and of Nestor, he omits not however, by a Mystery of Poetry, to make us sensible, that it was a Pleasure to "hear her speak; and here is in a few Words, what "gives me reason to think so. Ulysses, a long time "after the sacking of Troy, was not able to return "into his Isle of Ithaca; his Son Telemachus was "in pain about him, and to know whether he was "alive or dead, he made a visit to Nestor, who could "not inform him what was become of him. From "thence the young Gentleman continued his "Voyage, and came to Menelaus, where he had "a sight of Helena, and supt with her. He was "very melancholy, and that Princess having "pity on him, made use of a Charm to make him "forget all his Discontents. That Charm, saith "Homer, was a Liquor which she mingled with the "Wine, before she sate down to Table, which Potion was of such a Virtue, that after one had tasted it, it was impossible to shed a Tear all the Day "after. She had another excellent Secret, which "was given her by the Goddess of the Graces. You "know, Madam, that there is no Lady who can "imitate the Sound of your Words; but if she had "observed you, she had made her self so perfect "Mistress of your Voice and Manners, that she "would have been mistaken for you.

(S) She was sav'd by a Miracle.] The Miracle was this: A great Plague depopulated the Town of Lacedæmon: The Gods made it known it should become healthy again, provided they sacrificed every Year a Maid of Quality. The Lot fell once upon the fair Helena: but as she was led to the Altar, an Eagle stoopt, and took away the Knife, and put it on an Heifer; which was the reason that Helena's Life was spared (i).

(T) By saying she was forced to them by the Gods.] I have touch't (k) upon this Point already; but there is something wanting. If some say, that Venus led the ordering of this Woman's Ravishment, to testifie her Gratitude to the Judge, who had determined the Cause in the Dispute of Beauty on her behalf; Others assure us, that she did it to revenge her self for an Affront. Menelaus had promised her a Hecatomb upon his obtaining Helena; but having accomplisht his Wishes, he took no care of his Vow. Venus took this heinously, and to punish him, caused Paris to run away with his Wife (l). Others date the Original of this higher: they pretend that Tyndarus left out Venus in a Sacrifice that he offered to all the Gods, and that in Punishment of this Contempt, Venus fated all the Daughters of that Prince to be Bigamists, Trigamists, and Elopers from their Husbands. The best of all is, that the same Goddess, who had spoiled Tyndarus's Daughters, reproach'd him for their Adulteries. 'Tis said, that these Reproaches so sensibly touch'd him, that to be revenged of her, he put her Feet in Chains. Pausanias can't believe, that Tyndarus would have been so ridiculous, as to imagine he could revenge himself of Venus, by making a Statue, which he should call by her Name, tying it by the Legs. But in this the Historian was unacquainted with his own Religion. He did not know, that on many Occasions, (n) the Heathens discharged their Fury upon the Temple, and Statues of the Gods, whom they believ'd the Authors of their ill Success. And at the bottom, is it not affronting a Prince to abuse his Picture and Statues? Consider the Indignation of Theodosius against the City of Antioch; nothing moved him more sensibly, than the Violences which were offered the Statue of the Empress during the Sedition. See his History, writ by Mr. Fleetier (o). For the rest, I must advertise, that when I spoke of the Indignities which were offered Venus by Tyndarus, I have only reported the Opinion of some Moderns, who have blunder'd in the Translation of Pausanias. 'Tis certain, that the Greek Text does not import, that that Goddess had reproach'd Tyndarus in that manner: They who understand the Greek Tongue, will see that I am not mistaken. Τὸν γὰρ δὴ ἕτερον λόγον, ὡς ἐπ' ἴσῃ τιθεῖεν τιμωρεῖσθαι ὁ Τυνδάρεως γενεὰς ἐπιόντας ἐπὶ Λακεδαίμονα ὑπὸ Μενελάου, τὰ ὀνείδη, ἅτινα ὑπὸ τῆς ἀρχῆς πεποιήμασι, τὰς μὲν δὴ παλλακὰς ἔνιοι κλήθρα πεποιηκέναι μύθου ἕνεκα ἐπιτήδειον· ὄνομα Ἀφροδίτῃ δὲ μάλιστα ἐπιτιθέασιν ἀμαυρὸν ἐπὶ θεᾷ. That is, according to Amasæus's Translation; Nam deam ulciscí voluisse compedibus (fuit enim qui hoc etiam memoriæ prodiderint) exprobrantem (a) illi filiarum adulteria, ut credam, adduci non possum. (b) Quam enim ridiculum, si putasset ab effigie, quam è cedro feciſſet Veneris nomine, injectis compedibus pœnas expeti posse.

(T△) I design to bestow a Note upon.] Menelaus answering the harsh Reproaches of Peleus, declared, That the Will of Helena had not been the cause of those Adventures that had afflicted his Life, but that the Will of the Gods was to be found fault with.

Ἑλένη (c) δ' ἐμὸς οὐχὶ θυμὸς ἦν ἀλλὰ θεῶν.

Helena vero venit in ærumnas non volens, sed divinitus.

This Language was common enough among the Pagans. They imputed to Fortune, that is to say, to God, not only their ill Success, but also their Faults. That Excuse, or that milder Consolation, seemed to be always at Hand, and was immediately recurr'd to. Plutarch teaches us this, mentioning some Verses, which contain a thing a Father said to his Son, and the Son's Answer.

You'll imagine perhaps, that the great Eaſe Men found in making Complaints againſt the Gods, inclin'd them to make uſe of that Subterfuge, without Conſideration and Reflection, and that it was one of thoſe firſt Motions that ariſe in our Minds, before we have time to prepare our ſelves to judge of things; but it is certain, that in many Inſtances this manner of Speech was imploy'd upon mature Conſideration. They who examine not to the bottom, what paſſes in their own Breaſts, eaſily perſwade themſelves that they are free, and that if their Will inclines them to Evil, it is their own Fault, as being by a choice of which they are Maſters. They, who paſs another Judgment, are Perſons that have carefully ſtudied the Springs and Circumſtances of their Actions, and have well conſider'd the Progreſs of the Motion of their Souls. Theſe Perſons for the moſt part doubt of their Free-Will; and proceed even to perſuade themſelves, that their Reaſon and their Underſtandings are Slaves, incapable of reſiſting the Force which drags them where they have no mind to go. Now 'tis this ſort of Perſons eſpecially who charged the Gods with the Blame of their Evil Actions. They call'd to mind, that they had well conſidered, that they kept on in a way pernicious to their Fortune, and ſcandalous to their Reputation, and that they had made many Endeavours to deſtroy the Paſſion that led 'em on; but they were very ſenſible, that all theſe Endeavours had been uſeleſs, and that Reaſon, though call'd to their Aſſiſtance a Thouſand Times, and Vows and Prayers had been utterly unavailable. They concluded then, that it muſt be an occult Cauſe, ſome Superiour Force, that drove and dragg'd them; in a Word, that the Gods were the cauſe of the Paſſions which they felt, and of the pernicious and criminal Conſequences of thoſe Paſſions. Lo then here the opening of the Plot: There is, ſaid they, ſomething Divine in it, juſt as it is in ſome bodily Diſtempers which Nonplus the Skill and Experience of the ableſt Phyſicians. We know what we ought to do, what is moſt uſeful, advantageous and honourable for us, and nevertheleſs we take a contrary Courſe. This is the doing of the Gods. The Poet Perſius addreſſes himſelf to Jupiter, to beg the Favour that he would be pleas'd to make Tyrants acknowledge the Power of Virtue, and feel the dreadful Laſhes of Conſcience, for not having purſu'd it.

Abundance of People of both Sexes, which Hiſtory has made no mention of, have found themſelves in the ſame condition. Love has made them guilty of a thouſand faults whereof they have ſeen the ſhame and danger ſo clearly, as to have indeavoured to prevent them by calling Reaſon to their Succour, and making many wiſhes againſt their Paſſion. It was natural for them to conclude, that they were not the cauſe of their evil Conduct, inaſmuch as they had a reaſonable underſtanding, and a Soul that was free, and Miſtreſs of its Will. This firſt concluſion led them to another, which was that ſome cauſe that was External and Superiour to all their Forces, irreſiſtably ſway'd them. This ſecond concluſion drew from them a third, that God was this external and neceſſitating Cauſe. Thus you ſee the Original of the pretended Divinity of Venus, and Cupid; and becauſe 'tis experienc'd that Jealouſie, Envy, Avarice, Drunkenneſs, the deſire of Revenge, and many other Paſſions make Men commit a thouſand things which reaſon Condemns, and which are even contrary to the true intereſt of Self-love, and againſt a Man's own deſires, it has been believed that the Gods were the influencers of theſe things. The Heathens did not accuſe them therefore becauſe they made no Reflections, but rather becauſe they made a great many Obſervations upon what paſſed in their Souls. If the Pagans had had the juſt Idea of God that we have, which repreſents him as a Being perfectly Holy, they had ſecured themſelves from that raſh Judgment; but attributing to the Gods the ſame faults that Men are ſubject to, nothing hindered them from believing the Gods urg'd Men on to Evil, and rendered the light of Reaſon ineffectual, as well by a preventing delight which neceſſitated the Will, as by an uneaſineſs which had the ſame effect. Paris pleaſed Helena, Jaſon pleaſed Medea; thoſe Women could not think of their union with theſe Objects, without feeling before-hand, an incredible ſatisfaction; nor could they conſider themſelves as ſeparated from them, without being conſcious of as great a Torment. Theſe Impreſſions depended not on their Liberty, and were no more under its command, than the agreeable or diſagreeable ſatisfactions we feel upon our taſting Honey, or Gall. All that theſe two Women could do, was to oppoſe Reaſon and Duty to their two preventing ſenſations; feeble Weapons, if Paris and Jaſon continued to raiſe the ſame Ideas and the ſame impreſſions; ſince in that caſe their Will ſooner or later, would be captivated, and Conſent extorted from it, whatever deſire it had to be unmoved, and to change its Love into Indifference. Unleſs are the Vows, frivolous the Velleities, in the paſſions of those Senſations I have ſpoke of, and whoſe cauſe proceeds not from our ſelves. Whence proceeds it then? The Pagans might in vain look for it, they could not find it upon the Earth, and for that reaſon they caſt it on the Gods. This they might do two ways, either by ſuppoſing a Cupid which wounded the Heart, or by ſuppoſing that the Author of humane Bodies had adjuſted the parts of them with ſuch an Artifice, that for example Jaſon ſhould excite in the Heart and Head of Medea, thoſe motions of the Spirits on which Love machinally and inevitably depends. According to this laſt Principle, if Helena or Medea fell in Love, he muſt be blam'd who faſhion'd and poſtur'd the parts of their Bodies; juſt as, if a Chimney ſhould ſmoke when the Wind blows, it muſt not be imputed to the Wind, but to the Maſon who made the Chimney.

HOW moſt Paſſions and their Effects are involuntary.

This was a Gulph the Pagans could not get out of, and they muſt needs fall into it, as often as they pretended to give a Reaſon of the contrariety that is found betwixt what we do and what we know; and conſequently they fell into it very often: for Humane Life is hardly any thing elſe than a continual Conflict betwixt the Paſſions and the Conſcience, in which the latter has generally the worſt of it. That which is the moſt ſtrange in this Battel, is, that the Victory moſt frequently declares for the Party, which ſhocks all at once the Ideas we have of Virtue and the Knowledge of our temporal Intereſts. I am willing to believe there are many ſo brutiſhly ſtupid, as not to ſee that their Life would be more happy, if they did not cheriſh in their Breaſts the Paſſions that they do: but I can't believe but that the greateſt part of the Jealous and Envious, are fully perſwaded that it would be an incomparable temporal Advantage to be exempt from Jealouſy and Envy, and worthy to be purchaſed at any Rate. A Woman jealous of her Huſband or Gallant, a Huſband jealous of his Wife or Miſtreſs, are the Perſons that have the moſt lively Senſe of their Miſery, and paſſionately wish to be deliver'd from this Tormenter. They do all that's poſſible to drive away this perſecuting Fury; they employ all the Reaſons their Mind is capable of to deceive or undeceive themſelves; but in ſpite of all theſe Efforts Jealouſy ſtands its ground, and they find to their great Torment, that they are more ingenious at inventing what can nouriſh it, than what can weaken or deſtroy it. The ſame almoſt may be ſaid of the Envious: they know very well that Self-Love would find its Account incomparably better, in being content with their condition, and looking on the Proſperity of another with Pleaſure, than in afflicting one ſelf becauſe a Neighbour is advanced and enrich'd above 'em; yet nevertheleſs they torment themſelves and are in a ſad condition (a), when they ſee the good fortune of others, and inſtead of Rejoycing as they ought to do for their own advantage, they are forc'd to ſeek ſome remedy in baſe and perfidious Actions. By Reproaches and ſecret Blows, they oppoſe their Neighbours ſucceſs, and thereby indeavour to mitigate the Malignant Fever that preys upon 'em. What could a Heathen Philoſopher ſay to this? Ought not he to acknowledge a ſuperiour Cauſe in it, and rank all this ſort of People in the number of Phanaticks, poſſeſt Enthuſiaſts, and of all thoſe in general that are believ'd to be acted with a divine Impetus (b)? Note, that Ovid (c) ſuppoſes that the Jealouſy which Aglauros, the Daughter of Cecrops King of Athens, conceiv'd againſt her Siſter, was of Divine Inſpiration. The Chriſtian Religion is the only Syſtem that can reſolve theſe Difficulties; it teaches us, that ſince the firſt Man fell from the State of Innocence, all his Poſterity have been ſo ſubjected to Corruption, that without a ſupernatural Grace they are neceſſarily Slaves of Impiety, (d) inclin'd to do Evil, unprofitable to all Good. Reaſon, Philoſophy, the Ideas of Virtue, the knowledge of the true intereſt of Self-love, all this is unable to reſiſt the Paſſions. The Empire which was given to the ſuperiour Faculty of the Soul, over the inferiour, was taken from Man, from the time of Adam's Sin.

Thus it is that Divines explain the Change which Sin introduc'd; but as the greateſt part of Metaphors muſt not be preſt beyond a certain Point, we muſt not abuſe this; for it would not be reaſonable to ſay, that in the State of Innocence, the inferiour Faculty was under the condition it is at preſent, and that no diſorder could ariſe from it, becauſe the ſuperiour could always jealouſly interpoſe to withſtand it. This would be to ſuppoſe that the Body of Man as proceeding from the Hands of his Creator, was actually turned towards Senſualities and damnable Paſſions, which would be caſting a blemiſh on the perfections of the ſupreme Being.

The Faſhions of Head-dreſſes may be ſo diverſified, that the agreeableneſs of a Face may not perhaps ſuffer any diminution by the loſs of Hair: but in general 'tis certain that loſs is reckoned a very formidable Diſaſter to Beauty. See the Note (G) in the Article Anacreon.

HELIODORUS, a Native of * Emesa in Phœnicia is more known by the Romance he Compos'd in (A) his Youth, than by the Bishoprick of Trica † to which he was afterwards preferr'd. There are few that will believe he was Depos'd by a Synod (B) for not being willing to consent to the suppression of that Romance. Nicephorus is the only Author that says it. Socrates relates ‡ that Heliodorus introduc'd the Custom of Deposing Ecclesiasticks, who lay with their Wives after their Ordination. 'Tis a favourable prejudice for the Chastity of that Prelate. His Romance too shews him to be a Lover of that Virtue. For the Hero in the Story is of such a Modesty as has given (C) occasion to many biting Railleries. The Translation of Photius does not ‡ Hist. Eccles. l. 5. c. 22.

* There is great Probability, Madam, that her Beauty was not alone, since all the Gods interess'd themselves to give her to their Favourites; and if she had no more than a good Face and a fine Shape, they had made 'em but an indifferent Present. I imagine that what they esteem'd most valuable in her, was the faculty she had to please, and to get the Love of others by her Conversation. Add to this the Words of the same Author, which I have related in mentioning the Nepenthes (b).

I don't examine whether he be in the right as to the particular of the beautiful Helena; but his Maxim in General seems to have truth in it (c). Beauty without the Charms of Wit and Language, is of no great Force: and if it makes any Conquests, 'tis after the manner of those brave Generals, who suddainly subdue a Province, but know not how to keep it: The Empire of Beauty is as much maintain'd by the Charms of Wit, as by those of the Face. They are two sorts of Graces that stand in need of one another, and mutually perform good Offices. Some insipid and ridiculous Discourses would be extreamly distasteful, if the Beauty of the Person did not invest them with I know not what sort of a taking Dress: And some Beauties of the Body would make no Impression, were they not set off with some agreeable Graces of the Mind. These are Assistances that are reciprocally given. But as Wit is most times the principal Instrument in preserving the Conquest, and very frequently in making it, it may be said to be that which contributes most to the Establishing the Dominion of Beauty. The Poet that assures us, there is no less force requir'd to preserve than to obtain a Conquest, is one of the greatest Legislators in the Empire of Love; and he applies that Sentence to the Case we are upon. Nay, he goes further, he will have the Acquisition to be less difficult than the Preservation.

Non (d) minor est virtus, quam quærere, parta tueri:

Nunc (e) mihi, si quando, Puer & Cytherêa, favete:
Nunc Erato: nam tu nomen amoris habes.

The Historians have the same thought concerning the progress of Arms. (f)

(A) The Romance he compos'd in his Youth.] The Title of it is Æthiopica, and it contains the Amours of Theagenes and Chariclea. We find an Extract of it in Photius (g). Mr. Huet judges that Heliodorus was with respect to Romancers, what Homer was with respect to the Poets; that is, his Work serv'd as an Original and Plan for a great number of succeeding Romances. (h) Eum sibi sequentium temporum fabulatores Romanenses tanquam exemplum proposuerunt ad imitandum, & tam verè omnes dici possunt ex hoc fonte, quàm Poëtæ ex Homerico suas, ſit ut dicam, aquas hausisse. The first Edition of this Book is, as I take it, that of Basil 1534. Opsopœus, who Dedicated it to the Senate of Nuremberg, assures us, that a Soldier sav'd the Manuscript, when the Library of Buda was pillaged (i). Stanislaus Warszewiczius a Polish Knight, is the Author of the Latin Translation, which was Printed at Basil with the Greek, in the Year 1551. Amiot began his French Version by this Work. Melin of St. Gelais Bishop of Angouleme, has turn'd a good part of it into French Verse (k). John Boudelot's Notes upon this Romance are very Learned. They were Printed at Paris in the Year 1619. with the Greek of Heliodorus and the Translation of the Polish Knight.

(B) That he was Depos'd by a Synod.] Nicephorus (l) tells the Story, that a Synod giving Heliodorus his Choice, either to burn his Romance or renounce his Bishoprick, he chose the latter. This seems Fabulous; a thing so remarkable, would have been related by many Historians; and we should not have had it preserv'd only by Nicephorus, a Man of great Credulity and little Judgment. (m) Quæ omnia eò me facilè reducunt, ut diffidam iis maximè quæ addit Nicephorus, scriptor credulus, sapientiæ & fidei non satis spectatæ, Synodum scilicet Provincialem cognito periculo, in quod lectio fabulæ hujus, cui autoris sui dignitas tantum ponderis & autoritatis dabat, juvenes suapte naturâ ad id propensos & quasi nutantes impelleret, eam ipsi conditionem obtulisse, ut aut opus suum flammis aboleret, aut suâ dignitate cederet; eumque, quod ultimum erat, prætulisse. Would Socrates have been silent of it in a place where he remarks that Heliodorus compos'd some Books of Love in his young Days? Οὗ λόγοι πολλοὶ ἐρωτικὰ ἐμφαίνοντες, ἃ νέος ὢν ἔτι ὁ ἀνὴρ συνεγράψατο: Cujus nomine circumferuntur amatorii libri quos ille dum juvenis esset composuit, & Æthiopicos inscripsit (n). Valasius, not content to reject as a Fable Nicephorus's Tale, won't so much as believe the Romance was made by Heliodorus the Bishop. See his Notes upon that place of Socrates. Let us hear what Mr Sorel says. I can't believe that Heliodorus was a Bishop, and so foolish as to choose rather to lose his Bishoprick than to burn his Book, according to the Option that was given him. These are little Stories forg'd at Pleasure; for if his Book was so Scandalous, that it could not be suffer'd to be Publish'd, they would have forbidden it, tho' he had quitted his Dignity, so that he would have lost his Aim (o). This Author had better have given his Judgment without any Reason; for the Reason he offers is good for nothing. The Condemnation of a Book by a Synod, does not hinder it from being read, known, and commended according to its Merit; and consequently Heliodorus would not have been defeated of his end, tho' the Bishops, who gave him his choice, had Condemn'd his Romance. Father Vavasseur has argued in a more solid manner, in saying it was no longer in Heliodorus's power to suppress his Book; whence 'tis to be concluded that the Bishops did not give him that Option which is spoke of. What advantage could accrue to Morality from it? (p) Neutrum, quantum opinio mea est, verè dicitur. Neque lata Episcopo conditio tam præpostera, tamque gravis: neque ab illo accepta, aut repudiata quoquo modo: quod ipse, qui narrat, abunde narratione sua refellit. An verò fuit in potestate Heliodori, ut aboleret ignı, ac perderet opus suum, aut omnino suppressum teneret, quod jam exisset in vulgus, & manibus omnium evolveretur, quodque juventus periculo aliquo, damnoque morum, ut vult Nicephorus, legendo contrivisset? He adds, that Petavius did not believe the Narrative of Nicephorus.

(C) Of such a Modesty as has given occasion to many biting Railleries.] Observe a little this Passage of Parnassus Reform'd, where Theagenes speaks. 'If things had been faithfully reported as they were 'tranſacted, I should have no reason to complain, 'I should not find fault with my Romancer: But he 'represents me as an insensible Creature, and attributes to me such a ridiculous Modesty, as is offended with the most innocent Liberties; making 'me give my Mistress a Box on the Ear rather than 'permit her to salute me. 'Tis my part (Chariclea 'interrupts him) to complain of the Box on the 'Ear you speak of. If it be scandalous for you to 'have given it, it is much more so for me to have 'receiv'd it; and the Reparation you may pretend 'to expect from Heliodorus, belongs to me alone. Now observe Heliodorus's Answer. The Box on the Ear which disturbs you, is an Argument of your Modesty, says he to Theagenes; 'tis the effect of a Virtue which is much to your Advantage, and thereby I have preserv'd that Decorum which the Dignity of my not well expreſs the Elogy that is given to the chaſt Amours of Theagenes and Chariclea; for (D) according to the Tranſlation, we ſhould believe that Heliodorus made a Romance upon the Amours of an Husband and his Wife, which would be very abſurd. Some one has pretended that Heliodorus was not a Chriſtian, but he goes upon (E) very weak Reaſons. Mr Huet * does not doubt that the Author of this Romance was Biſhop of Trica, in the Reign of Theodoſius; but he thinks it cannot be prov'd, that Biſhop Heliodorus, to whom St. Jerom wrote Letters, was Biſhop of Trica. He thinks likewiſe that they who ſhould affirm it, could not be ſolidly confuted. If the depoſing of Heliodorus was true, it would be a great Inſtance of the Fondneſs of Authors for their Words. A modern (F) Writer knew ſome Men who would have done what is attributed to the Biſhop of Trica.

my Character obliged me to. 'Tis true, replied Theagenes, that for a Biſhop (a), you have repreſented your own Character well enough in that place, but you would have repreſented it better, if you had Burn'd your Romance, or if you had never thought of Writing it. Lovers have nothing to do with Epiſcopal Virtues, and Biſhops don't well agree with the liberties of Lovers. A veſtal Chaſtity ill becomes Heroes, whoſe Love ought to be diſingag'd from all thoſe ſcrupulous Formalities which check noble Tranſports and becoming Raptures. 'Tis obſervable that the Author had nothing to anſwer to Chariclea's Complaint. And indeed what could be ſaid to an accuſation ſo well grounded? Muſt not the Hercels of a Romance act a very ridiculous Part, who would Kiſs her Lover, but receives a Box on the Ear from him for her Pains.

THUS it is I finiſh'd that Remark, in the firſt Edition of this Dictionary. I ſuppos'd that Mr. Gueret having ſhewn a great deal of Wit and Judgment, in his Parnaſſus Reform'd, had not bottom'd his Railleries upon a falſhood of his own invention. For nothing could have more contradicted the Laws of Criticiſm and Satyr. Believing therefore he could not be guilty of ſuch a fault, I did not queſtion but the fact was ſo as he relates it; and for that Reaſon I was not at the pains of examining the Original. But Mr. du Rondel had no ſooner read the Note C of this Article, but he wrote me word, there was nothing in it like Mr. Gueret's Tale; he ſhew'd me the circumſtances of the Action, and made it appear that Theagenes deſerv'd not to be blam'd. I have now been reading the place where Heliodorus recites that Adventure, and am convinc'd with my own Eyes that Mr du Rondel is in the right, and that the Author of Parnaſſus Reform'd, abuſes the publick, Licentiouſly ſporting in Railleries which ought rather to be called Impoſtures. Theagenes and Chariclea, ſeparated from each other by the Strokes of capricious Fortune, that are very frequent in Romances, happen'd to come near Memphis at the ſame time. They had made no Allignation, nor taken ſo much as the ſame Road; it fortun'd that Chariclea arriv'd near the Town, when Theagenes was walking about the Walls, on an occaſion which furniſh'd the Inhabitants with a noble Shew. She knew him at a diſtance; for, as Heliodorus obſerves (c), Lovers Eyes are very ſubtil. She was in ſuch a Rapture upon the ſight of that Object, that as if a Breeze had Stung her, ſhe flew immediately to Theagenes, and threw her Arms about his Neck without ſpeaking a word. She was in a ſorry Dreſs, and her Face all diſmear'd, which made him take her for a Proſtitute and caſt her from him: But not being able to get rid of her, he gave her a Box o' th' Ear. 'Tis eaſy to conclude from this Narration that the Retainer of Pontus has quite alter'd the matter of Fact, which makes all his Railleries inſipid and abſurd. Chariclea, I confeſs, receiv'd a box o' th' Ear; but it cannot with any colour of juſtice be affirm'd that Theagenes gave Chariclea a box o' th' Ear, ſince he believ'd he ſtruck one of thoſe Creatures which go by the name of Gypſies. Apply to this what the Civilians and Canoniſts have concerning the Ignorance that excuſes.

It is well known that the Wandering and unfortunate Life theſe two Lovers led, is rather a reaſon why the Hero ſhould not change his Miſtreſs, now he knew her manner, than that they ſhould alter the object of their Love. In ſhort it is a ſurprizing, in the loſtneſs of a Life, altogether Crimeful and Serene, and mixt with Adventures. But the Tranſlator's principal fault is his ſaying, they exactly obſerv'd the Conjugal Faith. How could that be, ſince they were not Married? They were not Marry, according to Cuſtom, till the end of the Book. 'Tis the conſtitution of Heliodorus's Romance. I place in the Margin the true Verſion of Plutus's Words. (E) He goes upon very weak Reaſons.] The firſt is that (b) Amot ſays, that Philoſtratus mentions a Sophiſt, called Heliodorus, a Native of Emeſa, that he might ſpeak of him. The ſecond is, that this Author putting in the mouth of his Hero, that he was a Phœnician, a Native of the City of Emeſa, one of the Race of the Sun, comes to all Ironical to ſuppoſe him being a Chriſtian. For there is no doubt but a Chriſtian and a Biſhop to boot, would be mad if he durſt ſay he was a Deſcendant of that Luminary. I own not ſay, that the firſt Reaſon proves nothing; the ſecond has ſomething more in it: But it cannot be founded upon Proof. 'Tis certain, that in the Chronicons of the IVth. Century (i), mention is made of the Antiquity of their Family. Why then ſhould we not believe, that Heliodorus had mentioned his? He did not believe that he owed his Origin to the Sun; but he might think he ought to [illegible] it by it: 'Twas a Tale his Family willingly; and it did it Honour, and though the Foundation was falſe, yet advantageous Conſequences might be drawn from it, with Reſpect to the Antiquity of his Houſe, which might be a ſufficient Conſolation for a Chriſtian thus to deteſt the Nobleſs of his Extraction. Add to this, that Heliodorus was not a Biſhop when he compoſed his Romance. He wrote the firſt Vigour of Youth; and [illegible] not name himſelf, he might the more freely point out his Race, according to the ancient Tradition of his Family.

HELOISA, Concubine, and afterwards Wife of Peter Abelard, a Nun, and afterwards Prioreſs of Argenteuil, and laſtly Abbeſs of the Paraclet, has occaſion'd too much Diſcourſe of her, not to deſerve an Article larger than ordinary in this Work. She had an Uncle (A) by her Mother's ſide, named Fulbert, who was Canon of Paris, and who loved her tenderly. He took an extraordinary Care of her good Education; and as ſhe had a great deal of Wit, ſhe in a little time grew ſo learned, that her Reputation was ſpread all over the Kingdom (B). And beſides, ſhe was a handſome Woman (C). There was at that time a famous Doctor in Paris, who read publick Lectures with wonderful Reputation. His Name was Peter Abelard, the moſt ſubtle Logician of his Age, who firſt brought the Scholaſtick Philoſophy and Divinity in Vogue. He liv'd with all the Figure that a Man of his Profeſſion could deſire; he had abundance of Scholars, was look'd upon as the ableſt Maſter, and got a great deal of Money; but he made no Love, which he thought was a conſiderable Flaw in his good Fortune. That nothing therefore might be wanting to his Happineſs, he reſolv'd to become a Lover, and choſe Heloiſa for his Miſtreſs. We have told * in another Place the Reaſons that led him to this Choice, and how he got in with the Canon, under the Notion of a Domeſtick Tutor. Poor honeſt Fulbert hoped, that under ſuch a Maſter, Heloiſa would make a wonderful Proficiency in the Sciences; but he found ſhe learnt only the Art of making Love. She had an incomparable Diſpoſition for it. She was taught to make ſo great Progreſs in a little Time, that her Maſter ſucceeded from the firſt

(A) An Uncle by her Mother's ſide, named Fulbert.] This is all I have found of Certainty concerning Heloiſa's Genealogy; and therefore I have not ſaid ſhe was legitimately deſcended from the ancient Houſe of Montmorenci. I have read this indeed, in the Apologetical Preface of Francis d'Amboiſe (b): but ſince he cites no Author for it, and Andrew du Chêne (c) makes no mention of it, I ſuſpect the Credit of it; and the more, becauſe Heloiſa owns in her Letters, that her Family (d) had been much honoured by her Marriage with Abelard, and that he had married much beneath himſelf (e). Papyrius Maſſo advances, that Heloiſa was the natural Daughter of one John, a Canon of Paris. Andrew du Chêne has reaſon not to be content with that, ſince he does not ſay where he had that curious Circumſtance; but he has no Reaſon to oppoſe againſt that Annaliſt, the Calendar of the Paraclet, where are theſe Words. VII. Cal. Januar. Obiit (f) Hubertus Canonicus Dominæ Heloiſæ avunculus. For what's eaſier than to reconcile Papyrius Maſſo with this Calendar? Can't the ſame Woman be the Baſtard of one Canon, and the Niece of another? But once more: he that ſhall ſay Heloiſa was the natural Daughter of one Canon John, and cites no Author for it, will not merit Credit. If any Canon were to be ſuſpected thereupon, it would rather be Canon Fulbert than any other. For that tender Affection which Abelard aſcribes to him for Heloiſa is ſo uncommon among Uncles (g), and ſo plainly reſembles the Affection of the beſt Parents, that there might be ſome Grounds to imagine, that Fulbert did as a great many others, who cannot be Fathers by the Canons: They conceal that Relation, under that of Uncle, and educate their Children under the Title of Nephews. This is what may be ſuppos'd. But a Suppoſition ought not to regulate the Style, nor hinder us from giving People the Titles, under which the Publick has known them. Fulbert in a Book, muſt be only an Uncle. Note, that according to Papyrius Maſſo, the Canon who caus'd Heloiſa to be brought up, and Peter Abelard to be caſtrated, was call'd John. Therefore that Hiſtorian does not pretend that ſhe was the Niece of one Canon, and the Natural Daughter of another. He pretends, that the Canon, whom all the other Authors name Fulbert, and whom they take to be the Uncle of Heloiſa, was her Father, and that his Name was John (h).

(B) So learned, that her Reputation was ſpread.] Let us hear Abelard. (i) Qui (Fulbertus) eam quanto amplius diligebat, tanto diligentius in omnem quam poterat ſcientiam literarum promoveri ſtuduerat. Quæ cum per faciem non eſſet infima, per abundantiam literarum erat ſuprema. Nam quis bonum hoc, literatoriæ ſcilicet ſcientiæ, in mulieribus eſt rarius, eò amplius puellam commendabat, & in toto regno nominatiſſimam fecerat. In that Age a young Woman of but indifferent Scholarſhip, might have paſs'd for a Miracle: which is to be well obſerv'd by thoſe who would not carry their Ideas of our Heloiſa beyond due Meaſures; and yet it muſt be granted that ſhe deſerves an honourable Place, among other Women that have been learned. She not only underſtood the Latin Tongue, but alſo the Greek and Hebrew: 'tis the ſame Abelard who witneſſes it in the Letter he wrote to the Nuns of the Paraclet (k). Francis d'Amboiſe tells us, (l) how ſhe cunningly ſatisfied St. Bernard, asking the Reaſon why in the Monaſtery of the Paraclet, when they repeated the Lord's Prayer, they did not ſay, Panem noſtrum quotidianum, but panem noſtrum ſuperſubſtantialem. She gave him a Reaſon taken from the Original, ſaying we muſt follow the Greek Verſion of the Goſpel, which St. Matthew wrote in Hebrew. I know not whether ſuch an Anſwer could pleaſe St. Bernard, but I doubt not but it was able to puzzle him; and I wiſh with all my Heart the Story were true; it would be an inſtance how a Woman did perplex a great Author in a Controverſial Point, by alledging the Greek Text. I was ſorry therefore, I confeſs, when conſulting (m) the Letter quoted by Francis d'Amboiſe, I found that Heloiſa had no hand in it, and that the whole Remark is Abelard's, who wrote thereupon to St. Bernard, after having known from Heloiſa the Exceptions that were made to panem ſuperſubſtantialem. Let this be ſaid without Prejudice to the Learning of that Abbeſs. But if any one ſhould imagine that ſhe got her Learning after ſhe became a Recluſe, I might refer him to a Letter of Petrus Venerabilis, Abbot of Clugni, which declares, that before that time ſhe had great Knowledge; Necdum, ſays he to her, (n) ætas adoleſcentiæ exceſſeram, necdum in juveniles annos evaſeram, quando nomen non quidem adhuc religionis tuæ, ſed honeſtorum tamen & laudabilium ſtudiorum mihi fama innotuit. Audiebam tunc temporis mulierem, licet necdum ſæculi nexibus expeditam, literatoriæ ſcientiæ & ſtudio ſecularis ſapientiæ ſummam operam dare, quo efferendo ſtudio tuo & mulieres omnes eviciſti, & pene viros univerſos ſuperaſti. The Monk of Auxerre ſays ſhe was well acquainted with Latin and Hebrew, and the Calendar of the Paraclet thus ſpeaks of her: Heloiſe mere & premiere Abbeſſe de ceans, de doctrine & religion tres-reſplendiſſante (o).

(C) Beſides, ſhe was a handſome Woman.] I obſerve a great many Authors aſcribe to her a raviſhing Beauty; but are they more credible than Abelard himſelf, who having more reaſon to enlarge than diminiſh Things, contents himſelf to ſay, that ſhe was not the laſt of her Sex in Beauty, but that ſhe was the firſt in Erudition. Cum per faciem non eſſet infima, per abundantiam literarum erat ſuprema. Is it thus that a Man would ſpeak of an abſolute Beauty? Would first Favour to the last, and that without any Thoughts of demanding a Promise of Marriage. Abelard so gave himself up (D) to his Pleasures with her, that he grew negligent of his Lectures. He confesses himself, that he kept no Measures, but plunged into those Pleasures, without Distinction of Times and Places; that is of Holy-Days, or Worky-Days, or of Holy and Profane Places, that he made no further Progress in Philosophy, and that all the Productions of his Thoughts dwindled into Sonnets (F) and Love-Verses. His Scholars quickly scented the matter, by enquiring into the Reasons of the Abatement of his Lectures. The Scandal was quickly propagated all over the Town, and at last (G) it reach'd the Ears of her Uncle, but found him at first

Would a Lover concern'd to justifie his Choice, and the Violence of his Passion, employ such a Figure of Rhetorick? Some observe (p) that Heloisa was Eighteen Years old when Abelard debauch'd her: I have not met with that Circumstance in any ancient Author. 'Tis true, the Word (q) adolescentula, which Abelard makes use of, is very applicable to the Age of 18; and so is that of juvencula (r), which she used; but nothing can be made out by such a Proof. 'Tis a meer whim to say, that Abelard (f) in his Roman de la Rose, drew the Picture of Heloisa, under the Name of Beauty. That Romance did not see the Light till after their Deaths.

(D) So gave himself up to his Pleasures.] We must hear him speak, if we would lose nothing of the force of his Expressions. (a) Nullus à cupidis intermissus est gradus amoris, & si quid insolitum amor excogitare potuit, est additum. Et quo minus illa fueramus experti gaudia ardentius illis insistebamus, & minus in fastidium vertebantur. He compares himself to those who have suffer'd a long Hunger, and come afterwards to a plentiful Table. A Man that has liv'd chastly, falls into a greater Excess with his Wife, than a Debauchee.

(E) Without Distinction of Times and Places.] We must still hear him speak, in a Letter he wrote to Heloisa, a long time after their Marriage-Engagement. He puts her a little in mind of their past Conduct, and how he caress'd her in a Corner of the Refectory of the Nuns of Argenteuil, finding no other convenient Place, and having no respect to the Holy Virgin, to whom that Place was consecrated. (b) Nosti post nostri conjugii considerationem conjugii cum Argenteoli cum Sanctimonialibus in claustro conversabamur, ne die quadam privatim ad te visitandum venirem, & quæ ibi tecum meæ libidinis egerit intemperantia in quadam etiam parte ipsius refectorii, cum quo alias decreverimus non haberemus. Nosti, inquam, id impudentissime tunc actum esse, in tam reverendo loco & summæ Virginis consecrato——Quid tristitiæ fornicationes & impudentissimas referam pollutiones quæ conjugium præcesserunt? A little after he tells her, that she knows very well, that neither the most solemn Feasts, nor even the Passion-Day, discouraged them from wallowing in that filthy Course; and that whenever she began to be scrupulous, he made use of Threatnings and Whipping to bring her to Consent (c). Behold a Man perfectly free from the Superstitions of those who observed Days and Feasts, New-Moons and Sabbaths. (†).

(F) Dwindled into Sonnets and Love Verses.] This we learn from himself. (d) Ita negligentem & tepidum lecto tunc habebat ut jam nihil ex ingenio, sed ex usu cuncta proferrem, nec jam nisi recitator prostitutorum esset inventorum, & si qua invenire liceret, carmina essent amatoria, non philosophiæ secreta. He adds, that these Verses were still sung in many Provinces, and especially amongst Persons that made Love: Quorum etiam carminum plerique adhuc in multis, sicut & ipsa nosti, frequentantur & decantantur regionibus, ab his maxime quos vita similis oblectat. Heloisa tells us more of it. She says, that he had two Qualifications which other Philosophers wanted, by which he could immediately become Master of all Womens Hearts: viz. he wrote finely, and sung well; his Love Verses were so pretty, and his Songs so agreeable, both as to the Words and Airs, that every Body was charm'd with them, and full of the Author's Praises. Women were not satisfied with being charm'd with Abelard's Songs and Verses; they were as much taken with his Person, and loved him passionately; and as the greatest part of his Verses spoke only of his Love for Heloisa; the Name of that Mistress flew presently into the Provinces, and made infinite Ladies envy her good Fortune. I enervate much the Force of her Expressions, and I believe they ought not to be literally taken. As she lov'd Abelard even to Distraction, she fancied no Woman could look upon him, but must fall into the same Passion; which made her say, there was neither Wife nor Maid, but that in Abelard's Ablence was desiring his Company, and in his Presence was all a Fire with Love; and that Queens and Princesses envied the Pleasures she reap'd in the Enjoyment of such a Man. See here the Latin, which speaks more significantly. (e) Quæ conjugata, quæ virgo non concupiscebat absentem, & non exardebat in præsentem? Quæ Regina vel propotens femina gaudiis meis non invidebat vel thalamis? Duo autem, fateor, tibi specialiter inerant quibus feminarum quamlibet animos statim allicere poteras, dictandi videlicet & cantandi gratia, quæ cæteros minimè Philosophos affectare esse novimus. Quibus quidem quasi indo quodam laborum exercitii recreans philosophici, plerasque amatorio metro vel rithmo compositas reliquisti cantiones, quæ præ nimia suavitate tam dictaminis quam cantus sæpius frequentata, tuum inore omnium nomen incessanter tenebant, ut etiam illiteratos melodiæ dulcedo tui non fuerit immemores esse. Atque hinc maxime in amorem tui feminæ suspirabant. Et cum horum pars maxima carminum nostros decantaret amores, multis me (f) regionibus brevi tempore nuncupavi, & multarum in me feminarum accendit meditam. If the Roman de la Rose had been Abelard's Performance, and if he had Characterised his Heloisa under the Name of Beauty, she would not have been able to have conceal'd it; and here was the proper Place to speak of it. So that if we did not know that this Romance was written an hundred Years after Abelard, we might learn from Heloisa's Silence, that there is no reason for ascribing it to him in the little Book I have quoted more than once (g). Much less has any one reason to make Heloisa the Author of this Report in the Translation of her Letter. But to return to our Subject: A Man would not believe, were it not for Experience, that Verses, Letters, and Sonnets, had the Power of advancing so much the Affairs of a Lover; but here is a Witness of it that is worth a Thousand. The Wits of this Age complain, that their Wares have not the same effect as in the time of our Ancestors. The Times are chang'd, I confess, but not entirely. See the new Letters against Mamboug's (h) History of Calvinism. As for what Heloisa relates, relating to the Weakness of those of her own Sex with respect to Abelard, 'tis confirm'd by a certain Prior named Foulques; it is necessary to read it.

(G) At last it reach'd the Ears of her Uncle.] That Word at last seems at first to signify something: but they that know the World, are not ignorant that on such Occasions, they who are most concern'd in a Piece of News, are the last that hear it. Abelard cites upon this Subject, a notable Passage (i) from a Letter of St. Jerome to Sabinian. Solemnis mala domus nostræ scire novissimi, ac liberorum ac conjugum vitia vicinis canentibus ignorare. The Disorders of our Wives and Children, are the Theam of all the Neighbourhood, when we know nothing as yet of these Disorders; but we come to know them at last, it being impossible a single Person should be ignorant of what is known by all the World besides. Sed quod novissimè scitur, utique sciri (k) quandoque contingit, & quod omnes deprehendunt non est facile unum latere. St. Jerome, in another place, has confirm'd this Maxim, by two great Examples; the first is that of Sylla, the second of Pompey. The Gallantries of Metella, the Wife of Sylla, were the Town-talk of Athens before her Husband heard any thing of her Lewdness. The Affronts of the Athenians, against whom he made War, taught him the first News of it. The Adulteries of Mucia, Pompey's Wife, were so publick, that every one supposed he was acquainted with them. And yet he knew nothing of the matter, till told of it by a Man that serv'd under his Command. *L. cantabatur & Sylla ignorabat, secretaque domus fuae primum hostium conscio didicit. Cn. Pompeio Mucianam uxorem impudicam quam Pontici Spadones & Mithridatica ambitiosa catervae, cum eum putarent caeteri secretum pati, indicavit in expeditione comminato, & vultum totius orbis tristi nuncio conservavit (l). The Emperor Claudius might be brought for a third Example, who (m) knew nothing of the Infamy of Messalina, when all the World knew she prostituted her self in the Stews, and had carried with her many Ladies, and to compleat her Impudence, had married another Man. Our Age has furnish'd us with one Instance of this kind, in the Mareschal de la———. 'Tis affirm'd (tho' I can scarce believe it) that he knew nothing of his Wife's Commerce with the Count de——, when the Son whom that Count had by Her, had been already naturaliz'd in full Parliament. Even moderate Fortunes are not exempt from this Irregularity. How many People are there that know all the News of the Town, except what dishonours their own Family? They resemble him whom Martial ridicules so pleasantly (n), and are little better for the ancient Proverb, (o) Ædilus in nostris quae prava aut recta gerantur. Men of Letters, I mean those that dwell much in their Closets, and have their Head always pregnant with some Composition, are often found in the Condition we are talking of. As familiar as they are with the domestick Misfortunes of Sylla and Pompey, who are dead many Years ago, they little think the same Trick is play'd them not far from their own Study. This is the way of the World.

A WRITER of the XVIth. Century, brings a famous Example to prove the Maxim he had laid down, That they who are most concern'd to know their Family Misfortunes, are the last that know them; whereas they are the first that learn the News of what does but little concern them. Solet usu venire, (says he) (p) ut denegatur mala ultimi sint qui norint, quorum maxime interest ea non ignorare, eadem principes norint alieni, & quorum nullus ad eos pertinet sensus. Having given some Reasons of that unaccountable Conduct, he says, that it was not long since a great King punish'd with Death the Dishonourers of his Nuptial Bed, and that the Execution was so sudden, that there did not intervene one Hour betwixt their Accusation and their Death; an Argument, that that Prince did not hear of that Debauchery sooner, whereas the News of it had spread far and wide into Foreign Countries. (q) Accidit hoc quidem, me puero, in magna atque illustri Europae regia, quo minus diu obscura res esse posset, ut in regina, lasti pudoris fama prius apud exteras gentes longe lateque evagata emanaret, quam is, cujus in eo erat laesa majestas, maculam regio nomini impositam, eorum sanguine quorum erat scelere violata, eluerit. Satis quidem potuit indicis esse, postremum omnium resciisse, tam sumptum de vera supplicium, ut inter id, & delatam fontium nomen, ne hora quidem momentum intercedere sit passus.

(H) A Thousand Arguments to put him out of Conceit with the conjugal Knot.] These Arguments may be reduc'd to two Heads; to the Danger and Dishonour to which Marriage would expose Abelard. I know my Uncle's Temper, (says she to him) nothing will appease his Rage against you; and then what Glory will it be to me to be your Wife, since I shall ruine your Reputation by it? What Curses have not I reason to fear, if I shall rob the World of so bright a Luminary in it? What Injury shall I not do the Church? What concern shall I not give the Philosophers? What a Shame and Injury will it be to you, whom Nature has form'd for the publick Good, to be monopoliz'd by a Woman? Consider these Words of St. Paul, Art thou loosed from a Wife? seek not a Wife. And if the Counsel of this great Apostle, and the Exhortations of the Holy Fathers cannot dissuade you from that heavy Burden; consider at least what the Philosophers have said. Hear Theophrastus proving by so many Reasons, that a Wise Man ought not to marry. Hear what Cicero, when he had divorc'd his Wife Terentia, answer'd to Hirtius, proposing a Match to him with his Sister; that he could not accept that Offer, because he could not divide his Thoughts betwixt Philosophy and a Wife. Besides, consider what Conformity there is betwixt Servant-maids and Scholars, Ink-horns and Cradles, Books and Distaffs, Pens and Spindles? How will you be able to bear in the midst of Theological (e) and Philosophical Meditations, the Bawlings of Children, the Stinks of Nurses, and the Dominance of House-keeping? I say nothing of the Stink and Nastiness that attends little Children. The Rich can screen all these Inconveniences from them, by the several Apartments in their Houses. The daily Cares and Expences cannot disturb them; but it is not so with Philosophers; and whoever would heap up Wealth, and engage in worldly Affairs, makes himself incapable of the Functions of Divinity and Philosophy. Observe the Conduct of the ancient Sages, both amongst the Jews and Heathens; if Pagans and Laymen have preferr'd Celibacy to Marriage, what a Disgrace would it be for a Clergy-man and a Canon to prefer sensual Pleasures before Divine Offices? But if you are but in little Concern for the Prerogative of your Priesthood, remember at least the Character and Dignity of a Philosopher. The Conclusion of her Sermon was, that he would shew more Honour to himself, and more Love to her in the quality of a Gallant, than of a Husband; that she desired to be united to him, not by the necessity of a conjugal Bond, but by the sole Affection of her Heart, and that their Pleasures would be infinitely more sensible, if they saw each other only from time to time. We shall speak of this last Reason in the Rem. (f). In the mean time, consider Pope Eugenius's Thought upon Heloisa's Discourse. I will not (says he) (f) represent to you all the Reasons wherewith she tried to gain him; but I can assure you I never read in any Orator, so many fine Thoughts, and persuasive Sentences to gain her Point, as she us'd on this Account. I must acquaint my Reader, that I have extreamly abridg'd this Lady's Remonstrance, and that I was surpriz'd, not to find one Reason borrowed (g) from her Lover's being in Orders. Does not this seem to prove, that it was not then believ'd that the Law of Celibacy was an Obligation on Ecclesiastick Persons?

(I) all sentiments of Honour.] It often happens that the passion of Love stifles or surmounts the sentiments of Conscience; but it is rarely observ'd to suppress the sense of Honour: And excepting a few People of mean Birth, who for most times have not had common Education, all the young Women that are overcome, put one or other of these four Strings to their Bow. They either hope they shall not conceive, or by some Medicine to procure Abortion, or to lie in privately, or to Marry their Gallant: And this shews that if Love be sometimes the strongest Tyrant in the World, 'tis a Tyrant that leaves Honour in possession of its Rights. See the famous Sonnet about abortion, where we see the power of Honour, and the power of Love, reciprocally Conquer'd and Victorious. Our Heloisa was so ragingly in Love, that she valued not her Honour or Reputation. For in the first place she was over-joyed with the sense (b) of being with Child; and in the second place she did all that was possible to prevent her Marriage with the Father of it. Two things, which are not only rarer than the most havock in her Soul, that she could never cure it (K). In vain poor Abelard lost his Virility (L), in vain she took the Vail upon her: There remain'd still a spice of the same Madness (M): And it is not from the Portuguese Letters that we first learn'd that it only belongs to Nuns to speak of Love. The Letters of Heloisa were a long time before a proof of the same truth. Be it how it will, that Amorous Creature in vain employ'd all her Wit and Eloquence to dissuade Abelard from the Marriage. They were Married in secret; but she always denied it with her Oath that she was his Wife *. That Conduct made her to be ill used by her Uncle, who to cover the Dishonour of his Family, Publish'd the Marriage in all places, tho' he had promis'd Abelard to the contrary. The ill Treatment Heloisa was expos'd to in the House of Canon Fulbert, made her Husband resolve to remove her from thence, and to put her into the Nunnery of Argenteuil, where she had been Educated. That second Escape put her Relations out of all manner of Patience, and inspir'd them with an exquisite piece of Revenge, which they Executed by the means of Peter Abelard's Servant. That Villain introduc'd by night into his Master's Chamber, the Executioners of the Mischief. They surpris'd him asleep, and cut of those Parts which are not to be named †. That Action made (N) a great noise; People went on the Morrow as in a procession to Abe- most frightful Monsters, when they are join'd together, but such as the first alone is never found but in such Cases, where Love has little to do, and where the prospect is only of a good Maintenance, which could not be hop'd for without the noise of a great Belly. How many young Women are there that had rather have an Husband given them by a Decree of Court against his inclination, than to live with a stain'd Reputation. They are well satisfied that he will take his revenge with Usury, and that this Decree will cost them dear; but that signifies nothing, whilst the Title of Husband repairs the Breach which was made in their Honour. Our Heloisa had none of these Niceties. See the following Remark, and especially the Remark. V.

(K) That she could never cure it.] Is this to be envied, to say many years after she had renounced the World, and engag'd in a Monastick Life, That she had rather be the Whore of Peter Abelard, than the lawful Wife of the Emperor of the whole World. But this is what was said by Heloisa, when she was Abbess of Paraclet, and what she call'd God to Witness to. (a) Deum testem invoco, si me Augustus universo præsidens mundo matrimonii honore dignaretur, totumque mihi orbem confirmaret in perpetuo præsidendum, charius mihi & dignius mihi videtur tua dici Meretrix, quam illius Imperatrix. How can it be said that her Passion had left her in the Abbey of Paraclet, when she wrote an ingenuous Confession there of the bad state of her Soul, which shews that the fire of Love prey'd on her to the very Marrow. I dare not speak in French all that she accuses her self of: She confesses that the pleasures she tasted in the Embraces of Abelard were so delicious to her, that she thought of them Night and Day, Sleeping and Waking, and even at the Celebration of the Mass. She regretted the loss of them for ever, and for want of a better way repeated them in Idea. They that understand Latin may see with what force of Eloquence she could represent her Thoughts. (b) In tantum vero illa, quas pariter exercuimus amantium voluptates, dulces mihi fuerunt, ut nec displicere mihi, nec vix à memoria labi possint. Quocunque loco me veniam semper se oculis meis cum suis ingerunt desideriis. Nec etiam dormienti suis illusionibus parcunt. Inter ipsa missarum solemnia ubi purior esse debet oratio, obscœna earum voluptatum fantasmata ita sibi penitus miserrimam captivant animam, ut turpitudinibus illis magis quàm orationi vacem. Quæ cum ingemiscere debeam de commissis, fustino potius de amissis. Nec solum quæ egimus, sed loca pariter & tempora in quibus hæc egimus itatecum nostro infixa sunt animo, ut in ipsis omnia tecum agam, nec dormiens etiam ab his quiescam. Nonnunquam & ipso motu corporis animi mei cogitationes deprehenduntur, nec à verbis temperant improvisis. Which obliged her to cry out with St. Paul. (c) O wretch that I am, who shall deliver me from this body of Death? Would to God, continues she, I could truly add, The Grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord. That Grace, says she, to her Abelard, has prevented you, my Dear, in delivering you from all the Incentives of Sensuality, by one stroke of a Knife which made you an Eunuch——But my Youth and Experience of past Pleasures kindle these fires in my Soul; and the weaker my Nature is, the more I am overpower'd by those violent Attacks. (d) Hac te gratia, charissime, pravenit, & ab his tibi stimulis una corporis plaga medendo multas in anima sanavit. . . . nos autem in membris nostris hæc incentiva libidinis ipse juvenilis fervor ætatis & jucundiorum nobis experta voluptatum plurimum urendum, & tanto amplius sua me impugnatione oppugnant, quanto infirmior est natura quam oppugnant. Lastly, she recommends her self to his Prayers with so much the more solicitude as it was the only Remedy that was left for her Incontinence. (e) Time, alas, semper de me potius quam consilias, ut tua semper sollicitudine absolvar. Nunc vero præcipuè timendum est, ne malum incontinentiæ meæ super se in te revocatum. Those who censur'd Abelard's (f) frequent Visits to the Paraclet, were guilty of a rash Judgment, since they knew not the internal Dispositions of Heloisa. But had they known them, they had been oblig'd to have gone on those Visits forbid; having reason to fear that it was impossible (Humanely speaking) that that Woman should not commit Acts of Impurity with that Man. The Holy Fathers never trusted to Mutations. They compar'd an Eunuch to an Ox that has lost his Horns, and yet does not leave off pushing with his Head. You may see a fine Passage of St. Basil upon it, in our Remarks upon the Article Combabus. But as Appearances are sometimes Fallacious, I should not approve of those, that, knowing what Heloisa had in her Heart, should imagine she transgress'd the bounds when she met her Husband, and that she had occasion to write to him, (g) Si lubrica fuerim, quæritur deceptæ, nunc etiam languori tuo gratias ago, in umbra voluptatis diutius lusi.

(L) In vain poor Abelard lost his Virility.] 'Twas an effectual remedy for Love, if we'll believe some Verses of Cyrano de Bergerac (h). They are address'd to a Man whom he had bespoke in this manner.

Je tiens que la diminutif
Qu'on fit de ton trop excessif
Sur votre flasque genitif,
Vous prohibe le corps oblif.
Then he adds,
O visage! ô portrait naif!
O souverain expedit if
Pour guerir tout sexe lascif
D'amour naissant, ou cheoif!
Gemeaux ronds, gemeaux motifs,
Qui n'etes homme qu'abstractifs,
Grace à votre sepulatif,
Qu'a rendu fort imperfectif
Le cruel tranchant d'un canif.

But as there is no Rule so general but has an Exception to it, the Love of Heloisa was proof against that violent Remedy. She had that in common with Queen Stratonice before mention'd (k).

(M) A spice of that Madness.] This appears in Passages I have cited in the Remark (K). They not only prove that the Love of Concupiscence prevailed in Heloisa, but also that she was somewhat besides her self: For a Person in her perfect Senses, would never have talk'd at that rate. 'Tis probable that Study be an first to disorder her, and Love made a great addition to the Breach. There appear in her Writings many instances of an irregular Imagination; something so Extravagant, and so many disproportions, that they are proofs of Seneca's Maxim, Nullum magnum ingenium sine mixtura dementiæ.

Abelard's Chamber. His Scholars made ſtill greater Lamentations than the reſt. The Women (O) remarkably diſtinguiſh'd themſelves by their doleful Complaints. Some wrote him very curious Letters of Conſolation (P). That Action was ſeverely (Q) Puniſh'd. But all that did not hinder Abelard, overwhelm'd with Shame, and Grief, from ſequeſtring himſelf from the World in the Monaſtery of St. Denys; after having order'd Heloiſa to become a Nun at Argenteuil. We have ſaid in another place what happen'd after he became a Monk, and how he was Condemn'd to burn with his own Hands a Book, he had written. The loſs of that Work afflicted him ſtill more than the loſs of his Virility (R): And yet the loſs of a Book may be made up by another, which cannot (S) be ſaid in the other Caſe. As for Heloiſa, ſhe was made Prioreſs of the Nuns at Argenteuil; but, as they behaved themſelves ill in that Monaſtery, (T) the Abbot of St. Denys, who claim'd the Juriſdiction of it, expell'd them all; and then Heloiſa ſtood in great need of her Husband. He had built an Oratory near Troies, to which he had given the Name of Paraclet *, and then he had accepted an Abbey in Bretagne. Underſtanding that his Heloiſa had neither Houſe nor Harbour after her Expulſion, he gave her that Oratory, with all its Dependencies, which Donation was confirm'd by Pope Innocent II. Thus you ſee the firſt Abbeſs of Paraclet. She obtain'd ſuch a Favour with all Ranks of Men, that ſhe was quickly loaded with Riches. The Biſhops loved her as their Daughter, the Abbots as their Siſter, and the Laity as their Mother †. However, ſhe was very ill ſatisfied with the Providence of God †, and Murmured much more than Job. She kept up a Correſpondence of Letters with Abelard (U), and deſired him to give her Rules for her Nuns, and the Solution of ſeveral Difficulties.

(P) Very curious Letters of Conſolation.] Foulques Prior of Deuil, wrote him one which has been inſerted into the Edition of Abelard. We ſpeak of it in the Article of that Prior, and we refer thither many things belonging to Heloiſa and her Huſband, and which would make their Articles too long, if they were not ſeparated, to be plac'd elſewhere. They who ſay they had rather find it in the ſame place, are ſomewhat in the wrong.

(s) Rem. L.

(R) Yet more than the loſs of his Virility.] Authors have been ſufficiently Ridicul'd for their exceſſive fondneſs of their own Works: and Biſhop Heliodorus amongſt other inſtances, has been brought in, who chote rather to renounce his Biſhopriek than to Condemn his Romance of Theagenes. What Sarazin makes Voiture ſay, has alſo been alledg'd (e). I don't know that Abelard has been inſtanc'd upon this occaſion: yet there is ſomething more Emphatical in his Example; for Job was reſtor'd at laſt to his proſperous State; he begat Sons and Daughters, and 'tis certain that Voiture had rather have been a Job for ſome time, than Abelard to his Grave: and that he would gladly have thrown away all his Books and Muſes, if there had been a neceſſity for it, to preſerve the Fund of his Love-intrigues. Where are the Prelates who would refuſe to ſign the Reſignation of their Biſhopricks, ſhould they be threaten'd with Raſor in Hand with---in caſe of their refuſal. Doubtleſs Heliodorus would have conſented to the Condemnation of his Romance, had he fallen under that unlucky Alternative. But now here's a Man that declares he reckons the loſs of his Natural Parts, as an inconſiderable thing, in compariſon of the Writing which he was oblig'd to caſt into the Fire. But to judge impartially in this Caſe, we muſt not Attribute Abelard's whole grief, to the paternal Affection his Character of an Author inſpir'd him with for his Book. There was another thing which afflicted him more than that; which was, that the Sentence oblig'd him to burn his own Book, branded him with the mark of Herely, a Puniſhment equal to that of the hot Iron. His Murmurs againſt the Providence of God are another Teſtimony of his fondneſs. See his Words which, I ought to produce, that I may not be ſuſpected of enlarging things, to divert my Reader. (T) Behav'd themſelves ill in that Monaſtery.] Sugger, Abbot of St. Denys, took advantage of the diſorderly Life of the Nuns of Argenteuil, to be re-admitted into the Poſſeſſion of that Monaſtery. He ſent his Charters and Statutes to Rome, and receiv'd a favourable anſwer. They that are forward to judge ill of their Neighbour, will not Read this Paſſage without violent ſuſpicions about the Life of Heloiſa. She confeſſes (g) her ſelf ſubject to the raging heats of Luſt: and it is often ſeen, that the Abbeſs of a Convent governs herſelf amiſs, when ill Morals are prevalent in the (h) Society. From theſe two Principles, they who are pleaſed to be Cenſorious, may eaſily draw this conſequence, that the Prioreſs of Argenteuil, was no better than the Nuns. But as for me, who never read that ſhe was nominally comprehended in the Scandal her Monaſtery gave, I ſhall be cautious of fixing the leaſt blemiſh on her. We ſhould imitate our Lord, and make uſe of his Maxim (i), Has any body Condemn'd, or accuſ'd thee? Neither do I Condemn or Accuſe thee. And it is very true that Inferiours imitate the ill and not the good Life of their Superiours. The Court of France under Lewis XIII, was not Chaſter than under Henry IV.

(V) A Correſpondence of Letters with Abelard.] That Correſpondence began but late, and it was a fortunate Adventure that occaſion'd it. Abelard had written to a Friend a long Relation of his Misfortunes, which fell into the Hands of Heloiſa, already Abbeſs of Paraclet. Having read it, ſhe immediately wrote him the Reflections ſhe had made upon it, and paſſionately importuned him to write to her, that ſhe might be no longer depriv'd of the Conſolation his Letters might afford her in his Abſence. She repreſented to him the diſintereſtedneſs of her Affection, and how ſhe neither ſought the honour of Marriage nor the advantages of a Dowry, nor her own Pleaſure, but the Sole ſatisfaction of Abelard.

(d) Oper. pag. 25.

I don't find, that the hope she had of seeing him dignified with the Mitre (X) was the Reason of her Reluctance against Marriage. When he died in the Monastery of Clugni, she requested his Corps of the Abbot, which obtaining, she interred it in the Paraclet *, and resolved to be buried in the same Tomb. They tell a most surprizing Miracle that happen'd, as is said, when the Sepulcher was open'd to lay in Heloisa's Body, viz. that Abelard stretch'd out his Arms (Y) to receive her, and strictly embraced her; and yet he had been above Twenty Years dead: But that's no great matter; there are Instances (Z) brought of the like Cases. She died the 17th. of May, 1163. The Letters she wrote to her Husband, are to be met with in the Edition of Abelard's Works. But what Mr. Moreri advances, is not true, viz. that Andrew du Chesne has made Reflections upon these Letters, and upon Abelard's Answers. What he has done, is only upon the Letter where Abelard gives the History of his Misfortunes to a Friend. John de † Meun translated into French the Letters, which Heloisa and Abelard wrote to one another. Some time since a Book came out ‡, intituled, The History of Heloisa and Abelard, with the passionate Letter she wrote to him, translated from the Latin. That pretended Translation, is nothing else but a little Collection of Passages made at pleasure from that Woman's Letters, to which the Author has given what Form he thought fit, by suppressing what he did not like, and adding what he thought more convenient.

The Count de Bussi Rabutin translated into French some Letters, of Abelard and Heloisa, and that Translation was publish'd after his Death, in the Second Volume of Letters. I never * saw, (says he) finer Latin, especially than that of Heloisa, nor greater Love and Wit than she was Mistress of. If he had been as well vers'd in the Latin Style as he was in the French, he would not have made that Elogy on the Latinity of Heloisa.

Abelard. She tells him that though the name of Wife has something in it more Great and Sacred, she had always found more agreeable that of his Mistress, or Concubine, or Whore. (k) Etsi uxoris nomen sanctius ac validius videtur, dulcius mihi semper extitit amicæ vocabulum, aut, si non indigneris, concubinæ vel scorti. She adds, that he had related but one part of the Reasons she had represented to dissuade him from Marriage; but that he had almost suppress'd all those which were drawn from the Preference she gave to Love, before Matrimony, and to Liberty before Necessity (l). I know not how this Lady meant; but there lies in it one of the most Mysterious Refinements of Love. It has been many Ages believ'd, that Marriage destroys the principal Poinancy of that sort of Salt, and that when once a Man does a thing by Engagement, Duty, and Necessity, as a Task and Drudgery, He no longer finds the natural Charms in it: So that to use the Words of these nice Judges, a Man takes a Wife ad honores, and not ad delicias. (m) "Marriage "has on its side Profit, Justice, Honour, and Con- "stancy; a flat, but more universal Pleasure. Love "bottoms only upon Pleasure, which has then more "Sprightliness, Life and Pregnancy: A Pleasure "excited by Difficulty, must have a Relish and "Smartness in it. 'Tis no longer Love, if it be de- "stitute of Flame and Arrows. The Bounty of the "Ladies is too profuse in Marriage, it blunts the "edge of Affection and Desire. Patere me, said a Roman Emperor to his (n) Wife, per alias exercere cupiditates meas, nam uxor nomen est dignitatis, non voluptatis (o). One might therefore give an unlucky Interpretation to Heloisa's Design of never being the Wife, but only the dear Mistress of Peter Abelard. One might suspect she was afraid lest Marriage should prove the Grave of Love, and hinder her from tasting so deliciously, as she did, the Caresses of her Friend. The Author, who has paraphrased some Pieces of our Heloisa's (a) Letters, would have this Mind and Prospect to be at the bottom of her Design, though the Words are nicely managed. He makes her say, (b) That she found nothing but what was dull and insipid in those publick Engagements which tye those Knots, which only Death can unloose, and which make a sad Necessity of Life and Love; that (c) this is not to love, to court Wealth and Honours, in the lukewarm Embraces of an insensible Husband; that she could never believe one could this way taste the sensible Pleasures of an agreeable Union, or feel the secret and charming Commotions of a pair of Hearts, which have a long time indeavour'd to be united; and that she is fully (d) satisfied, that if there be any such thing as Happiness in this World, 'tis only to be found in the Conjunction of two Persons, who love with Liberty, whom a secret Inclination has join'd, and a Reciprocal Enjoyment has rendred content and satisfied. We shall see in the next place, that another Cause has been suppos'd in her Design not to marry Abelard.

(k) Rationes nonnullas quibus te à conjugio nostro infaustis thalamis revocare conabar exponere non es dedignatus, sed plerisque tacitis quibus amorem conjugio, libertatem vinculo præferebam. THE QUALITY of Mistress was more grateful than that of Wife to Heloisa.

(X) The hope of seeing him dignified with the Mitre.] The Sieur d'Amboise (e) makes mention of an ancient French Poet, who after having exhorted Men not to submit their Necks to the Yoke of Marriage, confirms his Opinion by that of our Heloisa, who, says he, most importunately begg'd and intreated of her Lover, that he would not marry her. She was much better satisfied to be loved by a Man, whom she should sometime see elevated to a good Bishoprick. Satis esse dilectam si illa intimo pectoris amorem mutuum foveans, illum videret mitra & insulis Pontificalibus quibus dignus erat ornatum. The Sieur d'Amboise observes, that this (f) Poet gives another turn to it, viz. that Heloisa insinuated, that the Embraces of married People are not attended with so delicious a Pleasure, as those that are illegitimate. 2. That 'tis credible that Heloisa did not prefer a licentious Concubinage, before the Condition of a Wife; but that her Love and Respect for her Gallant, enclin'd her rather to turn Recluse, than by her Marriage to hinder Abelard from receiving the Reward; (g) that were due to his Wit and Learning, as suppose a Cardinal's Cap. I have found no Footstep of this in Heloisa's Letters, and for that Reason, I have made it the 6th. Fault of Mr. Moreri, in the Article of Abelard. That which gives Birth to these sorts of Falshoods, is the Liberty an Author takes to lend People those Thoughts, which he thinks agreeable to their Interests. There is sometimes more Advantage for a Woman to induce her Lover to rise to the Dignities of the Church, than to stop the way to them by Matrimony. But must we suppose therefore, that Heloisa had the like Views? Here is a Story sufficiently known. A Man that had a Prebend, quitted it to marry: The Day after the Wedding, he said to his Wife, See, my Dear, how I love you, when I have left my Prebend for your sake. You are a Fool, says she, for your Pains: you ought to have kept your Prebend; and you might have had me notwithstanding.

(l) Abelard stretch'd out his Arms to receive her.] A Manuscript Chronicle of Tours (i) relates this pretty Miracle. Hæc, (Heloisa) sicut dicitur, magnitudine ultima posita præcepit ut mortua intra marmoreum tumulum poneretur, & sic eadem defuncta ad tumulum apertum deportata, maritus ejus qui multis diebus ante eam defunctus fuerat, elevatis brachiis illam recepit, & ita eam amplexatus brachia sua strinxit. But how comes it then that they are not in the same Monument? Francis d'Amboise, who tells us, that he has seen at the Paraclet, the Tombs of the Founder and Foundress by one another, contigua fundatoris fundatricis sepulchra, should have solved that little Difficulty.

HELVICUS (Chriſtopher) Profeſſor of Divinity, of Greek, and of the Oriental Languages in the Univerſity of Gieſſen, was born the 26th of December, 1581, at Spendlingen †, where his Father (A) was Miniſter. He was not one of thoſe tardy Wits, which are only produc'd in the latter Seaſon. He was capable before the Age of 20, to teach Greek and Hebrew, and even Philoſophy; and he had compos'd Abundance of Greek Verſes at the Age of 15 or 16. He ſtudied at Marpurg, and was made Maſter of Arts there in 1599. He might have obtain'd it ſooner if he would; for he was admitted Batchelor at 14 *. He made himſelf ſuch a Maſter of the Hebrew, that he could ſpeak it as his own Language. He read thoroughly abundance of Greek Authors. He ſtudied alſo Phyſick for ſome time, though he had conſecrated himſelf to the Church. In fine, he gave ſo many Teſtimonies of his Capacity, that he was choſen in the Year 1605, Teacher of Greek and Hebrew in the College the Landgrave † had lately built at Giessen. The Year following, the Emperor honoured that College with the Title of Univerſity, and the Privileges depending on it. Helvicus having for five Years acquitted himſelf in the Duties of his Employ with great Reputation, was made Profeſſor of Divinity in the Year 1610. He married the ſame Year. I know not whether he deferr'd his Marriage till he ſaw himſelf rais'd to a Preferment that might help him to a better Fortune, or whether he had other Reaſons that engaged him in a ſingle Life till that time; for the Author I refer to, ſays nothing of it; but he obſerves, that Marriage did not abate his Diligence in his Duties. He was offer'd a Church in Moravia, in the Year 1611, and a Profeſſorſhip at Hamburg, with a conſiderable Salary. However, he refuſed both theſe Preferments. He took the Degree of Doctor in Divinity, in the Year, 1613, the Landgrave deſiring it; as alſo, that he ſhould go and ſee the Libraries of the Jews at Francfort, who had been driven lately thence, by popular Commotions. Helvicus, who was much addicted to the reading of the Rabbins, purchas'd there many of their Books. He died in the Flower of his Age, Sept. 10. 1617. with many (B) Deſigns of Books in his Head, being look'd upon as a Man that had the fineſt Art (C), and beſt Method of teaching a Language ‖. He was not only a good Grammarian, but a good Chronologer. His Chronological Tables have been much

Love (k). The Wife died firſt: The Husband in his Sermon, made uſe of this Thankſgiving: (l) I thank thee, my Lord and my God, that I have returned thee thy Treaſure in the ſame Purity thou was pleas'd to commit it to me. The Woman fell a ſmiling, and ſaid to him: Why do you boaſt of a thing that was not equally of your Hands? The Husband died a little after, and was buried over-againſt his Spouſe; but on the Morrow their Corps were found both in the ſame Grave. That ſtrict Interrogatory might give occaſion to ſome of the profane to think, that the Virgin Wife was not willing the World ſhould know her Husband had been ſo cold. She confin'd herſelf to the Merit of her Continence, without being willing to be expos'd to the Opinions, that might be form'd to the Prejudice of her Charms. 'Tis not thus that Deputies ought to be preſerv'd; 'tis not reſtoring it well, to render it juſt as we receiv'd it. 'Tis not for this that God inſtituted Marriage; non hos quæſitum munus in uſus. One may therefore be ſorry, that the Publick ſhould think one has not ſufficiently pleas'd the Depoſitary. But the Hiſtorian will remedy that Inconvenience, if you conſult the Thirty Second Chapter, concerning the Glory of Conſeſſors, where the Diſcourſe of the Deceaſed Wife is a little better turn'd. Ten Chapters after, he relates, that a Senator of Dijon, call'd Hilary, (m) having been buried a whole Year, lift up his Hand to embrace his Wife's Neck, when ſhe was laid in the ſame Tomb.

(A) Where his Father was Miniſter.] He was call'd Chriſtopher as his Son; he was in his younger Days, two Years tog ther, Director of the College of Gerau. After which he ſtudied Divinity at Tubingen, and was made Miniſter of the Church of Gieſſhem; but Prince George, Landgrave of Heſſe, preferr'd him a little after to Spendlingen; which Church he ſerv'd till his Death, and ſuffer'd many Afflictions. Multa propter ſinceram confeſſionem perpeſſus, tandem ibidem vitam hanc terreſtrem cum cæleſti commutavit. He was Son to Quirinus Helvicus, who ſignaliz'd himſelf in the Defence of Darmſtat, during the War of Smalcalde. One may ſee in Sleidan, and Thuanus, the Opinion which the Count de Buren had of him. Seeing no Proſpect of Relief, he went upon the Ramparts to Capitulate, but he receiv'd a Shot in his Right-Arm, after which the Place was taken by force. They had a mind to hang him, and perhaps they would have done it, if the Ranſome that was promiſed for him had not hindred them. He had attended the Landgrave Philip in almoſt all his Expeditions (a).

(B) With many Deſigns of Books in his Head.] He had publiſh'd many Grammars, one in Latin, another in Greek, a third in Hebrew, a fourth in Chaldee, and a fifth in Syriack: But (b) they were only Abridgments. His Hebrew and Latin Lexicons, were only a ſort of Eſſay in Favour of Youth. He had a great deſire to perfect all theſe Grammars, and to make his Lexicons of uſe to the Learned, and he begg'd of God to live ſo long as to finiſh theſe Undertakings. He moreover pray'd for a Life long enough to reduce the Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtories into Order, and to animadvert upon Piſcator's Tranſlation of the Old and New Teſtament, and his Commentaries on the Scripture. He thought alſo it was requiſite to have a new Edition of Luther's Bible, ſet out with a good Apology, and neceſſary Explications. The Edition of that Bible, which Paul (c) Voſſius had procured not long before, with Marginal Notes, containing the Opinions of Calvin, put Helvicus upon that Project, and gave him a vehement deſire to execute it (d).

(C) Who had the fineſt Art, and beſt Method of teaching.] He fought a Road rather than the common way us'd in the Schools to lead Youth to Learning. He was not at all diſcouraged, by the Obſtacles that were raiſed againſt his new Method. Being perſuaded, that it would ſave a great deal of Time and Pains to the Scholars; and, prompted by the Affection he had for his own Inventions, he endeavoured to introduce his Method into the Colleges. He put the Buſineſs in a good way; they ridiculed him, they wrangled with him, and calumniated him; which obliged him to defend himſelf, and to refute thoſe rude Aſſaults (e). I believe, that his Death happening before his Inventions took Effect, gave Opportunity to the Partiſans of the old Method, to maintain themſelves, or to recover their Ground. However, it was inſcrib'd in his Epitaph, that he had Invented a new Art of Teaching, novæ Didacticæ author & informator felicissimus. The thing deſerved it, titulo res digna ſepulchri, and merited to be copied more exactly than has been done by the Sieur Freher, who inſtead of Didacticæ, has put it Dialecticæ. One would think, that Helvicus had ſome Idea of a Project, which, they ſay, a very Learned Man is undertaking, which is to reduce Languages into ſuch common Principles, as may ſerve to teach them very eaſily all together; one might believe much (D) valued, tho' they are not entirely free from Errors (E). We may conjecture (F) by the Books we have of him, that if he had attain'd the Age of 60, his Works would have made many Volumes in Folio. As for the reſt, he was a Man of an unblamable Life; he ſtudied to have Peace with all Mankind †, and never had any Difference, either with his Collegues, or with other People: Rara avis in terris. He was in great Requeſt with many Princes of Germany, and receiv'd Letters from them, full of Civilities. Anne Dorothy, Dutcheſs of Saxony, did him the Honour to write frequently to him. He was lamented in an extraordinary manner; all the Poets of Germany, of the Ausburg Confeſſion, were at the Pains of making Funeral Elegies, complaining of the Immaturity of his Death. A Collection of theſe Poems has been printed, with the Funeral Oration, and ſome other Pieces, under the Title of Cippus memorialis, by the care of Wynckelman, Collegue of the deceaſed. The Son of this Wynckelman had it reprinted in the Year 1650.

At Rome he made a Panegyrick upon Clement the VIII. with ſo great Succeſs, that the ſieve this, I ſay, if we depended on this Title (f) of one of his Books: Libri duo de Arte Grammatica univerſalis Latinæ, Græcæ, Hebraïcæ, Chaldaïcæ: but 'tis plain by his Funeral Oration, that there is a Comma wanting after Univerſalis. See the Quotation (b).

(D) His Chronological Tables, &c.] I ſpeak of the Work which is intituled, Theatrum Hiſtoricum, hoc Chronologiæ Syſtema novum. He publiſh'd it in the Year 1609. Sethus Calviſius, who was a great Maſter of Hiſtory and Chronology, much approved of that Work, and found it of a new Invention and Advantage, ſince things are there ſeen altogether, and at one View: Ut pote in quibus exemplo antehac non viſo omnia uno intuitu lectorum oculis ſubjecantur. Wynckelman obſerves, that this Approbation is found in the Letter that Sethus Calviſius wrote to Helvicus, September the 7th. 1609. He adds, the Work is at preſent reprinted, corrected, and enlarged by the author. Jam ſecundum emendatius & ex ipſius autoris auctius editur. We muſt ſay then, that the firſt Edition of this Work was in the Year 1609, and the ſecond in the Year 1618. John Steuber, Profeſſor at Giſſen, had the care of the latter, and dedicated it to a Daniſh (g) Lord, a Patron of Learned Men, and who had honoured Helvicus with his Friendſhip. Twenty Years after a new Edition of this Book was publiſhed by the care of John Ludolph Schuppius, Son-in-Law to the Author, and Profeſſor of Oratory at Marpurg. He adviſes in his Preface, that he'll lay nothing of the Engliſh Edition. Since that time this Chronological Theater has been often reprinted. Voſſius hath not well obſerved the date of the firſt Edition, and hath given that for the Second Edition, which was not for Anno CIↃIↃCXII, ſaith he (b), Chriſtophorus Helvicus edidit Syſtema chronologicum, æqualibus denariorum, quinquage narium, & centenariorum, intervallis. Id poſtea continuavit & recenſuit Joannes Balthaſar Schuppius ——Emiſit anno CIↃIↃCXXXVIII. It cannot be objected to me in favour of Voſſius, that it is very true, that Helvicus made a Book of Chronology in the Year 1032, which was augmented by Schuppius, in 1638. for that is not the Book which Voſſius ſpeaks of; the Title of it is (i) Chronologica Univerſalis ab origine mundi per quatuor Summa imperia, quas Monarchias appellant, ad annum usque MDCXII. deducta, cum præcipuis ſynchroniſmis illuſtrium, eventorum & poſteritatum cæterarum. All is there accommodated to the ſecond and ſeventh Chapters of Daniel; which Character doth not agree with the Theatrum Hiſtoricum. On the other Hand, the Title and Character by which Voſſius repreſents the Book he ſpeaks of, agree perfectly with the Theatrum Hiſtoricum ſive Chronologia ſyſtema novum, where we ſee only Diviſions of Tens, Fifties, and Hundreds, which do not exceed one another. In fine, John Juſtus Wynckelman, the Son of him who pronounced the Funeral Oration, remarks (a) very expreſly, that Schuppius publiſhed two Works of his Father-in-Law Helvicus, with the Commutations until the Year 1639; one is, Theatrum Hiſtoricum, in Folio; the other Chronologia Univerſalis in Quarto. I omit to ſay, that Helvicus did not publiſh his Chronology himſelf, which he had continued to the Year 1612. It was done by his Collegue Steuber in the Year 1618.

(E) Entirely free from Errors.] Tanaquillus Faber, doth not find them exact as to the Times that the Poets, Philoſophers, and other Learned Perſons flouriſh'd in (b). *Primum hoc mihi credas velim, Helvicum non facis locupletis eſſe fidei in hac Chronologiæ parte quæ eorum ſcriptis illuſtrium ætatem ſignat; dein hoc quoque habet Helvicus, quod ſere plerumque recentiores ſcriptores ſequatur, ut eclogarios, ballotecarios, &c. quale aliquid quoque in Calviſio reperias. (F) By the Books we have of him.] I have already noted Some of them, as I have alſo others. He publiſhed Chronological Diſſertations upon the Four Monarchies, upon the Seventy Weeks of Daniel, upon Cyrus, and the other Kings of Perſia, &c. He ſolidly confutes (c) the Opinions of Angelocrator, that nothing could be reſolved. And yet Angelocrator pretended to Inſpiration, declaring in the Front of his Book, that he had compoſ'd it, Deo Illuminante (d). That diminiſhes much the Glory of him that confuted him in being an echo that only repeated Truth and Common Senſe in the Writings of ſuch Inſanifices. Though they ſhould not be actually Lunatick, and had only in view, the ratum, the Paſtour, they would by them loſe of their Credit, as all needs fall under the Laſhes of the ſeverſt Critick. Helvicus wrote ſome Treatiſes, de Dialecto Græca, de ratione carminis Græci conſtruendi, de Prophetia Babylonica Chaldaica, a Latin Poem, de Hiſtoria Rei, cum aliorum diſſertationum a deperditionem Judæorum, Calendariorum &c. Libri quatuor de variis annorum emendationibus: Synopſis hiſtoriæ univerſalis. He had put to the Preſs the Hebrew Poetick, and had already written the Epiſtle Dedicatory, but he ſuppreſſed it (e) for ſome Reaſons. See the Sieur Maire, in his Diarium Biographicum: But eſpecially, for the Theatre of Paul Freherus (f), and the Temple of honours of Spandius. You will there find a long, and I think, exact Catalogue of Helvicus's Works. Moſt of them are in Latin, the reſt in High-Dutch. Correct Freherus in the Epitaph (g) XXXVI. and IX. and put it XXXV. and IIX. The Stranger, that they who have corrected this great Book, ſhould not ſee, that a Man (h) who was born the 20th. of December, 1581, and died the 10th. of September, 1617, did not live Thirty Six Years, Nine Months, and a half. There are XXXV Years and IIX Months in the Epitaph reported by Wynckelman (i), which has been guilty of laying, in the Funeral Oration, that Helvicus died in the 37th. Year of his Age, anno ætatis jam trigeſimo ſeptimo. He writ the date at length, and not in Figures. He writ in like manner the Day of his Birth, and the Day of his Death; the firſt is, according to him, the 20th. of December, 1581, and the other is the 10th. of September, 1617. How then doth he reckon the Thirty Seven Years? The eaſier it is to avoid theſe Faults, the more a Man is obliged to avoid them.

(A) The Science of Medals.] He compoſ'd a Book upon that Science, and gave it to be Publiſh'd; but they did not put his Name to it (k). *Auctor eſt de poſitionis nummiſmatum Imperatorum Romanorum a Jul. the Choice was given him of being Librarian at the Vatican, or of having a very good Benefice ). He contented himself ‚ to be Canon of the Cathedral of Antwerp. He had a great share in the Esteem and Friendship of Justus Lipsius his Professor; which appears by the Letters that Lipsius wrote to him ‚, and the Testimony he gave him † in the Year 1600. Hemelar was then preparing himself for his Voyage to Italy. He lived * six Years at Rome with Cardinal Cesi. He was a Friend of Grotius, and publish'd some Verses, congratulating him about his deliverance out of Prison †. He was Brother to the Mother of James Golius, that learned Professor at Leyden, who purchased so great a Reputation by his profound Knowledge of the Oriental Tongues. He would doubtless have Prosélyted his Nephew to the Roman Communion, as he had done Peter Golius the Brother of James; but he would not have been able to accomplish this Design. James Golius was a good Protestant, who maintained all his Life † a grudge against his Uncle, for having changed his Brother's Religion. Moreri, who in the Article of Golius, advertizes, that he speaks elsewhere of our John Hemelar, gives us but a false Advice. I shall not imitate him in respect of the promise I have made in the same Article, of saying something concerning (B) Peter Golius.

HEMMINGIUS (Nicolas) Professor of Divinity at Coppenhagen, was Born in the Year 1513. in the Isle of Laland *. His first Education could not be very Advantageous to him, being under the direction of a Blacksmith, his Father's Brother. However he made some progress in Learning, and afterwards went to Wittemberg, where for five Years he was one of Melanchthon's most constant Auditors. As he was oblig'd to get his Living either by instructing Scholars or Writing for them, we must the more admire the Learning he gain'd. He returned to Denmark, and by Melanchthon's Recommendation, was taken into a Gentleman's House to instruct his Daughters. He was afterwards made Minister of the Church of the Holy Ghost at Coppenhagen, and then Professor of the Greek Tongue. He took his Doctor of Divinity's Degree in the Year 1557. and immediately was made Professor in the same Faculty at Coppenhagen. He discharg'd the Duties of it excellently well till the Year 1579. when he was declared Emeritus, and Vested with Canonry in the Church of Roschild. He peaceably enjoyed that Preferment to his Death; that is, to the 23 of May 1600. He was Blind the last year of his Life †, which is no surprising thing, when we consider that he was very Studious and lived 87 Years. It ought to be observ'd that he was not (A) a very Rigid Lutheran; and there is some probability, that if it had not been prevented, he would have shewn himself a good Calvinist. His inclination for the Opinions of Geneva was perceived: he was obliged to explain himself, (B) and even Andreas. What follows is something more particular. (m) In Numismata Regum & Imp. Romanorum à C. Julio Cæsare usque ad Fl. Justinianum ex Caroli Arschot mi regali & Nic. Rocoxii consularis viri armaris deprompta commentarios edidit bonæ frugis plenos, in quibus quicquid in auro, argento, ære, flato percusso in urbe æterna, exquisitum, elegans, historiæ temporum & genio principum convenions, per notas, figuras, ambages breves & sirpos verborum significatur, acutissime paucis & planissime explicat, penu quoddam nummaria antiquitatis: & quo opere aliquis arrogantior fuerit is se miscere posset arbitrari, in eo nomen suum dissimulavit. The words preceding these in Gronovius's Oration, are too fine to be omitted. Mater (Golii) *omni sexus laude prædita . . . . . vel unica Johannis Hemelarii fratris imagine sat nobilis est, viri & in veterum literarum tractatione cum primis exercitati, & portæ diserti, & probitate ac tranquillitate vitæ fugaque bonorum & negotiorum T. aliquem Pomponitium Atticum referentis. And yet there were three Editions of it (o). The other works of this Canon of Antwerp, are, Gratulatio in inauguratione D. Christiani Michaëlii, D. Michaëlis apud Antverpienses Præmonstratensis Cœnobii Abbatis. Poëmata multa sparsim edita. Oratio in funere Joannis Malderi V. Antverpiensis Episcopi habita.

(B) Of saying something concerning Peter Golius.] He had the same inclination as his Brother for the Eastern Voyages, and the Oriental Tongues. He made himself a bare-footed Fryar, and took the Name of Celestin of Saint Liduina. He sojourned many years upon Mount Libanus, and was made Professor of the Oriental Tongues at Rome. He Translated Thomas a Kempis into Arabick, and undertook at the Age of 74 a Voyage to the Coasts of Malabar to labour in the Conversion of the Infidels. The diversity of Religion or Profession, did not hinder the two Brothers from loving one another very Affectionately. Peter writ to James that he was beholden to him for the civil Treatment he received in . . sia. (a) Frater Asceres è familia discalceatorum cum per vestra fratris in Oriente decurreret, scripsit ad nostrum diu jam reducem omnia sibi evenire præter expectationem: præsse se ad vincula, carceres, verbera, cruces, invenire amplexus, gratulationes, studia, gratias potentium ob nomen Golium: eam memoriam id desiderium sui reliquerat; ita gratiam absenti referebant. The meaning of which is, that Golius's Name there was in such esteem after James's Travels, that a great deal of honour was paid him in the Person of Peter. We must not imagine that Hemelar had need of much Wit or Industry to bring over his Nephew to the Roman Communion; for he perswaded him to it when he was but a Child. Peter Golius was under his Government from eight years of Age. I will relate the words of Gronovius, upon which I ground my Opinion. They will shew that that Child had a very forward Wit. Unum in eo (Hemelario) non sine gemitu solebat accusare noster, quod fratrem Petrum revocasset ad religiones parentibus ejuratas, virum alioquin egregium, & fraterno secum animo, nec minus quarum verum & linguarum Orientis, diuque in partibus iisdem versatum & Arabicæ linguæ Romæ Professorem: qui, quam præcoqui fuerit indole, testis est oratio, quam Christiano Michaëlio Abbati Præmonstratensi ab Hemelario scriptam gratulandi causa, puer octo annorum concinnaverit, & quasi fecisset, memoriter pronuntiavit.

(A) He was not a very rigid Lutheran.] This one Proof will be sufficient for me. The Articles of Union, which the Divines of Saxony and their Adherents, endeavoured to Establish over all the Lutheran World, were rejected with great indignation in Denmark. King Frederick the Second forbad all his Subjects to sign them, and threatned all with Banishment that should contradict that Order, or bring Copies of that Book into his Dominions (b). Now Hemmingius was the principal (c) Promoter of that affair, as Hospinian observes, who upon that matter was not contradicted by Hutter.

even to make a Recantation. He gave a Confeſſion of the Lutheran Faith, and yet not long ſince there has been a Divine who has endeavoured to ſhew (C) that it agrees with that of the Reform'd. Hemmingius Publiſh'd many Books: His little Works of Divinity were ſo eſteemed by Simon Goulart, that he cauſed them to be Reprinted at Geneva in the Year 1586 (D).

(C) To ſhew that it agrees with that of the Reform'd.] Mr. Maſius Profeſſor of Divinity at Coppenhagen, has oblig'd the Publick with the Confeſſion that was required of Hemmingius. It imports that he firmly believed that Jeſus Chriſt, God and Man, is ſubſtantially preſent in the Lord's Supper, wherever it is Celebrated according to his Inſtitution; and that he conveys and delivers to all worthy and unworthy Communicants, his true Body and true Blood, which he has ſhed for us, for the Remiſſion of Sins; and that his Body and Blood are truly and really taken with the Bread and Wine by the Communicants, inſomuch that it is a true Meat, and a true Drink, with which Man is nouriſhed, refreſh'd and quickened to eternal Life. (h) Se firmiter & firmiter credere totum Chriſtum Deum & hominem ſubſtantialiter eſſe præſentem in Cœna ſua ubicunque celebretur juxta ipſius ordinationem, ipſumque adeſſe & exhibere omnibus communicantibus dignis & indignis ſuum verum corpus & verum ſanguinem quem effudit pro nobis in remiſſionem peccatorum, & hoc corpus & hunc ſanguinem vere & realiter cum pane & vino à communicantibus ſumi, ita ut panis ſit cibus & potus quo homo paſcitur, reficitur & vivificatur ad vitam æternam. Furthermore Hemmingius acknowledg'd that his Confeſſion was conformable to that of Auſburg, to the little Catechiſm of Luther, and to the Syſtem of the Doctrine of the Saxon Churches, and he declared that he revoked whatever in his Syntagma has offended the Churches, and is agreeable to Calvin's Opinion about the Holy Supper, or that is not conſiſtent with his preſent Confeſſion. (i) Cum jam aliter in Syntagmate ſuo ſcripſerit juxta ſententiam Calvini de re ſacramentaria quo Eccleſiæ offenſa ſint, & quod cum hac ſua præſenti confeſſione pugnet, id quicquid ſit in univerſum revocare, & hoc ſuo ſcripto revocatum velle. He (k) begs pardon of the King and of all thoſe whom his Syntagma had Scandaliz'd. 'Tis plain, that his Confeſſion is wholly Lutheran, and we muſt believe that the Doctors who obliged him to Retract, preſcribed him the Expreſſions that they thought moſt capable of taking away Equivocations and denoting preciſely and formally his Orthodoxy and the Abjuration of his Error. And yet it can't be believed how zealous the Divine, whom I cite, hath been to ſhew that Hemmingius did not make a Recantation. The Parentheſes and the nota bene, with which he intermixes the Words of the Confeſſion, in order to evade the Conſequences and Pretentions of Mr. Maſius, ſeem to him ſo ſolid, that he fears not to affirm that Hemmingius retracted but very little, and that the good Calviniſts might honeſtly ſign that Confeſſion, explained and underſtood in its true Senſe. (a) Videt itaque rurſum vir clariſſimus, quantillum id ſit quod hac confeſſione ſua Hemmingius revocavit, cui & nos dummodo dicta intelliguntur & rectè explicentur poſſumus adſtipulari; & quam procul ille adhuc abfuerit tum cum collegis à fide pu ræ Lutherana. From whence we may conclude how difficult it is to draw up any Formulary, that ſhall cut off all occaſion to a Diſpute. Men believe they have prevented all ſorts of Equivocations, but in the conſequence they perceive that an Adverſary finds a thouſand Evaſions, and would perſwade us, that we had quite other Thoughts than what we know very well we had. Which in certain Caſes is to undertake what Pericles undertook, and which he Accompliſh'd. As he was thrown upon the Ground in Wreſtling, (b) he perſwaded the Spectators that they were in an Error, if they thought he was fallen. An unlucky Obſervation will probably be remember'd here, which is read in the Hiſtory of the Variations. (c) "The "Lutherans aſſure us in their Book concerning Con- "cord, that Luther was led to that Expreſſion (d) "by the Subtilties of the Sacramentarians, who found "a way to accommodate to their moral Preſence, "what Luther expreſs'd in very emphatical and "preciſe Terms, for the real and ſubſtantial "Preſence; whereby we ſee once more, that we "are not to wonder if the Defenders of the figura- "tive Sence, find a way of drawing the Holy Fa- "thers to their ſide, ſince Luther himſelf, alive and "ſpeaking, who knew their Subtleties, and under- "took to confute them, was hard put to it to find "Words which they did not adapt to their own "Sence by their Interpretations: Being tired with "their Subtleties, he reſolv'd to find an Expreſſion "which they could no longer Elude, and therefore "compos'd the Article of Smalcald in the Form "that we have ſeen it. The Biſhop of Meaux might have found a great inſtance of all this in his own Church. The Bull of Innocent X. againſt the Opinions of Janſenius did not hinder the Janſeniſts from proceeding in their Diſputes. They Intrench'd themſelves in abundance of Subtilties and infinite Diſtinctions. To drive them from that Hold, Alexander VII. was adviſed to ſpeak in a more preciſe manner, and there was put into his Bull whatever was thought proper to ruin the Diſtinctions and Subterfuges of Port Royal. That ſignified nothing. The Janſeniſts continued to maintain, that the Doctrine of Janſenius was not yet Condemned. Mr. Arnauld (e) drew out a hundred Obſervations borrowed from the ſubtileſt Logick. The reading of ſuch a Paper might have admoniſh'd the Pope: He might have ſeen the vanity of his Precautions, and perceived that it could be proved to him, that he did not mean what he knew very well he meant. As far as I ſee (he might have ſaid) you know my Thoughts better than my ſelf. What a pretty thing is the (f) Connotatum of Cardinal Lauræa! And when we conſider the infinite Diſtinctions (g) that are neceſſary to explain what is ordained by the Bulls, and what is not, we eaſily perceive that the Infallibility of St. Peter's Chair is of no uſe, unleſs we ſuppoſe that every private Perſon is throughly acquainted with all the ſubtile Rules of Logick, or that every Curate is infallible.

me, that Mr. Lucas had aſſured him that the Sonnet about Abortion came out twenty Years before the Accident of Mademoiſelle de Guerchi, but that all other People with whom he had conſulted, ſaid, it was written upon a Miſcarriage of that handſome Woman, but not that which coſt her her Life. He added, Twenty of my Friends who lived with Henault have affirmed to me, that the Sonnet was poſitively his, and that he own'd it. Subligni (i) was ſtill in the College when that Piece was firſt Publiſh'd: His Widow and his Daughter have ſatisfied me, that he was not the Author of it. Let us then take it for granted, that it was the Work of our Henault; for we ſhall ſee below, that it was put into the Collection of that Poet's Works: But we muſt queſtion its being made upon Mademoiſelle de Guerchi. It is look'd upon as a Maſter-piece, though it be againſt the Rules and has even one Barbariſm (k) in it.

(B) His Merit was not in Print.] That is found to be falſe " Mr. d' Henault himſelf in his Life-time " cauſed a little Collection of his Works to be Printed " at Paris by Barbin in 1670. in 12. *Oeuvres de verſes...par le Sieur D. The Sonnet about Abortion is there " ----We muſt not forget the firſt Piece of the Book " Intitled, Conſolation to Olympus. It will furniſh " me with two Critical Obſervations: one is, that " the Compilers of St. Evremont's Works, being " perhaps deceived by ſome Body, or by a pretended " Conformity of Style, have taken this long Letter " for a true Piece of him. 'Tis an Example, which " you may add to thoſe which you have Collected " concerning the Errors, into which that like- " neſs of Style daily leads the Criticks. The ſecond " Obſervation falls directly upon a new Cenſor--- " who has pretended (2) to paſs a Judgment upon " the Works of St. Evremont..... That Man " has fallen into the Snare that was laid by " the Compiler. He attacks that Letter of Con- ſolation to Olympus in the Style, the Thoughts " and Sentiments, and he beſtows a fourth Part of " his Book upon that notable Reprehenſion. This is what I have found in a Collection of Remarks, that a young Advocate of the Parliament of Paris did me the favour to ſend me in the Year 1698. and which convinced me, that he has abundance of Wit, and an exact Knowledge of many curious matters of Fact, and ſuch as are very proper for this Dictionary.

(C) Three different Syſtems concerning the Mortality of the Soul.] Let me give one piece more of that Collection of Remarks before mentioned. " He- nault ſaith in his Epiſtle Dedicatory, You know that I am a Man wholly by my ſelf, that I hardly glory in the Opinion of others, that my Maxims or my Errors are very different from thoſe of all the World beſides. By that he begins to diſcover what " he was. Many of his Verſes are Imitations of " the Chorus's of Seneca, and amongſt others of the " ſecond Act of the Troas, where the Mortality of " the Soul is Eſtabliſhed: that Subject agreed with " his Palate.

' This is no Tranſlation, but an Original, and thus ' it is, that this Man ſcattered in his Works ' the Seeds of his Errors. In the two Pieces that ' have been put in the Furetieriana, you will find ' alſo the ſame Opinions which he endeavours to ' inſinuate every where. To his Impieties he added ' groſs Impurities. HENICHIUS (John) Professor of Divinity in the University of Rinthel in the Country of Hesse, was the Son of a Minister of Winhusen, and was Born in the Month of January 1616. He performed his Classes at Zell and Lunenburg, and then was sent to Helmstad in the Year 1634; where after he had Studied four Years, he was admitted Doctor of Philosophy. Having afterwards read some Lectures and moderated in some publick Disputations, he was received into the most particular Friendship of Dr. Calixtus, and Doctor Horneius, two Celebrated Divines. He went to Hildesheim towards the end of the Year 1639, and he lived there about three Years with a Gentleman of Merit. He made a Journey after that towards the Rhine, and then staid some time with James Lampadius at Hanover. He was made Professor of Metaphysicks and of the Hebrew Tongue in the University of Rinthel in the Year 1643. and at the end of a Year and a half he was called to Bardewick to be Super-intendent there. He Exercised the Functions of that Place five Years together with so much diligence, that Augustus Duke of Brunswick would have given him the Inspection of the whole Diocess of Wolfenbuttel; but he did not accept of it. He quitted his Employment, because the Fatigues he had gone through had brought on him a Fit of Sickness. He return'd to Rinthel in the Year 1651, to be Professor of Divinity there. He was solemnly invested with the honour of a Doctor's Degree in the same Faculty, and had soon a Place assigned him in the Ecclesiastical Consistory, and was made Inspector of the Churches of the County of † Schawmburg. He Manifested his Learning in the several Works he Published (F); he had a great deal of Candour and Moderation, and passionately desired

'Tis certain that a Person, who should speak Dogmatically after this manner, would deny the Immortality of the Soul. But for the honour of Madam des Houlieres, we will say that she only followed Poetical Idea's, which are not to be drawn into consequence. Thus in imitation of the Ancient Poets, she says in another place (3), that after our Death our Soul wanders upon the Shores of Hell. This could not have been her belief, if Mr. de Hennault had taught her his Impieties. We are not to pass a Judgment upon her from Poetical Phrases. Not but that abundance of Licentiousness may be conceal'd under the Privileges of Versification. The Advocate I have mentioned, has a Note upon this Passage. You have related, says he to me in his Letter, some Verses of Madam des Houlieres that are suspected of Libertinism: But you have forgotten one (3) which is not the least Emphatical, and which is found in the Edition of her Poems. To speak the truth; there are many Moral, and even Christian and Holy Pieces in her Works which Correct that. And yet some did reckon her for a Libertine; for she complains of it in her Epistle to Father la Chaise upon the falsly Devout. She was a very great Wit, the honour of her Sex, and the shame of ours.

Note, that under pretence that she says we are Produced out of nothing, it could not be presumed, that she believed the Creation; for Mr. Hennault shews plainly enough (b) that by the word nothing, he meant not the privation of Existence, but the meer privation of Life. In the former Sence he did not admit of the Creation.

(E) A Sonnet which gave occasion to Mr. Colbert to do a handsome thing.] The Collection of Remarks before cited, furnishes me with another good Commentary. " To return to Mr. Hennaut, 'tis of him " Mr. Despreaux speaks in two Places of his ninth " Satyr: Je le declare donc, Haynaut est un Virgile; " I declare then (4) Haynault is a Virgil. But " Mr.——told me himself that he found him " a tolerable good Poet, and that his best Piece, not " for its matter, was a Sonnet against Mr. Colbert, " which began with this Verse, Ministre avare & " lâche, esclave Malheureux, i. e. O Griping base " Statesman, O miserable Slave. Mr. Colbert here- " upon did a noble thing; he was told of " this Sonnet, which made such a Noise at that " time. He ask'd whether there was nothing in it " against the King, he was told no: whereupon he " Answered, that he mattered it not, and would " not bear the Author an ill Will for it. Is not this " thing nobler than the Sonnet?

I have something to observe upon the Book de Veritate Religionis Christianæ, which is in this List. 'Tis a very good Supplement to that of Grotius on the same Subject; for Henichius explains, illustrates and Proves more at large the Arguments that Grotius had made use of. This is signified in the Title, where he hath it, quo ea quæ viri illustres Hugo Grotius de hac materia commentatus est, aliquanto uberius exponuntur. By the way let us observe, that Grotius has been accused of Plagiarism, and let us place here an Addition, which was at the end of the first Volume of this Dictionary in the first Edition, and which the Printer has not placed as it ought to be in the second.

It contains these Words: " To me there seems no- " thing more false, than what was said to Mr. Wheeler " and Dr. Spon, That (b) Grotius had Stole his " principal Argument for the truth of the Christian " Religion, from an Arabick Author, and particu- " larly from the Works of an excellent Man, whom the " Latins held for an Arch-heretick, & whom the Orthodox " look upon as a Saint, who has Written an excellent " Book against the Turks and Jews for the truth of " the Christian Religion. Note as to the three Volumes of our Henichius's Ecclesiastical History, that they reach but to the end of the fifth Century; and though the Title promises the Civil as well as the Ecclesiastical History, the Author dwells principally on the latter. The first Volume contains the three first Ages; the second contains the Fourth, and the third the fifth. Bosius who had said in his Schedasma de comparanda notitia scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum, that Henichius's Work comprehended the six first Centuries, was too rudely censured for it. He acknowledged his Errour, and Corrected it with his own Hand in the Copy of his Book. Such Faults desired an Union betwixt the (Z) Lutherans and Calviniſts, which probably expos'd him to thoſe Blows, that were laid upon him. He married in 1645, a very virtuous Woman, who did not prove barren; for he had Thirteen Children by her. He died at Rinſhel the 27th. of June, 1671 (e). His Epitaph, made by Gerhard Walter Molan, is very fine. You'll find it at the 338 and 339 Pages of a Book (f) of Caſpar Sagittarius.

HENRY VI. Emperor of Germany, Son of Frederick Barbaroſſa, was crowned by (A) Pope Celeſtin III. the 15th. Day of April, 1191. He (b) marched with a Potent Army to inherit the Succeſſion of Naples and Sicily, which fell to the Empreſs Conſtantia his Wife, after the Death of the Young William, King of Sicily. He found ſo many Oppoſitions to his taking Poſſeſſion, that we may almoſt ſay, that he obtain'd thoſe two Kingdoms by Conqueſt. He made himſelf ſo * feared, that the Emperor Alexis could not obtain Peace of him without paying Tribute. If he had only done that, his Valour might have been prais'd; but all the Applauſes he might have merited, on that Account, are ſwallowed up by the Cruelty and Treachery he ſhew'd, in exterminating under falſe Pretences, all that remain'd of the Race of the brave Normans, who had conquered that part of Italy, which the Empreſs his Wife, their Heireſs, gave him right to poſſeſs ‡. 'Tis ſaid, that that Princeſs, to puniſh him for it, made him ſwallow the Poiſon, whereof he died at Meſſina, in the Year 1198, being Thirty Two Years old †. He left a Son, who was Emperor, under the Name of Frederick II. Conſtantia was ſo old, when ſhe brought that Son into the World, that to avoid all Suſpicions of Impoſture, ſhe lay-in (B) publickly. Theſe Precautions (C) did not hinder the World from ſaying, that this Child was ſuppoſititious. There are Authors who maintain, that Conſtantia (D) was neither a Nun, nor very old when ſhe married Henry VI.

HENRY II. King of France, ſucceeded Francis I. his Father, the laſt of March, 1547. One of the firſt Things he did, was to deſpiſe the Order his Father gave him on his Death Bed. I mean, that aſſoon as he began his Reign, he recalled the as theſe may be pointed out, but it ſhould be done without ill Nature and inſulting, remembring that it is very eaſie to commit them. (c) Aberrationem agnovit, ac manu ſua in exemplari privato correxit: ut adeo acrem illam Clariſſimi Sluteri cenſuram (1) non videatur meruiſſe. Et quam faciles in his talibus ſit lapſus, unuſquiſque intelligit. The Author that ſpeaks thus, obſerves, that Henichius gives the Subſtance of what is ſaid by the ancient Authors, and afterwards ſets down their Paſſages entire. There's reaſon to ſay, that this is a Commendation to his Work (d). Caterum Henichianum opus vel eo etiam nomine meretur commendari, quod integra auctorum veterum teſtimonia adſcribat, quorum ſummam prius attulerat.

(Z) An Union betwixt the Lutherans and Calviniſts.] He is prais'd for it in his Funeral Programma (e): Pacis & concordiæ perpetuus ſtudioſus, nihilque magis in votis habebat, quàm ut ſchiſma inter Evangelicos funditus tolleretur, & togata prælia in ſuggeſtibus & Cathedris cum ſalutiferâ, Deo & hominibus gratâ pace, fauſto omine, commutarentur: qua de cauſa immortalem nominis gloriam apud omnes bonos adeptus eſt. The Author of the Progamma ſays a little after (f), Equidem invidia & malignitas, ut ſunt virtutis fata, non unum in eum jaculata fuit fulmen; ſed & illa, quæ viventi gravis fuit, mortui famæ, credo, favebit, ſuamque vel imperitiam vel livorem tandem profitebitur. He doth not point out the Cauſes of that Envy and Malignity that perſecuted Henichius: but I conjecture, that the peaceable Inclination of that Profeſſor, furniſh'd Pretences to ſpeak ill of him.

(A) Was crowned by Pope Celeſtine III.] They tell this Circumſtance of that Coronation. As the Emperor (g) "was at his Feet, Celeſtin, who put the "Crown on his Head, lift up his Foot, and kick'd "it down, to ſhew, that he could give it and take it "away. Baronius praiſes that Action, but things "in my Opinion have changed their Aſpect ſince, "and there is not one Prince who would ſincerely "ſubſcribe to the Opinion of that Cardinal. I cite the Author that ſpeaks thus.

(B) She lay-in publickly.] Here is a Paſſage of Brantome, which deſerves to be read: (h) Conſtantia, Queen of Sicily, who had never ſtir'd from the Cloyſter, leading all her Youth and Life in Veſtal Chaſtity, ſetting her ſelf at Liberty at the Age of Fifty, and being not handſome, but all decrepit, had a mind to taſt the Pleaſures of the Fleſh; ſhe married, and grew big with Child at the Age of Fifty two, which ſhe reſolv'd to be delivered of publickly in the Plains and Meadows of Palermo. Having caus'd a Tent and Pavilion to be erected, that no Body might diſtruſt the Legitimacy of her Fruit, which was one of the greateſt Miracles that has been ſeen ſince St. Elizabeth. The Hiſtory of Naples ſays, notwithſtanding, that he was reputed ſuppoſititious: however, he proved a very great Man: But moſt Baſtards are Brave, as a great Man once told me.

(C) Did not hinder the World from ſaying.] Brantome has juſt told it us. But here is another Author, who will point to us the Proofs of it better. It is verified (ſaith he) (i) that Women Fifty Years old and upwards, have been Children. We have an Example of it in that renowned Nun Conſtantia, the Mother of Frederick II. who being taken from a Cloiſter, was the only Heireſs and Queen of Sicily. She having conceived an Off-ſpring at the Age of Fifty Years and more, to take away all Suſpition, had a Pavilion ſet up in a publick place of a certain Town in Sicily, and in the preſence of the beſt qualified Ladies of the Country, lay-in in publick. Notwithſtanding which many diſputed that Adventure; amongſt others, the Marquis of Ancona, named Marquardus, who offered to teſtifie, that that Child was not the Iſſue of Henry and Conſtantia, as was ſuppoſed. This is ſaid by Pandolfo (1) Collenuccio. If it may be ſaid, that the moſt exquiſite Precautions are uſeleſs againſt Love, we may ſay alſo, that they are ſo againſt Ambition. Do whatever you pleaſe to convince the Publick, that ſuch or ſuch a Child-Birth was not imaginary, but moſt real, you will always find Anſwers ready for you: The Expedient that cur'd St. Thomas's Incredulity, is the only one that can be proof againſt theſe Cavils; unleſs I put my Finger, &c. will they ſay to you, as that Apoſtle did, I will not believe (a). Nay I know not but after that Teſtimony or Touch they would ſay, I have ſeen and felt how it came in. Was your Husband capable of doing it?

(D) Was neither a Nun, nor very old.] 'Tis the common Opinion, that ſhe was taken from a Cloyſter, and that ſhe was diſpens'd with to marry Henry VI. and that ſhe conceived about the Age of 55. But there are Hiſtorians who deny it. See the Sequel of the Paſſage of Camerarius, which I have cited. (b) Poſſibly John Michael Brutus (c) took occaſion from this Story, flatly to deny, that Conſtantia was ever a Nun or Abbeſs, or that Pope Celeſtin diſpens'd with her Marriage, foraſmuch as according to his Calculation ſhe was then 60 Years old. On the contrary, he alledges Hugo Falcandus the Hiſtorian, who ſaith ſhe was then in the Flower of her Age, and married to Henry, in the Reign of William, ſirnamed the Good, when Frederick Barbaroſſa was yet alive: But that the Confuſion of Times was the cauſe of that Ambiguity. I am of Opinion, ſays he, that ſhe was conveyed from the Palace Royal to an Abbey of Nuns, when the People mutinying, impriſoned King William, ſirnamed the Bad, and that no more convenient Place could be found for her Security, during theſe Commotions. When theſe were appeaſed, that Princeſs, who had her Privileges, and was neither veil'd nor profeſt, liv'd among the Nuns, till ſhe married Henry. (d)

(B) That Diſobedience coſt him dear.] Mr. Varillas will furniſh me with a Commentary upon this Text. I will not only produce him for Henry the IId's Reign, but ſhall take his Words ſomething higher; The Diſgraces of Conſtable Montmorenci, ſays he, of Admiral Chabot, and of Chancellor Poyet, are related in the Ninth Book ſo as not to ſurprize thoſe, who have read in Bodin's Republick, that Francis I. the older he grew, the worſe he was; that he was convinced by his own Experience, that he could not have made choice of two Men leſs fit for Cabinet Council, than Montmorenci and Chabot; and that tho' Poyet could not be charg'd with the ſame Defect, yet this Chancellor had another as great, which was to carry things too far; that it was the Source of all the Misfortunes that happened to his Majeſty, and that if he continued the ſame Miniſtry, he was not to expect a more favourable Succeſs. The Event prov'd, that the Three Miniſters, who ſucceeded to the Places of the diſgrac'd, were more capable of filling them than they; and that if Henry II. had not reſtored the Conſtable Montmorenci, he had not been obliged to give up, in order to retrieve himſelf, 198 Towns or Strong-Places, and almoſt as much Extent of Ground, as would make one Third of France.

(C) Of a Treaty of Peace much more ſcandalous.] Mr. de Mezeray, though of all the Hiſtorians of France, he is the higheſt Favourer of the Subjects againſt the Court, yet he blames the Joy that the People expreſs'd for that Peace. The People, ſays he, (i) who always deſire Peace at any Price, greatly rejoic'd at this——But the Party of the Guiſes, the wiſe Politicians, and all the Nobility, highly condemned it, as a piece of Baſeneſs, that loſt France 198 Strong-Places, only for three that were reſtored, which were Ham, Catelet, and St. Quintin. He ſpeaks with greater force in his great Hiſtory (k). For in relating the Articles of that Peace, he inſerts after theſe Words, that the more ſtrongly to unite the Hearts of the Princes, this Parentheſis (but rather to cover with ſome honurable Pretence, the Shame and Loſs that France received by this unfortunate Treaty) and here's what he ſays towards the end of the ſame Page. "Theſe Articles being brought to "the King, and communicated by his Majeſty to the "Princes and Grandees of his Kingdom, there were "few but judg'd them entirely diſadvantageous, and "ſhameful to France; indeed they were univerſally condemn'd by their Murmurs. Briſſac having Advice "of it, though the Articles had been diſguiſed to "him, diſpatch'd Boyvin-Villars to Court, he that "has left us the Memoirs of the War of Piedmont, "with Inſtructions to lay before the King his moſt "humble Remonſtrances, and to diſſwade him from "ſo diſhonourable a Peace. Concluding, that if "his Majeſty was reſolv'd to give up what he poſſeſs'd in Italy, which was worth the beſt Province "of his Kingdom, and could bring him in, all Expences defray'd, 300000 Crowns Revenue, he only "begg'd for all the Recompence of his good Services, that he would pleaſe to baniſh him, together with all the Forces that were beyond the "Alps, as Rebels, and that he knew how to preſerve the Places which he held, at the Expence of "the Milaneſe, and the Republick of Genoa, or at "leaſt would die glorioufly, in a Country, where "all the Forces of Europe had not been able to force "him to loſe an Inch of Ground in the Ten Years "time that he had the Defence of it——The "King expreſs'd a good Liking to his Zeal, but "having his Heart wholly ſet upon Peace, "he anſwered, that though he ſhould make it "upon the Conditions propoſed to him, he ſhould ſtill "retain enough to make himſelf fear'd by his Enemies (l). Whereupon Guiſe, moved either by his "own Intereſt, or by a ſenſe of Honour and Conſcience, boldly interrupting him, ſaid, Sir, your "Majeſty will pardon me, if I ſay, that this is not "the right way to do it, and that though you ſhould "find for 25 Years to come, as contrary a Fortune as that of the laſt Year, you would not loſe "in all that time, what they would have you "give up in one Day. It did not coſt the late King, "when he was vanquiſh'd and a Priſoner, ten, &c. I omit all the Reaſons of the Duke of Guiſe, but no. what follows them in the Hiſtorian; He (a) laid many other things with ſo much vehemence, as made the King often change his Colour, but not his Reſolution; the Dye was caſt, and whoever was the cauſe of it, either his Favourites, or his natural Temper, his Courage was ſo caſt down, that he could no longer bear the War: He therefore ratify'd the Treaty, and the Peace was publiſh'd the 10th of April——All the French Authors, who have written of that time, have all'd it an unfortunate and curſed Peace. Briſſac hearing that it was made, cry'd out often, An miſerable France, what Evils——He remained Governour of the Five Towns and Eight Caſtles which the King retain'd, with 8000 Foot and 450 Horſe, and reſtored all the other places, but he firſt demoliſh'd the greateſt part of them, and ſold the Ammunition according to the King's Command; not without much difficulty of receiving the Money, and Orders that were neceſſary from Court, becauſe the Conſtable favouring the Duke of Savoy, did all that he could to put the Places entire into his Hands, and even thoſe that the King had reſerved to himſelf. We ſhall ſee below, (b) that the Court of France was ſo weak under Charles IX. and Henry III. as to ſuffer it ſelf to be perſwaded to evacuate that little it had reſerv'd; and there is no doubt but that in Charles the XIth's time, the Conſtable had a great Share in that Miſmanagement. When we conſider that immenſe Wealth he heap'd together, we can't ſay of him, as of ſo many others, that in managing his Maſter's Affairs well, he manag'd his own very well; but we muſt ſay, that in managing his own Affairs very well, he manged thoſe of his Maſter very ill. Did not he under Charles IX. enter into a League with the Guiſes? was not he the cauſe of that prodigious Power they roſe to, that was ſo fatal to the Monarchy, and had like to have given to France a Fourth Race of Kings? consented to that disadvantageous Peace, had it not been for a Spirit of Persecution, which had got the Mastery (D) of that Prince. The Constable deserves also much Blame, for not having given better Advice to his Master, with Relation to the Dutchess de Valentinois, who in an Age disproportionate to that of Henry II. held him in her Chains, and made a very unjust Use of his Slavery. Instead of fortifying this Prince against the Snares of that Woman, he intrigued for her, and devoted himself to her Faction †. 'Tis pity the Reign of Henry II. had these Stains in it, for it was otherwise remarkable for glorious Actions, and for very noble Successes, which cruelly mortified Charles V. We cannot deny Henry II. the Glory of his being brave, and 'tis said

† See the Article Poitiers.

When Francis I. disgrac'd the Constable (c), he charg'd him with Ignorance in the two principal Parts of his Employ, which was War and Policy. See the Character that the Partisans of the Guises give of him in Mezeray (d).

Some Criticks will say perhaps, that Mr. Mezeray does too much extenuate the Advantages that accrued to Henry II. by the Treaty of Chateau. Why does he content himself with mentioning the Three Towns that were restored to France? Why doth he suppress the Conquest of Calais, Metz, Toul and Verdun? But that Criticism would be a very bad one; for the Treaty of Cateau did not grant these Four Places to Henry II. It left the Empire at full Liberty to redemand the Restitution of the three last; and it solemnly engaged France to restore Calais to England at Eight Years end. Which is a thing not minded by an anonymous Historian, who speaks thus (e). "The King of France restored to the King of Spain, "all that he had conquered of him on both sides the "Mountains. Item, to the Prince of Piedmont, "Bresse, Savoy, and Piedmont, except Four Towns: "To Genoa, the Isle of Corsica; Siena to the Duke "of Florence; and retained nothing but Calais, with- "out gaining a Foot of any other Land in that long "and pernicious War, which had laid waste so many "Provinces, plundered, burnt, ruin'd so many Ci- "ties, Towns, Villages, and Castles, and that had "occasioned the Death of so many Princes, Lords, "Gentlemen, Captains, Soldiers, Citizens and Pea- "sants, caused the Rapes and Violations of so many "Women and Maids; in a Word, that had turned "all Europe topsyturvy. The King gave up above "200 (others say almost twice that Number of) Pla- "ces, for the Conquest whereof a Sea of his Sub- "jects Blood had been spilt, the Treasures of the "Kingdom exhausted, his own Demesns morgt- "ged, and himself indebted on all sides. This His- torian supposes, that Henry II. saw his Dominions enlarged at least by the Cession of Calais, but that's a Mistake: all the rest of his Discourse is solid. And as it is certain, that one might have represented to the King of Spain, what (f) Annibal represent- ed to the Roman General; what Thunderbolts does that Discourse level at the head of Henry II? It might have been said to the King of Spain, that the Coun- try as he had spoiled France of by the Treaty of Peace, were not worth the immense Summs that War had cost him, nor so many Soldiers and Officers as he had lost in it. If that was capable of lessening the Joy which an advantageous Peace gave him; what a heart-breaking must it be to the Monarch to whom it was disadvantageous? To return from a long War with empty Hands, is a Disgrace, said Homer (g): which might have been more forcibly said in such a Case as this.

(c) "Bodies, in the Pre-aux-Clercs, there to sing aloud "Clement Marot's Psalms. This ought to teach Princes, that their persecuting Edicts expose them to great Inconveniencies. This is the reason that their Bonfires afflict one part of their Subjects, and that the Successes of their Enemies afford them Consolation. If they complain they have evil Subjects, it ought to be answered, that 'tis they that make them (i) such; for to pretend that a persecuted Party will afflict themselves for the publick Calamities which are the Source of their Repose, and the Foundation of a very plausible hope of Prosperity, is to pretend, that the Primitive Ages of Christianity should return again; whereas those times will not come twice. 'Tis to expect, that Men should be like those of the Millenium if it ever comes. But let us return to Henry II. When he saw, "That the Protestants "thought to take Advantage (k) of the Lots that "was receiv'd in the Battel of St. Quintin, he pub- "lished a new Edict, forbidding all the Judges to "lessen the Punishment of Death, and the Confisca- "tion of Goods, towards all those who should be "found, not only guilty of Heresy, but convicted "of having brought into France Books, printed at "Geneva, against the Doctrine of the Catholick "Church. Thus the proceeding against the Calvinists "was more rigorous than before. But as that hun- dred does not from multiplying, nor even from en- gaging Persons of the first Quality in their Party, the King saw, that in order to extirpate them, he must make Peace with the House of Austria; and this doubtless was one of the great (l) Motives to the shutting his Eyes against the good Condition to which he had reduced his Affairs. He had stopt the Pro- gress of his Enemies, and had also taken well-forti- fied Places. But that signified nothing, he had ra- ther grant them all they had a mind to, than not to have his Hands at Liberty to exterminate the Protes- tants of his Kingdom. Thus we have seen the same Court, to let slip the most favourable Occasions of aggrandizing it self in the Year 1684, in order to apply it self solely to the Suppression of the Edict of Nantes. They who will be possest with this Spirit, must renounce the Title of Conquerors. If Henry II. had long survived the ignominious Peace he accepted, he would only have been taken up with Tournaments and Persecutions, but he died a little after it was signed. M. Maimbourg is an exceptio- nable Witness, as to the Joy he says the Heretick conceived upon it; his Words are these (m). Thus he was lamented with most unfeigned Tears, and in- finitely regretted by all his Subjects, except the Protestants alone, who thinking themselves delivered by his Death, from what they call'd the Persecution of the Church, express'd in a most unworthy manner by their Words and Actions, and scandalous Writings, the excessive Joy they had thereupon.

We may make with regard to Henry II. the same Observation as to Francis I (n). He attakt the Party weakly on one side, while he made it stronger on the other. He put to Death some particular inconsider- able Persons in France, and at the same time (o) en- tered into Alliance with the Protestants of Germany against Charles V, &c. And would fain be called the Protector of the German Liberty, which was to say at that time, the Protector of the Protestants (z). The other Catholick Princes observed the same Conduct (a). We find these remarkable Words in Mr. de Labourer: To pluck the Tares from the Wheat, (says he) (b), God will only chuse Princes that are Innocent and of a good Life, and not employ Politick Hands, as were those of the Counsellors of all the Catholick Crowns of that Time, who only Weeded their own Fields to cast the Darnel into those of their Neighbours, and who Persecuted Heresy only as a Faction against Authority. Charles V. and the Kings said, that Queen Elizabeth (E) of England, admired him upon that Account. But after all, it will be an eternal Testimony of his Weakness, and of the Dominion which his Favourites had over him, that against the Advice of the wisest Heads of his Kingdom, he signed the Treaty of Peace of Chateau in Cambresis *. A Peace, not less scandalous to France than that the Emperor Jovinian made with the King of Persia, so much decryed by all Antiquity: A Peace, that by one Stroak of a Pen, lost in one Moment all the Labours and Conquests of many Years, and an Extent of Country, equalling one Third † of the Kingdom. No Body profited so much by that Disgrace of France, as the Duke of Savoy; for besides being restor'd to his Dominions, he Married (F) the Sister of Henry II. a Princess of great Merit, and who knew how to Bubble (G) the Court of France very Advantageously for her Husband. She was not Young when she Married; for which Reason the Murmurs against the Peace (H) reach'd even to her. 'Tis Kings of Spain his Successors have countenanced the Protestants of Germany and France on many Occasions. See the Proof of it in the 1st Tome of the Apology for the Catholicks (e), composed by Mr. Arnauld. The Spanish Embassadours sollicited Succours in England for the Duke of Rohan. What Grotius Writes upon it is Remarkable (d). Validus est rumor, Gonthomerum, & qui in aula Anglica Hispanicæ sunt factionis, apertè profiteri, non debere à Rege Britanniarum deseri religionis consortes in Gallia, ne si quando vetera jura repetere ipsi fix animus, desint, qui partes Anglicas sequantur. See in the Political Will of the Marquis (e) de Louvois, some Reflections upon the Violences Exercised in Hungary against the Protestants by Order of the same Court, which soon after so signally served the interests of the Protestants of Great Britain and Holland, whom Lewis XIV. and James II. were resolved, as they say, to Oppress.

(E) Queen Elizabeth of England admired him for his Bravery.] Brantome will instruct us about this matter: I have heard, says he, (f) the present Queen of England say, that he was a King and a Prince that she most desired to see of any in the World, for the good Report that she had heard of him, and that great Renown which he every where obtained———Being at Table discoursing Familiarly with her Nobles, she said these Words, (after having been much in the King's commendation) he was a Prince that I most desired to see of any, and I had already sent him Word that I would quickly see him, having commanded some Ships to be well fitted out, that I might go over to France on purpose to see him. See the same Story in the Memoirs of the Gallant Ladies, where 'tis expressly observed that the Queen desired to see Henry II. because he was Brave, Valiant, and Generous, and very Martial (g).

(F) The Duke of Savoy Married the Sister of Henry II.] Her Name was Margaret, as was her Aunt's the Queen of Navarre, and she was like her, much addicted to Study, and a Patroness of the Learned. She was suspected to have imbib'd the new Opinions (h), and to have Communicated something of them to Catherine de Medicis. See her Elogy in Brantome (i) and in Mr. le Laboureur. The latter tells us a Passage which deserves to be known. Margaret of France, says he (k), was Married at 46 (l) Years of age, and as she seemed to be too Old to bear Children, 'twas believed that the noise of her great Belly was a Stratagem, to oblige the King to restore her more willingly the Places he detained. Whereupon the Sieur Huraut de Bois-Taillé, Embassador at Venice, wrote a Letter the 27th of July 1561. to Bernardin Bochetel Bishop of Rennes, the French Embassadour in Germany, wherein he had these Words. 'Tis said that the Dutchess of Savoy is big with Child, but I believe, that is done ad aliquid. That Report was verified by the Birth of Charles Emanuel Grandfather to the present Duke of Savoy (m).

(G) Bubble the Court of France.] The Treaty of Chateau imported (n) that in three Years the Rights the King pretended to upon the Territories of the Duke of Savoy, should be Examined and Regulated by Commissaries on both sides. King Francis II. and the Duke nam'd Deputies for that purpose in the Year 1560. The King's Deputies made six very considerable Demands; but instead of obtaining any thing, France abandoned all the Towns she had reserved. She ordered by Letters Patents the 8th of August 1561. to Restore to the Duke, Turin, Chivas, Quiers and Asti, excepting the Ammunition and Artillery, in exchange for Pignerol, Savillan and Perouse, with their Dependencies. Imbert de la Platiere, Bourdillon, the King's Lieutenant beyond the Alps formed many difficulties and sent great Remonstrances to the Council, to hinder the Execution of that Order; and would not obey it till after three Commands, and upon the most solemn Discharges imaginable. The Dutchess plaid her part very well in that Negotiation; her Prudence was praised for having obtained by her Address the Places that still remain'd behind, and which the Commissaries of the King could not Guard against her gentle way of raising an innocent Revolt in their Hearts, and forcing the most impenetrable Places. 'Tis Mr. le Laboureur that says this (o). Brantome tells this at length, the diverse Sentiments of the Ministers, the Oppositions formed by Bourdillon, and the ways he suffered himself to be wrought upon. It cost the Duke and Dutchess of Savoy many Presents (p). There remain'd still three Places of Piedmont in the French Hands, viz. Pignerol, Savillan and Perouse. The Dutchess seconded her Husband wonderfully to regain them, when Henry III. pass'd by Turin in his return from Poland. I'll use the Words of Mr. Varillas (q). " The Duke " and Dutchess of Savoy, who proposed to do what " Spain never could when in the most flourishing " Condition, that is, to send the French beyond the " Alpes; put in practice an Artifice wholly New, " which was that of Diversions, and Feasts succeeding one another so fast that there was scarce time " left for Sleeping. Some Relations that come from " very good Hands, speak of a magnificent Collation " which cost 100000 Crowns; the Duke and Dutchess " were at the Expence of it, and to Reimburse " themselves they prest Henry III. to Restore to " them Pignerol, Savillan and Perouse. Henry promised to gratify their Requests, and kept his Word with them: for holding a Council at Lyons upon that Affair, the Evacuation of these three Places was there concluded on; notwithstanding the strong Reasons he that Commanded there, alleaged against it. It was the Duke of Nevers (r). " He had the " liberty of saying what he pleased, and the satisfaction that the Memorial he presented to second " his Speech, tho' very long, was read in the presence of Henry the Third; but the Restitution of " these three Places was nevertheless resolved on, " and his Majesty gave him Orders with his own " Mouth to Evacuate them. He should have stop'd " there, since all the World did him the Justice to " believe he had satisfied his Conscience and his " Honour; but he had Recourse to other Precautions, " which drew upon him the Aversion of the Court, " and hindered him a long time from entering the " Council of State. He obstinately sollicited that " the Order he had received from the King's Mouth " should be moreover Written with his own Hand; " that the Queen-mother, the Princes of the Blood " and the Officers of the Crown should Sign it, and " that it should be Registered in the Parliament together with the Writing, which he had made to " be dispensed with it, and that the principal Cities " of the Kingdom should inlert it into their Archives. All this was almost granted him, but " not without Reproaching him that he affected to " Signalize himself at his Masters Cost, and that he " ought to imitate the Mareschal Brissac, who was " content in the like case to repeat his humble Remonstrances and to desire they would send him a " Successor.

'Tis without Reaſon that a Modern Author has attempted to juſtify (I) the Conduct of Henry III. who pay'd ſo dear for the Entertainment that Princeſs made him. The Peace of Cateau is not the only Monument of the too great Weakneſs of Henry the II. The Impunity of his Favourites after the prodigious Wealth they had got (K) by unjuſt ways, is another Monument of it. He Died with a Wound he received in a Tournament *. A ſtrange Adventure, and more extraordinary than diſmal, for I don't believe there ever were any Monarchs that loſt their Lives on ſuch occaſions. It would have been infinitely more glorious for him to have loſt his Life in a Battle, than in theſe mock Fights, or Combats of Friendſhip; where beſides, he behav'd himſelf " much King Henry deſired Peace and loved his " Siſter, that he would ſpare nothing in the World " to place her well, when yet the greateſt part of " France and Piedmont Murmured at it, and ſaid it " was a little too much. Others thought it very " ſtrange, and others very incredible, until they " had ſeen it with their own Eyes; and even Strangers " Laugh'd at us for it; and they who lov'd France " and its Intereſt, Wept and Lamented it, eſpecially " thoſe of Piedmont, who would not come over to " their firſt Maſter——As for the Soldiers who " had been a long time accuſtomed to the Garriſons, " and to the Eaſe and delicate Suſtenance of that " Country, we ſhould not ask what they ſaid, " how they Cried out, and Blab'd upon that occaſion; " not only the Gaſcons, but others. Hey-day, ſaid " they, muſt ſo many fine and large Territories be " given up for one little piece of Fleſh about a " Woman: others cried ſhe might well keep her " Virginity (b) for 45 Years to loſe it at laſt for " the Ruin of France. If they had been as Diſor- " derly, Seditious, and Mutinous at that time, as " we have ſeen them ſince in our Civil Wars, we " may be aſſured every one of them would have " taken a ſhare and have ſeiz'd thoſe Places, which " they would not eaſily have been driven out of. Is it not ſtrange that Mr. le Labourer, who had newly read theſe Words, ſhould come and tell us notwithſtanding, that only a few Politicians found fault with her coſtly Marriage, and ALL OTHERS were glad that ſhe found a Recompence ſuitable to her Merit, and that ſhe had given her for her Dowry, the Eſtates that had been taken from her Husband. This is the Language of an Elogy-maker: Such a Man without any Order for it, takes upon him notwithſtanding in the Name of the Publick, to make all the Steps neceſſary to a Panegyrick, and is not at all concern'd, tho' the Fact be refuted by the beſt inſtructed Authors. Mezeray, who wrote a Hiſtory, not a Panegyrick (d), agrees with the Teſtimony of Brantome.

(I) A Modern Author has attempted to juſtify the Conduct.] That Modern is the Antagoniſt of Coſtar. The latter was offended that l'Oiture (f) was Cenſured for having ſaid by way of Raillery, that he valued more a good Soop than the Panegyrick of Pliny, or the longeſt Oration of Iſocrates. Monſieur de Girac, he goes on, though that Monſieur de Voiture was as great a Fool as that profane Perſon, who Sold his Birth-right for a Meſs of Pottage, or that Prince of ours, who gave Pignerol for a good Meal. Whether is not a Man carried, when in a Paſſion, in the heat of a Quarrel? The leaſt faults of one's Adverſary are converted into Crimes. Girac, who in another Man's Caſe, would probably have been content to have ſaid, that the word Fool was too ſtrong to be employed in ſignifying the fault of a Prince, turns Informer againſt Coſtar his Enemy, as guilty of a Treaſonable Crime. Conſider well all his Words (g) " He has Dared, ſays he, by a Villanous At- " tempt, that deſerves the ſevereſt Puniſhments, to " caſt his Venom and Malice upon the Sacred Perſon " of our Kings. Do's not he compare the Liberality " (1) of Henry III. to the Sottiſhneſs of Eſau, who " parted with his Birth-right for a Meſs of Pottage? " Do's he not call that great Prince a Fool for having " reſtored Pignerol to the Duke of Savoy, who had " the Honour to be his Uncle; and from whom he " expected great Succours in the preſſing neceſſity " of his Affairs? Was ever Lewis XII. taken for a " Fool who made a preſent of the Principality of " Bearn to the King of Navarre, and who diſmem- " bered his Kingdoms of a Part of that Importance? " Did any body accuſe the People of Rome of " Folly (2), tho' they frequently gave intire " Provinces and Kingdoms to Kings their Allies? " and if Alexander, as Plutarch ſays, willingly parted " with the Iſle of Cyprus, as a price for ſome Verſes " compoſed in his Praiſe, muſt a King of France be " look'd upon as a Mad-man amongſt any that have the " leaſt common Senſe, for having reſtor'd a Place to his " Relation, who had received him in his Dominions " with prodigious Coſt and Magnificence? A little after he ask'd whether Mr. Coſtar did not apprehend being Puniſh'd under the Reign of a Prince that is a near Relation to Henry, who lived not long ago? And he cites Guicciardin and Paul Jovius for the extreme Veneration the French have for their Monarchs. Tho' he had Nam'd all the Soveraigns that gave up Cities, or Provinces, or even Kingdoms from the beginning of the World, he would never have perſwaded Men of Sence and Underſtanding, that any one ever made the like Preſents in the like Circumſtances of Henry III. without committing a Folly. Louis XII. [illegible]'d himſelf of Pignerol in favour of a Prince who ow'd his glorious Re-eſtabliſhment to the Spaniards, who in his Heart was a Violent (i) Spaniard, that is, always ready to countenance the moſt formidable Enemy France then had. It was to ſuch a Duke of Savoy that a place was deliver'd which opened the Kingdom to the Enemy, and which kept the ſame Duke in Fear, and hindered him from Leaguing with Spain. But, ſays one, that Duke had ſo nobly treated Henry III. and been at ſo vaſt Expences to Regale him at Turin, that it was juſt to regard him as a good and conſtant Friend. No, that does not follow, 'tis only the Ignorant that can reckon upon that Conſtancy and Friendſhip of Soveraigns. To ſee the Preſents they make and the Letters they Write in time of Peace to one another, one would Swear they are moſt hearty Friends and would continue ſo all their Life; but 'tis often true that they are Negotiating at the ſame time an Engagement for a Rupture, and have no deſign of ſerving one another any farther than they find occaſion of getting by their Hoſtilities. Which was never ſo true, as when Henry III. was ſo infinitely Careſs'd at the Court of Savoy. The Duke was entirely diſpos'd to take Advantage of the Confuſions he ſaw France in, and to make uſe of the Spaniards Aſſiſtance; And he left a Son who Inherited the ſame Paſſion and not only ſeiz'd the Marquiſate of Saluces, but alſo form'd Deſigns for the Diſmembring of France and totally ruining the Monarchy (k). self unsuitably to his Dignity, and in a way more becoming (K△) a Young Cavalier, than the Person of a King. Many Reflections were made upon that sad (K△△) Disaster. He never spoke (L) after he was Wounded, so that all the Discourses that are ascribed to him, are only Stories forg'd at Pleasure. The sincerity wherewith the French Historians have confest the Faults of this Monarch, and the Ignominy he brought upon the Nation in preferring the Counsels of (M) the Constable before the Remonstrances of the Duke of Guise, is scarce to be seen in other Historians. The Protestants thought they should be Gainers by his Death, but they experienced greater Severities still under Francis II. And Humanely speaking, there had been an end of them (N) in France, " have their Estates, or to force them to Purchase " their Pardon at their Intercession. This Historian had just been saying that Henry II. was not accused for any other Fault, than for being too easy and most capable of being Governed than Governing himself. 'Tis one of the greatest Faults of a King, because generally they that Govern him in that Case do more mischief than if he Govern'd them.

(K△) Unsuitably to his Dignity and in a way more becoming.] This was the judgment of wise Persons, as we learn from an Author of that time. (a) " A Tournament was appointed in St. Anthony's " Street before the Tournelles, with all the Magni- " ficence and Pomp imaginable, for as much as the " King was one of the Challengers followed by the " Dukes of Ferrara, Guise and Nemours, which a " great many People of good Sence thought strange; " saying, the Majesty of a King ought to be judge " of the Blows and not enter the Lists. Likewise " that in the Old Romances, Kings on such Oc- " casions, never attempted Acts of meer Knights, " but disguised themselves, if they had a mind " to enter the Lists, or abstain'd wholly from it: " Yet such was the misfortune of the King, that he " would have the honour of the Juste. And I be- " lieve the reason he expresst for it was to shew " Strangers how dexterous he was at Arms, and " skill'd in the management of a Horse.

(a) Pasquier's Letters, Book 4.

(K△△) Many Reflections were made upon that sad Disaster.] I will not allege the Testimony of Protestant Writers; 'tis visible Stephen Pasquier will have greater force (b). " See how our good King " Henry Died. And as the common People natu- " rally fix their Eyes upon the Actions of their " King, so that Death did not happen without the " Commentaries and Interpretations of some People. " For to tell you at length how things happen'd in " France; as soon as the Peace was made, the Car- " dinal of Lorrain, who had been one of the prin- " cipal Mediators of it, declared in full Parliament, " that it was the King's Opinion to make it at what " Price and Condition soever, that he might be " more at Liberty from thence forward to extermi- " nate and banish the Heresy of Calvin. And on " the 10th day of June he came actually in Person " into Parliament to take the Opinion of every Senator " about the Punishment of the Hereticks. Where- " upon many gave it with great Liberty. Some " were of advice to suspend the Punishment till the " Decision of a general Council, which they said " was necessary. Whereupon the King was mov'd " with so great and just a Passion, that he com- " manded immediately Montgommery to Seize some of " the Company, who had given their Opinion more " freely than he would have them. They were " forthwith carried Prisoners to the Bastile. For " which Reason, said these new Commentators, this " Disaster fell by a just Judgment of God upon the " King, as a Vengeance upon him for these injust " Imprisonments. That Opinions ought to be free " and not Sounded by a King, that after hearing " them he may commit the Councellors to a close " Prison. That God had Chastis'd him by the " Hand of that Minister, who had assisted him in " making those Imprisonments. Likewise that as on " the 13th of June, he had given that Disgrace to " the Court of Parliament, so on the 10th of July " following Day for Day, he lost his Life. Thus " some of the People devis'd according to their par- " ticular Passions concerning that Death; being Ig- " norant at the same time, that the Mysterious Pro- " vidence of God is concealed from us, and is " such as by Reason of our Weakness, we often- " refer to our Opinions than to truth. Anne du Bourg was one of those the King shut up in the Bastile, and against whom he was most Enrag'd, for amongst other Discourse (c) he said he would see him Burnt with both his Eyes (d). Father Paul observes that the Queen Mother was horribly Provok'd at the Lutherans Publishing in their Manifesto's, that the Wound of the King her Husband in the Eye was a Punishment of God for the Menaces he had made Anne du Bourg in saying that he would see him Burnt.

(L) He never spoke after he was Wounded.] Most Historians say, that a Splinter of Montgommery's Lance flew into Henry's Eye, and wounded him Mortally; but what Mezeray says of it, seems more probable. It happened, says he, (e) that Montgommery breaking his Lance in the Plastron, could not retain his Arm, so that he fell with the Trunk of it which remain'd in his Hand with so great Violence upon his Right Eye, that a Splinter of it past even to the hinder part of his Head. In this manner Montgommery might appear infinitely more Criminal, tho' in truth he had not done it Voluntarily. The Historian adds, it was not truly known at that time, whether the King spoke or not, after he had received the Wound, the truth being disguised by those that were about him, or render'd uncertain by the different Reports, that were spread by those who had different Interests. There are some who tell us, the fine Remonstrances he made to his Son; some others add that when he was carried out of the Lists, he look'd towards the Bastile where were the Prisoners of Parliament, saying with a great Sigh, that he was afraid, he had Punish'd wrongfully innocent Men, and that the Cardinal of Lorrain immediately taking him up, exhorted him to reject that Thought which was suggested to him by the Tempter. Others (f) maintain that he lost his Voice and all manner of Sence from the Moment he was Struck, which is confirm'd by the Arguments of many Physicians, who say that a Man becomes necessarily Dumb, when his Brain is Wounded or violently shaken. Trust now after this to the Relations that are spread abroad concerning the last Words of dying Men.

Whence we may be convinc'd of the falsity of the different Relations which were given out according to Mens different Interests and Passions.*

(M) Preferring the Counsels of the Constable before the Remonstrances of the Duke of Guise.] The Constable, who was Prisoner from the time of the Battle of St. Quintin, resolv'd to recover his Liberty at any Price. The Guises made too much advantage of his Absence. You see then the Reason, why he Negotiated a Treaty of Peace, in which he granted the Spaniards all they had a mind too. And he so well knew the blind side of his Master, that he easily perswaded him to consent to that Treaty. In vain the Duke of Guise imploy'd a thousand Demonstrations (b), to make him reject a Peace which did Sacrifice to the Spaniards, the Glory of the French Name, and more Places in one Day than they had been able to Conquer in an Age, the King was Deaf to all that. We must relate here an Observation of Brantome (i); he pretends that Henry II. tired and disgusted with the Insolence of the Guises, resolv'd to send 'em Home; for which end he was oblig'd to regain his Constable, and to terminate the War; he wrote to him therefore (k) and to the Marshal de St. André to Mediate a Peace, which they did to our Disadvantage. Let us not forget another Artifice; these two Prisoners and the Dutchess of Valentinois inrich'd themselves with the Spoils of the Hereticks: and no doubt but that to obtain a Peace they caus'd the King to accept of any Conditions, that they might more easily prosecute the same Business of the Inquisition. It is certain (l) that the Cabals of that Dutchess, seconded by the Constable, drew the King into that Precipice.

(Q.) The Ladies had ſhewn Francis I. theſe Aſtrological Predictions.] About two Years before the Death of that Prince ſome Ladies, who had a great ſhare in his Friendſhip, told him that the Stars promis'd the Duke of Orleans great Conqueſts, and Prognoſticated to the Dauphin nothing worthy of the Quality of a King of France. They held theſe Diſcourſes, knowing the particular Affection of Francis I. for the Duke, and hoping to Enrich themſelves by the Intereſt of that Young Prince. They prais'd him, they cry'd him up to the Skies, and decry'd the Dauphin (i) as a dull and heavy Man, and who had the moſt Unfortunate Nativity in the World. Caſtellan could not bear either their Flatteries or Reproaches: But turning to theſe Ladies with a ſtern Look, he told 'em that Aſtrology was a difficult thing to underſtand, and that it was ſtill more difficult to adjuſt Humane Events to it; he added, that the Vanity and Impudence of Aſtrologers render'd them unworthy of Credit; that he had formerly Studied thoſe things under Turrean and made as much Progreſs in them as another; that for a ſort of Amuſement and for the ſatisfaction of the Curious, he had erected the Schemes of the Dauphin and the Duke of Orleans with all poſſible exactneſs; and that according to the Rules of the Aſtrological Art, he had found that the Duke was to have a Good, Great and Warlike Soul; that he was to be ſupported with the Forces and Friendſhip of the Great, and (l) arrive to a very conſiderable Power; that the Dauphin would not be inferiour to him either with reſpect to Military Virtue, or thoſe other Qualities that are worthy of a Prince; and (m) that he ſhould Reign a moſt ſucceſsful Conqueror of his Enemies: But that all theſe ways of Predicting Futurities, being vain and dubious, the ſureſt way was to bottom upon the Morals, and Genius of theſe Princes reſpectively, to conjecture at their Fortunes. The King heard this Diſcourſe very favourably; the Flatterers of both Sexes were inrag'd with him. The Dauphin having heard what Caſtellan had ſaid, was extreamly pleas'd with it, not becauſe he had been prais'd, but becauſe his Innocence had been cleared before Francis the Firſt, which he (n) feated they endeavoured to render ſuſpected, quem ne in ſuſpicionem aut odium traheretur metuebat (o). Oh the curſed Peſts of a Court! Who can ſufficiently deteſt 'em? What Deviliſhneſs is it to Cheriſh by ſuch Artifices the Jealouſy of two Brothers! We muſt not forget that the Aſtrology of Caſtellan proved falſe with reſpect to the Duke of Orleans. He Died a little while after; and yet it had beſpoke him a very great Power, which Caſtellan conſidered as a thing to come; and he could not conſider it otherwiſe at that time; for this Prince Died 19 Months or thereabouts before his Father, and was not yet 24 Years Old.

(R) That a famous Aſtrologer foretold.] See what Brantome ſays of it (p). I have heard, and I have it from good Hands, that ſome Years before he Died, (ſome ſay ſome Days) there was a Diviner who Calculated his Nativity and preſented him with it, in which he found, he muſt Die in a Duel and ſingle Combat. The Conſtable was preſent, to whom the King ſaid, ſee, Friend, what Death is deſtin'd for me; Ah, Sir, Anſwered the Conſtable, will you believe theſe Raſcals, who are only Liars and Braggadochio's? Throw it into the Fire. Why ſo, Friend, replied the King? They ſometimes ſpeak truth; I don't care whether I Die that Death or another, nay, I ſhould rather chuſe to Die by the Hand of any Man whatever, provided he was Brave and Valiant, and I ſhould purchaſe Glory by it; and without minding what the Conſtable ſaid to him, he Committed that Prophecy to Monſieur de l'Aupeſpine, to keep it, and Order'd him to look it up till he ask'd him for it ——— (q) Now the King was no ſooner Wounded, and carried to his Chamber, but the Conſtable remembring that Prophecy, call'd Monſieur de l'Aupeſpine, and order'd him to look it out, which he did, and aſſoon as he had ſeen and read it with Tears in his Eyes; Ah! ſays he, ſee here the Combat and the ſingle Duel he was to Die in, 'tis done, he is a Dead Man; it was not poſſible for a Diviner to ſpeak better and clearer than this, tho' by their Natural Temper or by the Inſpiration of their Familiar Spirit, they are always Ambiguous and Doubtful, and therefore always ſpeak Ambiguouſly, but here he ſpoke out very clearly. Curſed be the Aſtrologer, that Propheſied ſo truly and yet ſo Ill. Mr. de Thou does not do like Brantome, who tells not the name of this Diviner: He calls him Luke Gauric, and adds that this Scheme was Erected at the requeſt of Catherine de Medicis, and that it was Laugh'd at till the King receiv'd his that are given of that Prediction, were alone sufficient to make us doubt (R △) whether it was made by the Astrologers. He had ten Children Legitimate, and two Natural. They tell things very remarkable concerning (S) the Mothers of the latter.

Henry II. was born at St. Germain in Laie, the 31st. of March, 1519. he had the Title of Duke of Orleans, when he married Catherine de Medicis, at Marseilles, the Twenty Eighth of October, 1553. he was but Fourteen Years and some Months old: which made Pope Clement the Seventh, Uncle to Catherine, fear that the Marriage was not consummated the Wedding-Night; and some Authors pretend, that by the Curiosity his Wound. Mr. de Thou gives out this Prediction as a certain matter of Fact (a). But they who cite Luke Gauric's own Words taken from the Horoscope of Henry II. are more to be believed. Now 'tis certain by his Words that he promised a long Life to this Monarch, and never threatned him with a fatal Duel. Gassendus has cited this great Example, and adds that Cardan was no less mistaken in the Horoscope of this Prince than Gauric (b). Constat ex Historiis Henricum II. Galliæ nostræ Regem obiisse anno ætatis quadragesimo completo, ex oculari vulnere: En autem de eo Gaurici vaticinium in Prognostico Anni MDLVI. Quoniam in sui natalis penè divim schemate habuit solem sub gradibus sue altitudinis Veneri ferè partiliter alligatum; cum & Lunam atque Venerem sub Arietis Asterismo, per Horoscopum progredientes, vivet fœlicissimus Annis LXX, deductis duobus mensibus, si nutu divino superaverit annos insalubres LXIII. Atque utinam Henricus secundus, quem ille extremâ tantum senectute, & morbo placidissimo fatis concessurum dixerat, non ætate potius florenti, & tam acerbo præcipitique fato nobis ereptus fuisset.*

(R △) The different Accounts——were alone sufficient to make us doubt whether it was made by the Astrologers.] See Stephen Pasquier's Account of it; wherein we find not the name of Gauric. It turns upon other People and other Circumstances (e). It seems that a long time before this Disaster had been secretly Prognosticated to the King by Hierome Cardan, who in a Scheme that he erected at his Nativity, promised him all things easie at the beginning of his Reign, but assur'd him in the Decline of his Life of an unfortunate End, and such as for the Grandeur of the King he obliged himself to be silent of. There was likewise a Report spread at Court, that upon the Cardinal of Lorrain's return from his second Voyage in Italy, a Letter was presented to him from a Few of Rome, that was greatly versed and Practic'd in these Fantastical Predictions, and Divinations, who admonish'd him carefully to avoid a single Combat. Which Letter, the King when he had heard it read, made no Account of, not imagining, considering the Quality he was of, that he should ever fight a Duel. That Letter was from that time lock'd up by Monsieur de l'Aubespine, who after the King's Death shew'd it to several Lords, as is reported. Besides it is added (I will not assert it for a truth) that the Queen remembring that Letter, and the time that had been Prognosticated, intreated him several times, that since the two preceding Days were past to his Honour and Contentment, he would for that third Day be absent from the Tournament to avoid all inconvenience, and substitute some other Lord in his room. To which however he would not condescend. And as on the very Day he was Wounded, the Queen had sent a Gentleman on purpose to intreat him in her Name to Acquiesce with what he had done, he made Answer, that he would Tilt but once more, in which as ill Fortune would have it he was Wounded. Observe well that Pasquier tells this Story only upon an uncertain hear-say, of the truth whereof he was not himself perswaded. But take more particular notice, that it is not said, that Cardan brought to light that pretended Horoscope after the King's Death. And yet he was Vain enough and sufficiently Bigotted to Astrology, to have pretended to the Honour of so surprising a discovery. Nothing could have raised the Glory of his Art so much as that: he might have called to Witness the Constable Montmorenci, Catherine de Medicis, Diane de Poitiers, and other Persons of the highest Rank. What came it that he neglected the interests of his Glory and those of his (g) Pocket, in favour of a Person [illegible]? We have seen in the foregoing Remark, what Gauric promised Henry II. in the Year 1550. Let us see what he Predicted for him four Years before. Elysiissimus Galliarum Rex, this is what he put at the bottom of the Scheme of the King's Nativity in the Venice Edition, 1552. printed by Curtius Troianus Navo, Henricus Christianissimus, erit Regnum gerendum Imperator, ante supremos etiam ad senium annos pervenet, felicissimusque [illegible] uti colligitur ex Sole Veneri & Lunæ bene aspectis, & potissimum, Sole in suo termino partiliter fortunato. Incivitatibus vitæ subjectis maximum fortunæ minuum, si forte superveniat sua ætatis annus 64. ad annos [illegible] Mensis 10. dies 12. fatalis [illegible] ei tramite productus (h).

(S) Things very remarkable concerning the Mothers of the two Natural Children.] Read what Pope of Brantome (i) "Henry II. who was of amorous Complexion, when he went to visit the Ladies, did it in the most secret and silent manner possible to prevent any Suspicion of their Dishonour; and if any of them were discovered, it was not by his Fault or Consent, for rather than Ladies, as I have heard by one Madam [illegible] mis, a Seat of a good Family, who being with Child by the King, did not name the matter, but spoke boldly in her French Scotch, and said, I have Company all that I could, so that I am with Child by the King, which I take to be a great Honour and Happiness; there is something sweeter and more delicate in the Blood Royal, than in any other, I am so much the better for it, without reckoning the good Presents that [illegible] had by him, was the Grand Prior of [illegible] who was lately killed at [illegible] very great Lord; for he was very honourable, brave, and valiant Lord. Which Lady Piles, the other Mistress, is a Curiosity for other Reasons. "The Dauphin, afterwards King Henry II. fell in Love with a young Lady (l) of Guyenne, [illegible] mont, in the Journey that he made there with the Constable of Montmorenci, his Servants set to House a Fire in the Night; and the being [illegible] Access to all People, they ran there in great Numbers, crying, Sauve la Dame, and being [illegible] they carried her to the Dauphin (m). He had a Daughter by her, called Diana, who had for her first Husband, Horatius Farnese, Duke of Castro, [illegible] for her Second, Francis Duke of Montmorency, Son to the Constable. The Second Marriage was (n) the 5th. of May 1557, and the 18th. of the Death of her Husband, the 17th. of March [illegible]. The only Son they had, died before he [illegible] Widow lived to the 3d. of January 1619, being above Eighty Years of Age. She married [illegible] lation between Henry III. and Henry IV. and had an affectionate Friendship for Charles de Valois her Nephew, natural Son to King Charles IX. She saved his Life, when Henry IV. would have involved him in the Cause of the Duke of Alençon. She rejoiced in the Calm of the Duke of Anjou. She rejoiced, that it was his Interest to render Sacred and inviolable the Heads of the natural Sons of Kings, and carefully to avoid the giving a fatal Example against them. sity he had to be inform'd (T) he found such Proofs as settled the Disturbance of his Mind about it. This Young Husband came to be Dauphin, the 10th. of April, 1536, by the Death of his Elder Brother. We * have seen elsewhere, that his Wife was barren several Years, and afterwards brought him many Children. (T) The Curiosity he had to be inform'd.] I have read this only in Mr. Varillas, "The Interviews of "his Holiness, saith he, and of his (a) Majesty was at "Marseilles, and the Nuptials of the Duke of Or- "leans, and Catherine were there celebrated with "great Magnificence. As the Bridegroom was but "Sixteen Years old, and the Bride but 13, the King "who was unwilling to hazard his Son's Health, "would have had the Consummation of the Mar- "riage defer'd for Two or Three Years. But this "did not relish with the Pope; who feared, that if "he should happen to die before his Niece's Marri- "age was accomplished, she would be sent back to "Italy. And indeed, he would not be content, "says Paul Jovius, till he had seen certain Proofs of "the Consummation of the Marriage. If Paul Jo- "vius has made mention of such a Circumstance, 'tis not in the place of his History, where he speaks of that Interview of the Pope and Francis I. which yet was a most proper Place, and the most natural Occa- sion to touch upon that Particular, considering espe- cially, that the Author forgot not to remark, how extraordinry young the Duke of Orleans was, and to make many other Observations; and even to say, that the Marriage was consummated the first Night. (b) Augebant suspicionem maturata nuptia, quæ im- pares regio sanguini viderentur. Siquidem nobi- lissimus adolescens Henricus, quanquam ætate te- nerior, Catharinam celebratis insigni ceremonia nuptiis, ex virgine mulierem prima nocte reddiderat.

I confess then, that Mr. Varillas may be suspected to have cited Paul Jovius wrong. What he says of the Bridegrom's being 16 Years old, and the Bride 13, is not exact. For 'tis certain, that Henry II. was born (c) the 31st. of March, 1519, and that he married Catherine de Medicis, the 28th. of Octo- ber 1533. Father Anselm, who dates his Birth the 31st. of March 1518, adds, that it was before Easter, and consequently, that that Year was 1519, New Stile. He says also, that Catherine was born the 13th. of April, 1519. Gauric sets down the same Day and Year in that Lady's Horoscope. There was therefore but 14 Days Difference betwixt their Ages. Spondanus (d) is no less mistaken than Varillas, since he says, that Catherine was but 13 Years, and that Henry was Fifteen Years and Seven Months.

(V) Which aided them more effectually to maintain themselves.] See what I have said hereupon in the Remark (D), and join to it this Passage of Stephen Pasquier, (e) "We saw the Emperor Charles V. "make War upon his German Subjects for embracing "Heresie——His Affairs went on successful- "ly, which made them have Recourse to the beg- "ging of our Assistance. Could there be any thing "more plausible in point of Affairs of State, such "as a Courtier represents them, than to take their "Cause in Hand, not to suffer a great Prince to ag- "grandize himself at our very Gates, by the ruin "of all the Princes of Germany? But was there "any thing more unjust than to assist a Subject a- "gainst his Lawful Sovereign? And moreover to "take the part of a Heretick, against a Catholick "Emperor, who fought only for the Honour of "God, and the good of his Church? Our King was "a Catholick Prince, as also the Lords who had the "greatest Share in his Favour; notwithstanding "which we take upon us the Protection of the Ger- "man Hereticks; and the King in full Parliament "made himself proclaimed with a magnificent Ti- "tle Protector of the German Liberty, that is to "say, of the German Heresie; and as such caused "Money to be coined with that Inscription. "Under that specious Title he undertook to march "with a Potent Army; Wherein things succeeded "in such a manner, that upon the meer Fame of "our Enterprize, being upon the point of passing "the Rhine, the Emperor was forced to make things "up with his Subjects, and to grant them many "Priviledges against the Honour of God and his "Conscience, which he would not otherwise have "tolerated. As for my part, I am willing to believe, "that God had resolv'd to chastise us with the same "Rods, wherewith we afflicted the Emperor, per- "mitting, after Henry's Decease, his Minor "Children to be battled by their Subjects for the "Maintenance of an Opinion more violent than that "of Luther, and that they should be aided by the "German Princes against us. And when God was "pleased to exercise his Vengeance upon us, it "was past all humane Power to redress our selves, "whence all the Remedies that we thought proper "to be apply'd, turned to our Destruction. Pas- quier makes another Remark, which I think not good. "At our return, says he, (f) from that fine "German Expedition, Calvin began to solicite one "and another by Letters, who yielded easily to be "over-reacht, thinking, as one may believe, that "since the King and his Council had taken the Pro- "tection of the Lutherans, they were in their "Hearts of the same Religion. Thus by little and "little a Seminary of a new Religion spread through "France, which [illegible] was entertain'd by Prin- "ces and great Lords. The Author here commits two Faults, he supposes, that Calvin did not begin to sollicite the French by Letters, till towards the end of the Year, 1552, which is false; for he had never ceased to do it since the Year 1536, and be- sides, it is not true, that the French could believe, that the King and his Council were Lutherans in their Hearts. The contrary could not be doubted, when he was seen to persecute with Fire and Sword, all that were of the new Religion in his Kingdom. The Protection that he granted, and the good Offi- ces he did the Protestants of Germany, were insig- nificant to elude that proof of his Aversion to their Sect. It was only seen by that, that he sacrificed the Interests of his Religion to the Political Interests of his State. 'Tis the common Course of Sove- reigns: Though they take sometimes another, and sacrifice to the Spirit of Persecution, not only the Conquests they might make, but even those they have already made, and the most solid Advantages of their Kingdom. Henry II. was an Instance of this, when he accepted the Peace of Chateau.

(X) Is more prejudicial to his Kingdom, &c.] A French Civilian has maintain'd (g) "that they are in a "great Error, who go on praising and adoring the "Bounty of a gentle, gracious, courteous, and sim- "ple Prince; for that Simplicity without Prudence, "is most dangerous and pernicious in a King, and "much more to be feared than the Cruelty of a se- "vere, morose, rough, covetous, and inaccessible "Prince. And it seems, that our Fore-fathers have "not us'd this Proverb without cause, An (h) ill "Man makes a good King: which may seem strange "to delicate Ears, and that are not accustomed "to weigh the Reasons on both sides. By "the Indulgence and Foolish Simplicity of too "good-natured a Prince, it comes to pass the Flatte- "rers and Parasites, and the worst of Men, get Of- "fices, Employments, Benefices, and Pensions, "draining the Exchequer of the Kingdom; by "which means the poor People are devoured to the "very Bone, and cruelly enslaved by the Great: So "that for one Tyrant you have Ten Thousand, &c. Being minded to confirm afterwards his Position by Examples, he speaks thus (i) We have seen this Kingdom Great, Rich, and Flourishing in Arms and Laws towards the latter end of King Francis I. when he became morose and inaccessible, and no Body durst approach him to ask any thing of him; then Places, Offices a King that is in as great an excess the other way. Henry II's Defect, was the ill Management of his Revenues, by which Means he perverted the Administration of them, and ran prodigiously in Debt. Some have reckon'd, amongst the Disorders of his Reign, the Mischief * that the Poets caused. Polygamy, under the preceding Reigns, was not an Hanging Matter: Henry II. first made it a Capital Crime (Z.) You'll find in other Places of this Dictionary, what Laws he made against Clandestine † Marriages, and against ‡ Mothers that destroy their New-born Children.

HENRY III. King of France, Son of Henry II. and Catherine de Medicis, got so much Renown before he was King, even before he was Twenty Years old, that the Poles thought him worthy of their Crown; but they had quickly Reason to repent of that Election. The manner of his flying from Cracow, is one of the most scandalous Actions in the World. The Reason of that Flight, was his going to inherit the Crown of France after Charles IX. He actually reign'd after him, and in such a manner, that the Poles

Offices and Benefices were only given to Men of Merit and Honour; and Pensions were so retrench't, that there was found in his Treasury, when he died, a Million of Gold, and Seven Hundred Thousand Crowns, and the March Quarter to receive, whilst there was nothing due, except a little to the Grisons, and to the Bank of Lions, which they did not pay, that they might keep them to their Duty: There was a settled Peace with all the Princes of the Earth; the Frontiers were extended even to the Gates of Milan; the Kingdom was full of great Commanders, and the learnedest Men in the World. It was afterwards seen in the Twelve Years that Henry II. reigned, (whose Bounty was so great, as not to be parallell'd by any Prince of his Age) that the State was almost quite changed; for as he was gentle, gracious, and good-humour'd, he could refuse no Body any thing: Thus the Treasures of his Father in a little time being exhausted, Places of Trust were more than ever expos'd to Sale, and Offices given to the Magistrates that offered most for them, and consequently to the most unworthy: the Imposts were greater than ever they were before; and yet when he died, his Exchequer was found charg'd with 42 Millions: after having lost Piedmont, Savoy, Corsica, and the Frontiers of the Low-Countries. And yet these Losses were but inconsiderable in respect of his Reputation and Honour. If the Gentleness of this great King had been accompanied with Severity; if his Goodness had been mix'd with Rigour; his Facility with Austerity, he had not so easily parted with every thing that was ask'd him. The Opinion of this Learned Man seems a Paradox at first Sight, but if it be examin'd nearly, it will be found to be well-grounded.

(X) He perverted the Administration of them, and ran in Debt prodigiously.] (a) "There was an Ordinance of Francis I. confirm'd by his Successor, "importing, that there should be four Keys to the "Exchequer-Chest, whereof the King should have "one, and the others should be in the Hands of "Commissioners appointed by him; and the Disbursements of the Money should be made by Order "of the King, in Presence of the Treasurer and of "the Comptroller of the Exchequer. But King Henry II, by an Edict, discharged the Commissioners and "Officers of the Exchequer, that no Body for the "time to come might call them to an Account: Nay, "one of these Commissioners had purely as a "Gift, at one time, an Hundred Thousand Crowns, "given him, if the Report be true: which was "then a great deal. Bodin makes this Observation; and a little after adds, "that Francis I. (b) did not "make so many Largesses during a Reign of Thirty "Two Years, as his Successor did in two. (c) "Francis I. had scarce closed his Eyes, but the Tillage, which was then a prodigious Sum, was "given to a single Person. See how this is expressed in the Latin Translation: Nondum justa (d) Parenti fecerat (Henricus Secundus) cum Hirudo quædam Palatina Pecuniæ vim infinitam, quam officiarii, decepta confirmatione, regibus initiatis fisco dependere, solent, uno absorbuit & eodem hausit. This Prince's Prodigality was the cause doubtless of his imposing new Burdens on his Subjects, forgetting the Promises he had made, when he imposed them. Consider well these Words of Bodin (e), "When the "Taillon was laid on the Subjects in the Year "1549, the King promis'd not to imploy or appropriate it to any other Use besides the paying the "Gendarmery, without confounding this Revenue "with any other: as it was also said, when the "Soldiers Pay was impos'd, for Fifty Thousand Foot "in Francis I's Time, which was only to be "rais'd in Wall'd Towns, and their Suburbs, "which felt nothing of the Oppression of the "Soldiery; and yet since it has been extended "equally to Cities, Boroughs, and Villages, "in the Year 1555, by which the poor Countrymen are doubly oppress'd; for they pay "and are pillaged on all Sides. The ill Management of the same King, produced another Disorder, which was the borrowing great Sums at a prodigious Interest (f): "When King Henry had occa-"sion for Money, he borrowed at Ten, or Twelve, or "Sixteen per Cent; as he did in the Year 1554. "of the Caponis, the Albicis, and their Partners "in Germany; and the Interest was paid at the "Four Fairs, or became part of the Principal. The "Emperor did the like on his part; but 'tis true, he "gave but Ten or Twelve per Cent, at most; and the "same Year the King of England borrowed from the "German Merchants an Hundred Thousand Crowns, "at 12 per Cent. And whereas Henry thought, by "giving greater Interest than the Emperor, and the "King of England, to command a greater Supply, he "began to sink his Credit by it; for the wisest Ma-"nagers concluded, that at long run he could neither "pay Principal nor Interest; for as much as 16 per "Cent, would come to 18, by means of the Interest, which "he could not pay. Note, that he was not the Inventer of this Practice; it began in his Father's time "(g). This was also a Project brought into France in "the Year M.D.XLIII. by Cardinal de Tournon, when "he was in favour with Francis I. whom he gave "to understand by the Suggestion of some Italians, "that there was no way of having ready Money "from all Parts, and making a Fund for the time to "come, to frustrate the Enemies of France, but by "establishing a Bank at Lyons, and taking in "Money from all Hands, paying 8 per Cent: But "Indeed the Cardinal was willing to advance an "Hundred Thousand Crowns, which he had in his "Coffers, and receive as much Interest as he could "for it. The Letters-Patent having past the "Seals, and the Bank being open'd, as was said, the "French, Germans, and Italians, strove who shou'd "put into it: So that Francis I. when he died, "was indebted to the Bank Five Hundred Thousand "Crowns, which he had by him, and four times as "much; and there was a setled Peace with all the World? Bodin (b) condemns that Invention suggested to Francis I. He thinks that it ruins the Foundation of the Finances, and it proved the Origin of a Thousand Mischiefs. Let us cite him once more. And (i) as to the Treasury, says he, it was so ill managed, that in less than 12 Years that Henry II. reigned, he (k) owed more Interest, than all his Predecessors, 40 Years before, had rais'd for all their Expences.

Poles had no reaſon to regret the Loſs of him. It may be ſaid of him, as it was (A) of Galba, that he would have been thought worthy of a Crown, if he had never wore one. His Life was ſo divided betwixt Debauch'eries and Devotions, that ſcarce an odder Mixture was ever ſeen. He gave himſelf into the Hands of his Minions, with ſo little reſerve, that all France was offended with it; more-eſpecially, becauſe the exceſſive Expences he was at for them (B) turn'd to the Charge of the poor People. As for Margaret, her Betrothing was " made at the Louvre, in the Queen's Chamber, and " the Nuptials were celebrated Eight Days after, in " the Church of St. Germain de l'Auxerrois. It " would be ſuperfluous to deſcribe the Maſquerades, " Balls, Tournaments, Feaſts and Muſick, and all " the other Pomps which Luxury invented, for the " Wedding. In a word, it laſted near ſix Weeks; " and Paris, the Theatre of Wonders, had never ſeen " any thing like it. The King, dreſs'd in the ſame " manner as his Favourite, led the Bride to Church ——after the Marriage he appointed Seventeen " Entertainments, which were made in order by then " Princes and Lords related to the Lady: The leaſt " of them came to more than a Hundred Thouſand " Livres: In all which, the Gueſts were dreſs'd in " ſo rich and precious Habits, that Gold and Sil- " ver Cloth could make no Figure there. There were " Suits which coſt Ten Thouſand Crowns. In fine, " the Expence was ſo prodigious, that the King " for his part only, ſpent no leſs than four " Millions of Livres; beſides, he promiſed to " pay the Husband for his Wive's Fortune, Four " Hundred Thouſand Crowns in two Years time; " and when it was told him, that theſe exceſſive " Profuſions would ruin him, he anſwered, that " after he had married his Two Children, he would " be frugal. He meant Joyeuſe and Epernon (d). The Swiſs Embaſſadors coming to Paris to demand the Money that was due to them, and the Treaſurers anſwering, that the King had none, and they muſt have Patience, they reply'd according to the uſual Liberty of thei Nation, that it was not credible, that a Prince, ſo wiſe and ſo prudent, ſhould ſpend 1200000 Crowns for his Pleaſure at the Marriage of a Gentleman, and not have much more in his Coffers for the publick Occaſions of his Kingdom.

See in the ſame Hiſtorian (e) the extravagant Affection this Prince expreſs'd for Maugiron and Quelus, when they had fought a Duel (f).

(C) He incurr'd the Hatred of the Ladies, which was very prejudicial to him.] (g) ' The Ladies ' whom the Minions told all, diſcovered to the Duke ' of Guiſe, all the Secrets of the Cabinet, to re- ' venge themſelves of the King, whom they hated ' for certain Reaſons, not to be mention'd. Theſe are Mr. Maimbourg's Words, which ſhew plainly how much the Ladies prejudiced the King; but the Reaſons of their Hatred are intelligibly enough explain'd by many Hiſtorians. See in the Margin (h), the Words of Mezeray. The Reflection related by the Author of the News from the Republick of Learning, is a meer Cavil. Some Criticks, ſays he (i), have found fault with Maimbourg for ſaying, That the Ladies, whom the Minions told all, &c. They ſay, theſe Words are highly affronting to the fair Sex, becauſe they inſinuate, that Women conceive an Averſion for Men, who let them alone. Now, ſay they, if they are modeſt, what is it to them, if they are neglected? They ought ſure to be very indifferent. If they are not ſo, 'tis a manifeſt ſign they don't deſire to be modeſt. But I think my ſelf obliged to take Mr. Maimbourg's part, againſt theſe unjuſt Judges: I ſay then, that (k) he ſpeaks only of the Ladies that were in the Intrigues of the Duke of Guiſe; and 'tis not to be doubted, but that Women of that Character do violently hate, having ſuch Reaſons for it as are here to be underſtood. Conclude as much as you pleaſe, that if they were virtuous, it would be indifferent to them. Say, if you will, that this Concluſion is diſobliging. Mr. Maimbourg has taken ſome Precautions, in his Preface, againſt ſuch ſort of Subtilties; he declares, that he ſeeks for Truth, and not for what may pleaſe, and that if any one finds fault with it, they muſt blame the Law-makers of the Hiſtorians, who command them to tell things as they are, and not as they ought to be.

There is too much ſubtilty in that Reflection; 'tis natural for us to be pleaſed, that our Talents ſhould not fall into Contempt. This, I ſay, is natural, tho' we deſire not to make an ill Uſe of thoſe Qualities. The Raillery is carried too far in the Voyage of Mrs. de la Chapelle and Baebaumont, upon the Subject of the Anger that is aſcribed to the Ladies of Montpelier, againſt the unfortunate Daſſouci.

He had reason to repent of that Concession; for it encouraged the Son of that Duke to form some Enterprises against France (E△). There scarce ever was a Prince born under a more capricious Planet than that of Henry III. His Whimsical Fortune made him experience a Fate, not unlike that of those Children, who are first educated by a tender Mother, and afterwards by a cruel Step-Mother. The Glory of his Youth was very shining, and purchased him the Kingdom of Poland with eminent Honour and Renown, but that dazling Light was quickly eclipsed: He abandoned that Crown a little after, more ignominiously than he gain'd it gloriously at his Election; for what could be seen more strange and scandalous, than a Monarch running away in the Darkness of the Night, and with that Celerity from his own Dominions, as if he had been a Criminal, that perceiv'd a Provost-Marshal at his Heels? Thus it was Henry III. abandoned Poland *. If that Evasion might be excused, upon the Interest he had to make haste to succeed to an Inheritance much better than the Scepter he wore; we cannot however chuse but say, that he must be born under a very unfortunate Constellation, and Diis iratis, since he found himself reduced to such Extremities, as not to be able to succeed his Brother, but upon those Terms. This would always be a sign, that his Fortune mischievously led him through perplex'd and entangled Ways. The World look'd for him in himself, after his Return to France, but could not find him. ' The reason was, that he had offended this Widow, ' by holding some Discourse, which discovered some ' secret Faults of hers; a more unpardonable Af- ' front to the fair Sex, than that which is offered to ' their Honour. That Affront was deeply rooted in that Dutchess's Heart, if we judge of it by the Movements she made to destroy Henry III. ' She ' brought a good (n) part of the Materials from ' the Invention of her genteel Wit, and the Labour ' of her Body to build the aforesaid League; so that ' after it had been well-formed, playing at Cards ' one Day at Primero (for she loved Gaming) one say- ' ing to her, that she should shuffle the Cards well, she ' answered before a great deal of Company, I have ' shuffled them so well, that it's impossible to shuffle, ' or unshuffle them better. This had been well, if ' her Relations had not died, the Loss of whom, ' without being dejected at it, she undertook to re- ' venge. As soon as she heard the News in Paris, ' without shutting her self up in her Chamber to ' lament and mourn for them, according to the Fa- ' shion of other Women, she departed from her Palace, ' with her Brother's Children in her Hands, and ' leading them through the City, she made her La- ' mentation before the People, animating them with ' Tears and Cries, with her pitiful and moving Dis- ' course, which she made to all, to take up Arms, ' to make a violent Insurrection, and to carry their ' Insolences to the Palace, and Picture of the King, ' as hath been seen, and I hope to shew in his Life, ' to renounce all Allegiance, and on the contrary, to ' enter into an Oath of Association of Rebellion, ' which was quickly followed by his Murther; from ' which we may know who are the Men and Wo- ' men who advised it, and are guilty of it. She prevailed most with James Clement to kill the King. She spared nothing, nor omitted, as is said, what they call the last Favour (o).

(E) In September, 1574.] The King arrived the 5th. of September, 1574, at the Bridge of Beauvoisin, and not on the 21st. of September, 1575, as is said by Two or Three Historians (a), whom John Aymes de Chavigny censures, in the 224th. Page of the first Face of his French Janus. Thus he calls his Explication of Nostradamus.

(E△) To form Enterprizes against France.] The Author of the first (b) Savoisienne reports (c), That when Henry III. returning from Poland pass'd by Savoy, he was ask'd as a recompence for a Collation, the Towns of Pignerol and Savillan, and that this Prince, whose only fault was too much good Nature, granted it; that the Duke of Savoy, Son of him who received this noble Present, (d) took Advantage of the Confusions of France in 1588. for seeing King Henry III. out of his Capital City, he Invaded the Marquisate of Saluces; after having sent an Embassadour to the King, with promise to Restore all into his Hands, he Degraded, all at one Stroke, the Officers of his Majesty, and Establish'd thereby his Ducal Authority——and at the same Instant to signify in all Places the Trophies of his Victory, he caused a Stately Piece of Money to be Coined, impress with a Centaur trampling under Foot a Crown reverst, with this device, Opportunè. Which was to shew (e) he knew how to take his Opportunity. We see in the second Savoisienne, that after the Death of Henry III. he made himself Master of many Places in Provence; which obliged Henry IV. to seize Savoy, to bring him to Reason. Observe that to answer him in Point of Coin (f), the King caused another to be made, wherein was seen a Hercules Armed after the Antick way, Trampling a Centaur under Foot, over whom he Exalted his Club with his right Hand, and with his left a Crown, which he seems to have taken up; and the Device, which as a Soul was to animate this Body, was the Word, Oportunitas; to shew that he knew better, how to Seize an Opportunity, and more honourably than the other; since he had employ'd Force of Arms instead of Surprizes which the other had Practised with great Ingratitude †. This repair'd the Mischief, which the Cession of Pignerol had occasioned; but the fault of Henry III. was never the more excusable.

The Author of a Piece that reflects very much on the present (g) Duke of Savoy, has mentioned that Affair, but not without some Errors. Henry III. says he (h), being engaged in a War against a Potent League, Charles Emanuel (i), Grandfather to his Royal Highness, did much the same as he has done at present. He conceived great hopes, for his Fortune, if he took that Opportunity of Declaring against France, and in the Year 1588. he actually joyned his Arms with those of Henry the Third's Enemies, and having formed a powerful Party, whereof he declar'd himself the Head, he entered into Provence, and by Stratagem seiz'd on the Towns of Marseilles, and Arles, and grew so Haughty by his Conquests, as to Coin Money to serve as an everlasting Monument of his Victories. He caused himself to be represented under the Emblem of a Centaur, &c. The Author adds, that Henry IV. carrying the War into Italy in the Year 1600. made himself Master of almost all Savoy and Piedmont, and that he caused a Medal to be Coined in his turn &c. This Narration is not Exact. The Conjunction of the Forces of Savoy, with the Enemies of Henry III. was not made in the Year 1588. nor was it any more that Year, but the Year 1590, that he enter'd into Provence. He did not strike the Medal of the Centaur, when he became Master of Marseilles, but after the Invasion of the Marquisate of Saluces. Henry IV. did not carry the War into Italy in the Year 1600, and he Conquered nothing in Piedmont. The Author perhaps is more judicious in Political Reflections than in Narrations of Things. Henry IV. says he (k), after the Conquest of Savoy and Piedmont, suffered himself to be wrought upon by the Entreaties of Pope Clement VIII. who sought to Reconcile the poor Duke to the King's Favour; tho' the Opinion, of all the Politicians of that time was, that Henry IV. ought to keep Savoy and Piedmont to Chastise the Rashness of that imprudent Prince, and thereby to have a free Passage to enter Italy whenever he thought fit. This was the Counsel of Cardinal d'Ossat, one of the greatest

Perſon of Henry III. There was nothing to be ſeen in him (F) beſides the Humour of a Man-hater. See here ſome other Caprices of this Monarch's Fortune. He had a Brother who was a heavy Burthen upon his Shoulders, which his Death delivered him from; he was wonderfully joy'd at that Deliverance, which in it ſelf ought to be reckon'd a Misfortune; for what can be more odd, than to be reduced to rejoice at the Death of an only Brother? However, it would be a ſort of Advantage, if a long benefit could be reap'd from it. This Henry III. did not experience; for he quickly found, that the Duke of Alençon's Death (G) whatever Advantage it brought with it, was more prejudicial than uſeful to him, ſince it furniſhed a Pretext for Caballing, and fomented that dangerous Faction, which ſo terribly mortified the King, and afterwards overwhelmed him. The Joy he had to be rid of the Duke of Guiſe, was of the ſame Nature. It laſted but a little while; he immediately found, that that great Blow to the Party, which he thought abſolutely neceſſary to his own Repoſe and Safety, plung'd him into (H) new Troubles, and mortal Diſcontents. It muſt be confeſs'd, that he

What would Cardinal d'Oſſat have ſaid of the Imprudence of Henry III. diveſting himſelf of Pignerol, ſince he blamed Henry IV. for quitting Savoy at a time that he was a hundred times more capable of reſiſting his Neighbours, than ever was his Predeceſſor? France had been very unhappy, if ſhe had wanted Pignerol when the Duke of Savoy entered into the Alliance with the Houſe of Auſtria, England, and Holland in 1690. She was forced to part with it ſix Years after, which is not a little Misfortune.

(G) The Duke of Alenſon's Death.] I deſire not only to ſay nothing without Proof, but every where, as much as I can, to bring the Teſtimony of Contemporary Writers; and for that Reaſon, I ſhall here agreeably inſert the Words of Stephen Paſquier. (a) "He (b) "had ſtill a Thorn in his Foot, which in the midſt "of Peace (c) ſeemed to ſtop the Courſe of his "Satisfaction: For though in Appearance he was "in no ill Underſtanding with his Brother the "Duke, yet he was a ſecond King, who had "his Court and his Favourites apart, ſometimes "in the City of Tours, ſometimes in others Towns of "his Appennage; who had his Opinions ſo remote "from thoſe of the King, that he never would ſuffer "either himſelf, or any of his Friends, to be obliged "with the Order of the Holy Ghoſt; beſides the "greatneſs of his Appennage, which took up one "good part of France. He had his Chamber of Accounts "in Tours, his Exchequer at Alenſon, which judged Sovereignly of the Cauſes of the Dutchy, both "Civil and Criminal. Beſides, this Prince pre-"ferr'd to the Biſhopricks and Abbies of his Appen-"nage, whom he pleaſed to be nominated to the "Pope, by the King, according to the Concordate: All "theſe Grandeurs turning in ſome meaſure with thoſe "of the King, might cauſe Jealouſies in his Soul, but "that he prudently diſſembled them. Now it hap-"pened, that in the Year 1583, the Duke died, and "by his Death his Appennage was united to the "Crown. They who governed the King, made "Bonfires in their Hearts; and he himſelf ſufficiently expreſs'd, how much he thought his Grandeur was encreaſt, when he writ with his own "Hand, the Regulations of it, ordering, that the "Chancellor, ſitting in Counſel, ſhould be cloathed, "with a Gown, and long Robe of Crimſon-Velvet, "and the Counſellors of State with Purple Satin, "and that his Ushers and Valets de Chambre ſhou'd "have Velvet-Doublets, and upon them a thick "Chain of Gold hanging from the Neck. Then "..... a long Train "of Lords that were to walk before him, when "he went to Church. Indeed, that Death at firſt "Sight promiſed him a long Repoſe, and yet it "was the Conſummation of his and France's "Miſery; for if the Duke had lived, all Pretences "had been cut off from the Undertakers of the "League——Suddenly after his Death, in the "Year 1584, the Princes of the League did not doubt "to hatch the Diſcontents they had brooded, cover-"ed with the Cloak of the Catholick, Apoſtolick, "Roman Religion. Note, that Love-Intrigues ſow-ed the Seeds of Diſcord betwixt the Brothers (d). They met in loving the ſame Beauties: one of their Hearts would diſlodge the other, and not bearing Partners in Love, any more than in Authority, they changed the affection of Brothers into Hatred and implacable Anger. I leave you to conſider whether that Two-fold Jealouſy one of Love, the other of Ambition, betwixt two Brothers, the one a King, and the other a preſumptive Heir of the Crown, who had their Intellects and Morals ill enough turn'd, was not capable of giving them a prodigious Antipathy for one another (†).

(H) Plung'd him into new Troubles and mortal Diſcontents.] Paſquier ſhall ſtill be my Commentator. As ſoon as the Duke of Guiſe was Dead, ſays he (f), never was King ſo ſatisfied as ours, ſpeaking out, and clearly to every Body, that he had no longer a Companion, nor conſequently a Maſter; and the next Day the Death of the Cardinal was the accompliſhment of his Wiſhes. With that eaſe and ſatisfaction of Mind, he carried himſelf ſome Days, diſpatching Letters to all parts, to manifeſt the motives of that Accident, but he reap'd little profit by them. Some eight or ten Days after receiving no News from Paris, he began to revolve things in his Mind, and to abate ſomething of that exceſſive Joy. And afterwards hearing of that general Revolt he earneſtly wiſh'd that that part was to begin again.——The King by degrees began to be diſpleaſed with every thing, even with himſelf. I can Write and Deſcribe it to you as one that has been a Spectatour. Diffidence more than ever took Poſſeſſion of his Heart, as you ſhall preſently underſtand. Paſquier at the end of theſe Words gives four or five Examples that clearly Expreſs the unſpeakeable Confuſion which this Prince was under. He had a mind to convey to the Caſtle of Amboiſe the People he had ordered to be Arreſted after the Death of Mrs. de Guiſe, (g) and he found no Body that he durſt truſt them with but himſelf. I will tell you Frankly, adds Paſquier, that the greateſt part of us, that were at Blois, *almoſt burſt with Indignation, to ſee the Affairs of the King in ſo bad a Poſture, as that he was forc'd to be Marſhal to his own Priſoners. he surpass'd himself (I) in the Execution of the Project of the Duke of Guise's Death. He express'd a great deal of Prudence and Resolution in that Action, at least much more than in former Occasions, wherein he behaved himself in such a manner, as made him despicable (K) to the Pope. One of the greatest Oddnesses of his Destiny was, that he equally drew on himself the Enmity of the Papists, and Huguenots. These two Parties, that are opposite in all things both in Temporals and Spirituals, were unanimous in their Aversion for this Prince. He was a Centre of Unity for those People, that in every thing else found a Subject of Division. Humanely speaking, the Huguenots had just Reasons to hate him, for he persecuted them without Measure; and he was look'd upon as one of the great promoters of the Paris Massacre, † and he Gloried in it. This joined with his Zeal for the most Monastick Devotions, ought to have purchased him the Friendship of the Ecclesiasticks, and of the most vehement Bigots of the Roman Faith, and yet he was the Object of their Hatred more than can be imagined. This is one Instance of the whimsicalness of his Fate; and here is another still. Whatever he had most Ardently Loved, at last * turned to his Ruin. What we have already said concerning the disorders, which were bred by Henry the Second's Prodigality, agrees better still with the Reign of Henry III, an infinitely more squandering Prince than his Father. So that they saw under his Reign more Imposts, more Pecuniary Edicts, and more waste of the Treasury than was ever before known in the Kingdom. The Relief had still been vastly greater, if the King had obtained leave to Alienate the Crown Lands. But the States General (L) would not consent to it. Let us observe that Henry III. who in regard to his Favourites, was not jealous of his Authority, nor

And I assuredly say that if the Sieur de* Mayenne had fallen upon us, the fear was so great and general, that he would have met no Resistance, and being once Master of Blois, all the River Loire had been ours, consequently all the Towns, staggered, and the King would have been wonderfully at a loss to find a Place of Refuge. God was pleased to bestow a fairer Fortune. The Author does not name (b), who first possess'd the King with the Resolution of that Murther, which proved so unfortunate, but spoke favour with him. Some Historians tell (c) how this Gentleman not thinking himself safe at Court, asked the King for a place to Retreat in, in order to secure himself from the resentments of the League. This was to make the King sensible, to what a wretched Condition his Affairs were reduced to be brought; the answer that is pretended he made to Longnac, is not unworthy of a great Monarch. I mention it in another place (b).

(I) In the Execution of the project of the Duke of Guise's Death.] His Heart had failed him on the Day of the Barricadoes, he had quitted his Post to his Rival, he had made his escape from Paris, and left the Duke of Guise all the Glory of the Triumph. His Heart returned to him again at Blois, and there he humbled his haughty Enemy. We may apply the Words of the Æneid to him (l): Quondam etiam victis redit in præcordia virtus, Victoresque cedunt. And then was verified a Sentence of Homer, I mean the Remonstrance that Calchas made to Achilles, that a King who is in a Rage against his Inferiour, has the better of him sooner or later.

I have read in many Authors, the Relation of that Exploit of Henry III, but I have not seen any, where the Particulars are better connected and prosecuted, than in that which Mr. Marcel hath inserted in the Fourth Tome (n) of his History of France. There one may see all the Exactness of the Measures that were taken to facilitate that great Blow: The King discovered a great Vigilance and Resolution, and (o) a Soul so much Master of it self, as carefully to observe the nicest Things, that might do hurt. Consider well the Encouragement he gave to the Secretary of State, who was to make known to the Duke of Guise, that the King would speak with him (p). "Hereupon His Majesty hearing the Duke of Guise "was in the Council, told Monsieur Revol, Secretary "of State: Revol, go and tell Monsieur de Guise, he is "must come and speak with me in my Cabinet. The "Secretary Revol refusing him Passage, he returned to "the Duke with a frighted Countenance, because a "great Person, but unacquainted. Go tell my Lord "King, Revol, what thou art to [illegible] "be so fain? you'll spoil the Ruby of your [illegible] "rub your Cheeks, Revol: He's not alone, [illegible] "he, only Monsieur de Nantouillet is with him at the "Door, because you Mercenary [illegible] "The King cried him from the Door in Choler, "to let him come in, and so he [illegible] "two. (K) He made himself despicable to the Pope.] See the Critical Answer to Mambourg, [illegible] of Calvinism, you (b) will there find two Exclamations of Scaliger. One, regretting the Calamity he attributed to the Duke of Guise, and the other the Simplicity he ascribed to Henry III. He expressed himself thereupon. Some Authors (q) relate, that considering one Day the Conduct of this Monarch, I know, [illegible] how all that was politic for him to get out of the Conclusion of a Match, and the wrath that is possible to fall into it.

(L) The States-General would not consent to it.] Besides what I have already said of this in the Article (c) of Renau, I shall set down here a Passage of Mr. de Thou (d). "As to the point of Alienation of the Crown-Lands——from [illegible] "Order of the Assembly, answered Bellievre, who "the King had sent there, that the common Laws "and the Fundamental-Laws of the State [illegible] "forbad that Alienation; that the Crown-Lands re"sembled the Jointure of a Wife, which could [illegible] "ther be sold nor divided by her Husband; that "they were still more Sacred than those of the Church, "because they could not be alienated for any Reason "whatsoever, even with Solemnity; that it was a "thing unheard of, that Recourse was ever had to "that means, even in the greatest Necessities of "France, and when it was in greater Danger than it "was at that time: as in the Reign of King John, "for whose Deliverance, so much Money, so many "Towns, and Provinces were to be given: that in a "Word, they are one of the strongest Pillars that "support the Crown, upon which Portions, Dowries, "and Appannages were founded, and therefore that "the King's Demesn ought rather to be strengthened than weakned, and raised higher, rather than be laid "lower; that as for the rest of the Third State to instantly remonstrated the Consequences of that Alie"nation, it was because whatever should be taken from "the Crown-Lands, must be all'd up again at their Ex"pence, and the whole Loss would fall upon it alone, "and not on the other two, which for that Reason did "more easily consent to it. By the Edict that was made in the ' Year 1565, at Moulins, where all the Princes and ' great Lords were conven'd, with abundance of ' Preſidents and Counſellors of Sovereign Courts, ' it was enacted, That all the Alienations made, or ' to be made of the Crown-Lands, ſhould be null, ' except in two Caſes, namely, for Proviſion for the ' younger Children of our Kings, and for Mortgages ' neceſſary to raiſe ſufficient Sums for the Neceſſities ' of the War: and that in theſe two Caſes, Letters-' Patents ſhould be paſt and publiſhed, in the Courts ' of Parliament, it being expreſly forbid them to ' have any regard to ſuch Letters, for any other ' Cauſe or Time whatever, though it were but for a ' ſingle Year.

(M) Henry III. who in regard to his Favourites, aſpired not to Independence, was paſſionately deſirous to augment the Royal Power.] Here are two Points: I prove the firſt, by an Obſervation that was made upon the great Intereſt of the Duke of Epernon, and a Fortune of Gilt-Silver which the City of Rouen (g) preſented him. This Goddeſs ſtrictly embraced him in her Arms (h), and below were theſe Italian Words, E pur non laſciar ti. A Device grounded upon the Equivocation of his Name; to ſhew, that that Grandeur could never have a Downfall, as indeed, the Truth is, that the King having an exceſſive Favour for him, had proteſted to him heretofore, that he would make him ſo great in the midſt of his Friends, that he himſelf ſhould not have the Power to leſſen him, tho' he ſhould never have ſo much a mind to it. This Paſſage we have from the Duke of Epernon, in a Letter that is well endited, which he writ to the King in his Diſgrace. They who ſay, that Kings have no love for any Body, and look upon that as a great Fault, are in a double Error; for moſt Monarchs are ſubject to an exceſs of Friendſhip, which cauſes more Diſorders than could grow from an indifferent and inſenſible Heart. See above, the Compariſon that Bodin has made betwixt the latter Years of Francis I's Reign, and the Reign of Henry II. See alſo the Remark B of this Article. It were perhaps a thing to be deſired, that Kings ſhould be like the Stoicks Wiſe Man, without Love and Hatred. 'Tis at leaſt very certain, that the too kind, affectionate, beneficent and prodigal Temper of our Henry, was the cauſe of infinite Miſchiefs. Let us go on to the ſecond Point.

The States of the Kingdom, in 1576, had reſolved to name Twelve Deputies to aſſiſt at the King's Council, when the Papers ſhould be examined, which were preſented by the Three Orders to his Majeſty. That Reſolution was diſagreeable to Henry III. becauſe he feared theſe Deputies of the States would hinder him from diſpoſing of Affairs to the Advantage of his Power; but when he was made ſenſible, that he would thereby have a greater Authority, he was glad that the States had taken ſuch Meaſures, and he was ſorry that they changed their Mind, and was very angry with Bodin, who had been the cauſe of that ſecond Thought. It will not be amiſs to hear Thuanus ſpeak: (k) Cum Bodinus tertium ordinem, ſi ulterius pergerent, interceſſurum diceret, ſacer ordo, ac mox nobilitas acquievit, ac commune ſuffragiorum votum fuit, ne ulli delegati, qui cum regiis conſiliariis de poſtulatis decernerent, ab Ordinib. eligerentur, contrarium cum initio placuiſſet, eaque re non mediocriter Rex animo commotus eſſet, ut ſupra oſtendimus, poſtea mutaverat, à Lugdunenſi Archiepiſcopo, ut putatur, indultus, qui principi POTENTIÆ SUÆ AMPLIFICANDÆ SUPRA MODUM CUPIDO, ex quo majeſtati regiæ decrementum metuebat, ex eo incrementum acceſſurum artificioſe perſuaſerat. The Archbiſhop of Lions therein made uſe of a ſtratagem of Policy.

(N) Something of his Devotions.] I will make uſe of the Words of du Verdier Vau-prias (a). ' His Devotions were extraordinary, going ſometimes ' at Ten a Clock at Night, to the Carthuſian Monaſtery, to hear Maſs. He inſtituted the Fraternity ' of the White Penitents, of the Annunciation of our ' Lady in the Auguſtins at Paris, and went in Proceſſion like the reſt, with his Sack-cloth, and Whip, ' and Girdle——— He would have many other ' Societies ſet up, as that of St. Jerome, called the Blew ' Penitents, in the College of Marmoutier, that of the ' Crucifix of the Black Penitents, in the College of St. ' Michael, that of the Grey Penitents of St. Francis, at St. Eloy. He brought in the Feuillans, which are certain Reformiſts of the Order of Ciſteaux, from the ' Abbey of Feuillance, near Tholouſe, which he ' lodged in the Suburb of St. Honore, and went often ' thither to perform his Devotions; he had made a ' Lodging near the Capuchins, where on certain ' Days he went in like manner to do his Spiritual Exerciſes. Every one was Porter, and had the other Offices in their Turn, and he was call'd ' within, Brother Henry; and if any one askt ' for him, he muſt ask for Brother Henry, as if any ' Courier came there, or any other matter happened ' whilſt he was in that Conclave. He made another ' Fraternity of Hieronimitans at Vicennes, and at St. ' Mary of wholeſome Life. He cauſed a great and noble ' Lodging to be built in the Horſe-Market, fantaſtically ordered, with certain little Cells, that he ' might go and be there ſome Days as a Monk.

This Author has Reaſon to ſay, That (c) many have look'd upon all theſe things as Fictions; for the Writers of the League, and others, have much traduced him upon that ſcore. I will content myſelf with relating a Paſſage, which I find in a Libel of the Leaguers (d). The Dungeons built by that Hypocrite, ſerved only for a Covert to his Laſciviouſneſs, his Ordures and Sodomies; John d'Epernon knows ſomething of them, who cannot contradict me. The wiſeſt People have well ſaid, that it was only an Amuſement, and a Cage deſigned for other ſort of Birds, and not a Religious Simplicity, which has always been the true Motive for all Princes and honeſt Men to ſequeſter themſelves, who were not (like that ſeeming Hermit) touched at their Heart with a Spirit of Hypocriſie. Du Verdier obſerves, that the Preachers, and amongſt others, Maurice Poncet cry'd out againſt theſe Fraternities and Proceſſions of the King. He that he names, ſeems to me the moſt furious of them all. I will relate what Peter Matthieu has ſaid of him, by which you will ſee, that theſe external Acts of Devotion were look'd upon only as Grimaces, without any inward Amendment. (e) ' On Sunday the 27th. of March, 1583, the King impriſon'd Poncet the Friar, ' who preached in Lent at Notredame, for having preach'd the Saturday before, too freely ' againſt this new Fraternity, calling it the ' Fraternity of Hypocrites and Atheiſts, and ' uſing theſe very Words, I have been informed from very good Hands, that laſt Night, ' which was the Friday of their Proceſſion, the Spit ' was turning for the Supper of thoſe fat Penitents, ' and that after having eaten good Capons, they ' had for their Night-Collation, young Virgins that ' were made ready for them. Ah wretched Hypocrites, do you mock God then under a Mask, and ' carry a Whip at your Girdle, only for a Pretence? ' 'tis not there, by God, that you ought to carry it; ' but it ought to be laid on your Backs and Shoulders, ' and you ought to be thraſhed very well with it; for ' there is not one of you but hath well deſerved it. ' For which Words the King, without deſiring otherwiſe to ſpeak to him, ſaying he was an old Fool, ' ordered him to be conducted in his Coach by the ' Captain of the Watch, into his Abbey of S. Pere at ' Melun, without doing him any other Harm, than ' the fear they put him in, that they would caſt him ' into the River.

(O) That he was eloquent, a Lover of Learning ——but he took an unſeaſonable Time.] Mezeray reports the Subſtance of the Speech which this Prince made to the States of Blois, in the Year 1576, and he adds: (g) ' that fine Oration pronounc'd by the ' Mouth of a King, with an Action that was truly ' Majeſtick, and a wonderful Grace, was received ' by all the Auditory with a general Applauſe; but ' not without ſome concern to the wiſer Part; who ' admiring

I have received two very curious Memoirs: One reſpecting the Propoſal which he had been induced to approve of (P) declaring for his Succeſſor the Eldeſt Son of the

'admiring ſo many fine external Qualities in that 'Prince, lamented within themſelves, that his Edu- 'cation had not been anſwerable to his Birth, and 'they could not praiſe the natural Beauty of his 'Genius, without deteſting at the ſame time, 'thoſe who had miſerably corrupted it. He gives 'alſo a Summary of the Speech which the ſame 'Prince made at the opening of the States of Blois, 'in the Year 1588. and he prepares his Reader for it by theſe Words (h). He made a fine Speech, in which he obſerved this Temper, that he was very willing to aſſure them, that he would bury all paſt Injuries in Oblivion; but it was upon this Condition, that all Factions being extinct, his Authority ſhould be reſtored to its full Force; which he enlarged upon with ſo much Art and Politeneſs, that if the Queſtion had been only whether he was a good Orator, he had doubtleſs carried his Point. I'll confirm this Elogy, with a Letter written by one of the Deputies (i) of the States of Blois, (k) 'I. was the 'fineſt and learneſt Speech that was ever heard, not 'only from a King, but from one of the beſt Ora- 'tors in the World, and he had ſuch Grace, ſuch 'Aſſurance, ſuch Gravity and Sweetneſs in pronoun- 'cing it, that he drew Tears from the Eyes of many 'Perſons, from which Number I cannot exempt 'my ſelf; for I found in my Soul ſuch a Commotion 'in hearing this Prince ſpeak, that my Tears 'witneſs'd it, whether I would or no: he demonſtrated 'with ſo much Compaſſion the Miſeries of the 'Kingdom, ſet forth the Trouble he was in for them 'with ſo much Vivacity; compared the Felicity, &c. It would be in vain objected to me, that his Speeches were made for him, for that will not hinder the Character of his Eloquence, conſidering the manner with which he ſpoke. They who obtain the firſt Places in Parliaments, are nevertheleſs reckoned good Orators, tho' their Diſcourſes are compoſed by others for them, which they make at the opening of their Audiences, and how many excellent Preachers are there that do not make their own Sermons? But not to ſtand upon this, let us ſet down a Paſſage of Mezeray, which ſhews that this Monarch ſpoke very well off-hand. (l) 'He made himſelf ſo eloquent 'by the natural Diſpoſition that he had for it, that 'if there could be any exceſs in ſo fine a Thing, we 'might have Reaſon to ſay, that he had too much of 'it. He wonderfully delighted in great Aſſemblies, 'and in premeditated Speeches, where it was found, 'that his Speech was always the fineſt, and that 'even the Anſwers he made without Premeditation 'to the Deputies and Embaſſadors, were (m) much 'better than the Diſcourſes they had prepared with 'great Art and Pains. I do not know, whether that great Hiſtorian has ever inſinuated, that this Prince's Speeches were made by any body elſe. I know indeed, that Thuanus relates (n) that Mr. Morulillier was thought to be the Author of that which the King pronounc'd in the States of Blois, in the Year 1576. But I am ſure, that if that Prince did not compoſe thoſe Pieces himſelf, he at leaſt added his own Examination, Advice, and Corrections; which I am perſwaded to believe, from what I am going to ſay. He had a great Ambition to underſtand perfectly the French Tongue, and to ſpeak it politely and correctly. The Pains he took in it, had all the Succeſs that could be deſired. (o) Noſter Gallia Rex Henricus III, elegantiæ ſermonis ſui ſtudioſus (aliquot præſertim ante obitum annis, quo tempore plura regia quam multi credunt, habebat) haud infelici & inutili Studio, fuit. In eo enim tandem excelluit, & ita quidem ut non minus caſtigatum quàm ornatum eſſe cuperet. He could gueſs at an Author by the Stile of a Book, by which he judged, that Henry Stephens was the Author of a Work that had no Name to it (p), and he was not miſtaken. He was heartily zealous for the Advantages of his Language, and having commanded Henry Stephens to ſhew the Advantages and Excellencies of it, he preſt him ſo earneſtly to compoſe that Treatiſe that he quickly after would have a Copy of in print (q). I have ſaid ſomewhere elſe that he deſired that Learned Man to make a Parallel betwixt the Ciceronians of Italy, and the Ciceronians of France. I have ſaid alſo that he loved Bodin for the Learned Diſcourſes he heard from him. There were many other Learned Perſons, whoſe Converſation he loved. Note (r) That in the Year 1579, he gave three thouſand Livres to Henry Stevens, and a Penſion of 300 Livres per Annum.

It remains for me to prove, that it was the Opinion of ſome that he employed the time on thoſe things, which ought to have been employed on more urgent Affairs. (v) 'If ever any Prince had reaſon to 'fear, it was (w) then; nevertheleſs this new 'King, as if he had enjoyed a profound Peace, 'inſtead of putting on his Arms, fell to Learn- 'ing on one Hand Grammar, and the Latin 'Tongue of Doron, (whom he afterwards made 'Counſellor in the Great Council) and on the o- 'ther Hand, he had a kind of Converence, and 'Academical Meeting, with Pibrac, Ronſard 'and other Wits on certain Days, wherein every 'one Diſcours'd upon ſuch a Subject, which they 'had before agreed upon. A noble and worthy 'Exerciſe indeed, but not agreeable to the Buſineſs 'this Prince had then upon his Hands. Theſe new 'Leſſons of Grammar gave me occaſion to 'vent in a Paſſion theſe ſix Latin Verſes;

'Gallia dum paſſim civilibus occidit armis,
'Et cinere obruitur ſemiſepulta ſuo.
'Grammaticam exercet media Rex noſter in aula,
'Dicere jamque poteſt vir generoſus, Amo.
'Declinare cupit, verè declinat & ille,
'Rex bis qui fuerat, fit modo Grammaticus.

Mr. de Pibrac having told Paſquier one Day (a) that he had heard, that (b) Marillac was the Author of that Epigram, added, that if he was ſure of it, he would make him Repent it; for it (c), does not belong to a Subject to play in that manner upon the Manners and Deportment of his Prince. 'That would be well enough, reply'd Peſquier (d), 'in any one's Mouth but yours, who ought to con- 'ſider that if a King, that is expoſed to the view 'of all his Subjects, does not Guide his 'Actions, it will be very difficult for him, to 'prevent the Diſcontents of thoſe, that moſt re- 'ſpect him: I'll added, that ſuch Verſes proceeded 'not from one that was an Enemy to his Majeſty, 'but rather from one who adored him, but at the 'ſame time was troubled to ſee him fall by that 'means into the Contempt of all his People, and 'that we ought all to wiſh, as the Caſe then 'ſtood, that that Epigram had fallen into the Hands 'of our King, to be an Inſtruction to him not of 'Grammar, but of what he ought to do.

(P) Of declaring for his Succeſſor the Eldeſt Son of the Duke of Lorrain.] Monſieur de Schomberg warded off that Blow: I have a manuſcript Copy (e) of a Memorial which he made upon that Subject, and that deſerves very well to be inſerted at length.

Memorial of the Sieur de Schomberg.

'Sometime after the Death of Meſſieurs de Guiſe 'which happened at Blois, it was propoſed by the Car- 'dinal de——on the part of his Holineſs, that if his 'Majeſty would declare the Marquis du Pont his 'Nephew, Heir of the Crown, and get him acknow- 'ledged as ſuch with all the requiſite Solemnities; 'his Holineſs was ſure that the King of Spain 'would give the Infanta in Marriage to the ſaid 'Marquiſs, which would bring all the Troubles of 'France to an end. To which the King being 'ready to conſent, by the perſwaſion of ſome who 'were then about his Majeſty, Mr. de Schomberg 'broke the Deſign, by theſe Arguments: That 'this would be to invert the Order of France, 'aboliſh the Fundamental Laws, and leave to 'Poſterity a certain Monument of its Cowar- 'diſe, and Puſillanimity for which his Ma- 'jeſty would be juſtly blamed by Hiſtorians, and 'his Servants and Subjects branded with Treachery 'and Diſloyalty, with which Vice for his part he 'would not be tainted: That that War was betwixt 'the French againſt the French, who at firſt ſhew 'ſome Heat, but afterwards of themſelves return 'to Reaſon: That his Majeſty ſhould only be Soli- 'citous to Live, and to go Fine, and to be upon 'his Guard againſt any ſeditious Villain, who in 'theſe firſt Furies might undertake ſomething a- 'gainſt his Perſon, as a preſervation againſt which 'his Majeſty ſhould Command, that a Pink'd Waſt- 'coat the Duke of Lorrain: The other respecting what the Deputy of the League was ordered to represent to the Pope, after the King was Assassinated by James Clement a Dominican (Q).

That execrable Murther was Committed in the Town of St. Clou. Some Protestant Writers have Exaggerated that Circumstance, and have found some Mysteries in it. The Fact that they Alledge will appear very uncertain, whilst they leave the Observations

'coat should be made for him that he might ordinarily wear. A thing that was resolved upon but not Executed. The Sieur Schomberg having then altered the Kings Opinion by the aforesaid Remonstrance, his Majesty commanded him, to tell him, by what means he might appease these popular Commotions. To which the said Sieur Schomberg immediately giving a satisfactory Answer, he beseech'd the King not to insist any longer on the Maxims, that he had hitherto held, and not to imagine that this Affair could be accommodated by his usual Lenity and Indulgence; that he must resolve to make himself the strongest in the Field; that for that purpose he should Countermand Mr. de Nevers, who was then before Garnache, and give a Pledge to the King of Navarre to with-draw himself with all his Forces, and come to his Assistance, and that he should send into Germany, Italy, England, Denmark, and to all other Potentates, to let them know the Justice of his Cause, and the Consequences of it, and desire their Succours and Assistance to raise a great Army of Foreign Forces. This Proposal was violently contradicted, especially by Mr. de Nevers, so far as to say that it was Heretical; and that neither the Pope, nor any of the Catholick Princes would like it to see the King of Navarre so near His Majesty. On the Contrary, Mr. de Schomberg maintained that that War did not in any sort concern Religion, but the State, and that his Majesty could not so safely depend upon any Person in the World, as the said King, as being himself interested in the preservation of the said Kingdom, with many other Reasons which he added; which had so much weight, that from that time the Treaty with the said King was set on Foot at Blois, and was afterwards Executed at Tours, where the first interview was made betwixt these two Kings. 'Tis therefore with great Reason that the Service, which the Sieur Schomberg did then to France in these two Points, particularly to the House of Bourbon, was very much Celebrated. It was also the King's advice, that the said Sieur de Schomberg should write to the President Jeannin, to keep Mr. de Mayenne to his Duty: But his Majesty having heard of the departure of the said Sieur de Mayenne from Lions, and his coming this way, the said Letter was never sent, and it is still among my Papers in Germany, full of excellent Reasons and Perswasions, which since have accomplish'd the Reduction of the said Duke of Mayenne.

(Q) What the Deputy of the League was Ordered to represent to the Pope, after the King was Assassinated by James Clement a Dominican.] Those Pieces cannot be too carefully preserved, which are Authentic Proofs of the Fury, most of the French were seiz'd with in the Reign of Henry III. and some Years after his Death. Some People, will endeavour hereafter to darken the Truth of these Matters of Fact: We must prevent their design; for the farther Men are from the Age, these things were Acted in, the easier it is for them to wrangle. Henry III. had not been a hundred years Dead, when an Anonymous Author was so bold as to Publish a (f) Treatise, maintaining that James Clement did not Kill that Prince, which is to deny that it is Day at Noon. You will find some convincing Circumstances against that Monk in a Writing, of which I have received a (g) Copy, which I here insert intire.

'The Extract of what was represented to the Pope by the Commander of Diou, Embassadour for the Union of the Catholicks at Rome.

'Twas (h) then, most Holy Father, that the Evil appeared Extreme; and that the Prayers as well of the Clergy, as of the People, continued with greater Perseverance, and we must certainly believe, that they have forced the Divine Majesty to Commiseration, which would not leave so many good Men, and so Zealous for his Holy Cause, in a longer suspence of his Goodness and Mercy; but rather deliver them from their Misery, by so great and so wonderful an Event, that; the more it is considered, the more it raises our Thoughts to the Meditation and Admiration of God's incomprehensible Judgments. 'Tis the Death of the King that happened in so strange a manner, that the truth of the thing and the impossibility, that was objected against it, were long contending which should carry it. At last the News was confirmed by many concurrent Advices, and tho' your Holiness has had the particulars of it from other Hands, I presume you will not be impatient at the Discourse which I shall make about it. A Religious of the Order of St. Dominick of the Convent of Paris, named Brother James Clement, of 23 or 24 years of Age, a Native of the Village of Sorbonne, in the Diocese of Sens, and the last of 300 or 400 which are in the said Convent, yet divinely elected, and chosen for so generous an Exploit, which God has done by his Hands, had often boasted (i) amongst his Brethren even after the Rout of Senlis, when he saw the Enemies Affairs to prosper, that the King should never Die but by his Hands, at which the rest took occasion to Laugh at him, calling him by Derision Captain Clement. But this did not make him alter his Opinion, but on the contrary he confirm'd himself, and persisted in the desire of executing that Design, thinking only of the means whereby he might accomplish it. In that Enterprize he must resolve upon Death; and he was willing to suffer the most cruel that could be invented for him, which is a Constancy so admirable in the Capacity of a Religious, that no Instance can be found like it in this Age. To bring the matter to an Issue, he found the way to get very secretly the Letters of some Politicians, and concerted with them to inform the King of what was doing in the Town to the advantage of his Affairs. He received some Words of Credence from them, and obtained from the Count de Brienne, Prisoner in the Castle of the Louvre, a Passport for a more favourable Access into the Enemies Army. Now having all that was necessary for him, to go to the King, he left Paris the last Day of July, to go to St. Cloud, and took leave of all the Religious †, exhorting them to put up their Prayers for him, saying that he went for the Service of God, to deliver the People from Misery, without any Hopes of returning; and he did not desire it, provided God should give him the Grace not to fail in his Design of the Event, whereof they should hear in 24 Hours. The same Day arriving at St. Cloud's, he could not find a means to speak to the King; and the Night past over which might give him other Counsel. The next Day being the First of August, he address'd himself to the Sieur de la Guesle, the King's Attorny-General, in the Court of the Parliament of Paris, from which he had absented himself; and giving him to understand, that he was sent intrusted with Letters from the King's good Servants, and with some Words of Credence for things of Great Importance to the Service of his Majesty: he desired to be introduced by him to Discharge his Duty. The King having notice of it, commanded the Monk should be brought in, and retired aside into his Closet, where he talk'd more than a Quarter of an Hour with him, and in the mean time he gave him his Letters one by one to the last; and the King asking him if that was all, the Monk answer'd, I believe not, Sir, and that there must be some more behind; and putting his Hand farther into his Sleeve, he drew out the Knife he had in it, striking the King in the Belly, who perceiving himself wounded, cried out, and seized the Knife in the Hand of the Dominican, holding it in the Wound, with which he gave the Monk one Blow in the Face, who at the same Instant

' stant receiv'd abundance more from those who ran ' in at the Cry of the King; and whilst he was thus ' massacred, 'tis said, that he spoke these Words, ' I thank God I die such a Death, for I could not ' hope to depart this Life in such a manner, and to ' come off at such a cheap Rate. His Body was ' thrown into the open Street, and was afterwards ' burnt, as it was reported to Mr. de Mayenne. Thus ' the King died, the Night after his Wounds, at ' Two a-Clock in the Morning. Your Holiness may ' observe some of the most remarkable Circumstan- ' ces of that Fact. It happen'd on a Day that the ' Church celebrates the Feast of St. Peter in Bonds, ' whom God miraculously delivered by his Angel, ' from the Hands of Herod, and from all the Expe- ' ctation of the Jews, to whom he was to have been ' produc'd; The Catholicks may say, that on such a ' Day God has delivered them from the Hands of ' Heretick, and from the Yoak of a Prince, who ' design'd to desolate all Christendom. In what Day, ' most Holy Father, could the Monitory of your ' Holiness against an impenitent King, and a Despi- ' ser of the Holy Apostolical See, be better autho- ' rised with the Power of God? When Twenty ' four Hours after the Assassination of Monsieur de ' Guise, the said King, in cold Blood, caused the ' Cardinal his Brother to be [illegible]; it was ob- ' served, that the Word which he gave the Mur the ' rer, was St. Clement. While they were commit- ' ting that execrable Crime, he was in his Closet, ' talking merry with his Matrons, and Accomplices ' of the said Murther; and God has permitted a Re- ' ligious, named Clement †, to kill him in his Clo- ' set, in the midst of a great Army, which could ' not secure his detestable Life. Impiety had so pos- ' sess him, after Hypocrisie had made room for it, that ' he abhorred the Preachers who had publickly re- ' proved his Vices, and for that Reason he breathed ' nothing but Ruine and Revenge against them, ' which he protested commonly in his private Dis- ' courses, wherein every one was allowed to give his ' Opinion about the Punishment that should be in- ' flicted on them; but he has been prevented in his ' Barbarous Designs, by a poor Monk of the Order ' of the preaching Friars, who has inflicted upon him ' the Divine Punishment, that others had foretold him. ' These things, most Holy Father, are in my Opini- ' on of such Consequence, as your Holiness will ' judge worthy of Consideration. It is notorious, ' that this is not the Work of Men; God has ap- ' plied that Remedy to our Evils, by the Ministry of ' your Holiness. And 'tis to be hoped, that by your ' Interposition he will effectually cure them; and ' therefore I shall make most humble Requests and ' Supplications to you, as I am ordered to do by ' Mr. de Mayenne, and the aforesaid Lords of the Ge- ' neral Council, and I hope they will be acceptable to ' your Holiness.

† NOTA-BENE.

This Memorial, not only furnishes us with invincible Proofs against those, who would deny James Clement to have been the Assassin, but also against all those who undertake to justify his Brethren the Dominicans of Paris. Mr. Varillas relates the Reasons of those wretched Apologists, and says nothing to confute them. He draws out at length all that is said in Vindication of the Dominicans in general, and then he speaks thus: (b) But one of them, who was Father Bernard Guyart, has printed a Book without putting his Name to it, wherein he offers to justify the Order of St. Dominick as to the Murther of Henry III. The Word but, at the beginning of the Period, prepares the Reader for a particular Apology for James Clement; no Body can imagine, that Bernard Guyart design'd any thing else, and yet Mr. Varillas speaks only of a General Justification of the Order of St. Dominick. Let the Grammarians find fault with that Historian, for placing so ill the Particles that we call Adversatives; I leave that to them, and am contented to censure him upon another Point. The Treatise intituled, La Fatalité de St. Clou, is doubtless the same Work, which according to Mr. Varillas, was published by Bernard Guyart: now the principal Drift of that Book, is to shew that James Clement did not kill Henry III. Mr. Varillas is therefore very much in the wrong, not to represent that Work under that Idea, but under that of a general Apology for the Dominicans. This Fault appears to me more excusable, than that of omitting to say, that the Book, intituled La Fatalité de St. Clou, ought not to hinder one from holding the general Opinion. Mr. Maimbourg has done his Duty, in saying, that notwithstanding that Book, James Clement was certainly guilty of the Parricide (c), and that 'tis the best way, honestly to fall in with the publick Voice, whatever Profession one may be of. What he adds, has not so much Reason in it. Especially, says he, since the Honour of the Dominicans does not suffer by it; for after all, Faults are personal, and there is no Man of good Sense, who would lay the Crime of a private Person to the charge of an Order so holy as that of St. Dominick. This Discourse has nothing of Solidity; the Crime of James Clement was not Personal, but the whole Convent of the Dominicans at Paris, were guilty of it. They knew his design (d), they did not discourage him from it, but approved of the Execution. The Prior of that Convent was punish'd with Death, being fully convicted by (e) many Witnesses of having made an Elogy of that Assassin in the Pulpit: And since the City of Paris, and the Preachers especially bestowed a Thousand Benedictions and Praises upon the Monk that killed the King, and all the other Cities of the Kingdom, that were in the Interest of the League (f), and even the Pope himself extoll'd that pernicious Action; we may be assured, that the Crime of James Clement was the Crime of the whole League, and of the Court of Rome; for the Authors, Abettors, and Approvers of an Action, are reputed to be under the same Predicament. This is demonstrate in some other place (g).

(R) Whilst they leave the Observations of Peter Victor Cayet unanswered.] [illegible] his Words. 'The Huguenots say (b) [illegible] this King from this World into [illegible] (which is a notable Circumstance) the very Chamber where he believed he should be slain, was held for the furious Massacre on St. Bartholomew's Day, in the Year 1572. These Words are to be found in the additions to the Inventaire de l'Histoire de France, made by Montliard. The Book, intituled, Recueil des 5. Roys, printed at Geneva, assures us of the same thing, almost in the same Words. And in the State of the Church, written by John Taffin a Minister, are these Words. 'Tis observed, that by the Providence of God, this happened in the same Chamber, in which in the Year 1572, that furious Massacre on St. Bartholomew's Day was resolved upon. There are some notable Circumstances, and some Reflections on the Providence of God, rashly, and I will use that Word, fallly publish'd. For at the time of the Paris Massacre, the Place where the King was wounded, did belong to a Citizen of Paris, named Chapelain, and he possess'd it Two Years after, into which his Majesty never entered, whilst he was Duke of Anjou, nor a long time after his return from Poland. When the Queen his Mother bought it, it was after the Death of King Charles, with Intention to build there; but as she found that Place was too strait, she gave it in the Year 1577, to the Wife of the Sieur Jerome de Gondy, who pull'd down the House, and made it quite another thing, having adorned it with Grotto's and Fountains, and put it in such a Condition, that it was since frequented by Lords and Princes; but it was not so before: Now the Compiler of the aforesaid Recueil des cinq Roys, from which Montliard and Taffin have taken what they have put in their Books (for he wrote before them) has these Words, It is said, that the Council for the Massacre was held in the same Chamber. Behold a Hear-say, invented by the Author of the aforesaid Collection. This Story of his own Invention, was put into the Memoirs, and little Discourses printed at Geneva in the Year 1579, concerning what happen'd at the Massacre, where 'tis said, the thing was resolved upon at St. Clou, and at the Tuilleries. (a) Now to find some Colour for that Calumny, the Author of the said Collection, upon the King's being kill'd in Condy's House, draws this Conjecture from it, and cunningly slips in this Word; 'Tis said, that in the same Chamber, &c. Montliard, who wrote after him, goes farther; and says, 'Tis believed, &c. 'Tis not now a meer Hear-say; There are some that believe it: But Taffin the Minister, who wrote after them all, has a greater Confidence, and affirms.

HENRY IV. King of France, was one of the greateſt Princes mentioned in the Hiſtory of theſe laſt Ages, and we may ſay, that if the Love of Women (A) had ſuffered him to diſplay all his fine Qualities in their whole Extent, he would have ſurpaſt, or at leaſt equall'd the Heroes that are moſt admired. If the firſt time that he debaucht the Daughter or Wife of his Neighbour, he had been (B) puniſh'd in the ſame manner as Peter Abelard was, he would have been capable of maſtering all Europe, and would have eclipſed the Glory of Alexander and Cæſar. In vain it would be objected to me, ' firms, that it was a Providence of God. What a ' Lye is this! The Attorney-General having made ' his Complaint at Court againſt Montlhard, theſe ' Words were ſtruck out of his Book, as were a ' great many others, and he himſelf was in great ' Trouble, exalting himſelf upon a Hear-ſay; but ' his Book being ſince reprinted at Geneva, all this ' was again inſerted in it, and is credited amongſt ' the People of that Party. If the Facts, which Cayet relates about the Houſe where Henry III. was aſſaſſinated, be true, there is no doubt but the Proteſtant Authors whom he confutes, were much in the Wrong, and that the Myſterious Circumſtances they have taken Pains to obſerve, are meer Illuſions, and the vain Imaginations of credulous Minds. But if they had been able to prove, that Cayet was miſtaken, it had been a commendable thing in them to reprint in the Geneva Edition, what Montlhard had been forc'd to ſuppreſs. 'Tis certain, that according to Order, and the Method of an exact Proceeding, the Publick ought to have been acquainted in the Geneva Edition, why that Amendment was made; that is to ſay, it ought to have been made out by ſtrong Proofs, that the Council about the Maſſacre, was held at St. Clou, in the ſame Chamber where the Dominican killed Henry III. My Edition of the Inventaire of John de Setres, is (k) of Rouen, 1612. and contains the place that the Attorney-General cauſed to be ſuppreſt. Mr. de Mezeray ſuppoſes, that the Reflections of the Huguenots deſcended into a more Myſterious Enumeration of Particulars. They wrote, ſaith he, (c) That the King was wounded at the ſame Hour, and the ſame Day, in the ſame Place, and in the very Chamber where he had concluded the Paris Maſſacre. He ſays nothing againſt it, he quotes no Body, and does not imitate Peter Cayet in any thing. That Myſterious Obſervation is ſtrongly urg'd in a Book, intituled, A Journal of the remarkable Things that happened in the Reign of Henry III. King of France and Poland, and which has been printed perhaps above Twenty times in Holland, with Three (d) or Four Satyrical Pieces; the laſt Edition, is that of 1699. The Journal is more large in it, than in the Edition of 1693. Now theſe Words are found at the end of the Additions. (e) The farther we ſeek for Obſervations and Particularities, in ſo (f) miraculous a Thing, the more Wonders we find in it, ſo that to Poſterity that Death will appear a Miracle full of innumerable Wonders, amongſt which this has been obſerved, as being moſt worthy of Remark, and yet moſt true, that in the ſame Place, the ſame Houſe, the ſame Day, and at the ſame Hour, &c. the King having diſpatched his Affairs as he had done when he was kill'd, the Paris Maſſacre was concluded on: The late King (who then was called Monſieur) was Preſident of the Council, viz. in the Town of St. Clou, in Gondy's Houſe, the firſt Day of Auguſt 1572, in the ſame Chamber, at the ſame Hour, to wit, at Eight a Clock in the Morning, the Breakfaſt (which was three Spits of Partridges) being ready for the Conſpirators of that curſed Action. Note, That this Addition was ſuperfluous; for all that is conſiderable in it, may be ſeen in the ſame Words, in the Journal of Henry III. printed in (g) 1693, and (h) 1699. and I believe it is alſo in the Editions that went before.

If we could be ſure, that this Journal, ſuch as the Booksellers of Holland have publiſhed it, was the work of a Catholick, it would be certain, that the Reflections of the Proteſtants upon the Circumſtances of Henry IIIs Death, would have leſs force than thoſe of a Writer of the other Party. The Three Proteſtant Authors which Victor Cayet confutes, go beyond one another; the firſt was contented with a 'Tis ſaid, the ſecond was not ſatisfied with an Expreſſion ſo weak, he ſaid, 'Tis believed; and the third expreſſeth himſelf ſtill more poſitively. This is the ordinary Method in telling of News; the laſt that ſpeaks is generally the moſt decitive, and fuller of Circumſtances and Facts. One would think it is a ſort of an Auction, where People are to bid one higher than another, becauſe the Goods are adjudged to him that bids moſt. Be it how it will, the Journaliſt of Henry III. goes farther than the Three Proteſtant Out-Bidders. He delivers the Fact, not only as moſt worthy of Remark, but alſo as moſt true. But the Author Anſelme (i) will have Mr. Servin to be the Author of that Journal; which agrees well enough with the initial Letters which have been put in the Editions (k) of that Book. But Mr. Pelliſſon affirms (l) that Mr. de l'Eſtoille, one of the Forty Members of the French Academy, was the Son of an Audiencer of Chancery at Paris, who had collected many Memoirs of the Affairs of his Time, from which one of his Friends, to whom he had lent them, took the Book, intituled, The Journal of what happened in the Reign of Henry III. The Queſtion is, to know, whether they who handled the Manuſcript, before it was publiſhed, and after it was publiſhed the firſt Time, have neither added to, cut off, nor altered any thing in it. However it be, thoſe who depend upon that part of the Journal, are obliged to anſwer the Reaſons of Peter Cayet.

(A) If the Love of Women had ſuffered.] It cannot be ſaid of him, as of ſome great Commanders (m) that were much addicted to their Pleaſures, that he renounc'd them, when the Exigency of his Affairs required it; for he loſt all the Advantages of the Victory of Coutras, to run after a Miſtreſs. Read what Mezeray ſays (n). ' The Valour of the King ' of Navarre, more eminently ſignalized it ſelf in ' that Battle, than his Conduct in reaping the Ad' vantages of it; for ſo far was he from marching ' directly towards the Foreign Army, as the Prince ' of Conde would have had him, promiſing if he would ' give him Troops, to go and poſſeſs himſelf of the Paſ' ſage of Saumur, that he ſuffered his victorious Army ' to ſeparate, being contented to take an Oath from his ' Officers, that they would be on the 20th. of No' vember, on the Confines of Angoumois and Peri' gord, in order to march towards the Reiſters. He ' only kept 500 Horſe, and taking the Count de ' Soiſſons along with him, entred into Gaſcogne, ' whether the violent Love he had for the Counteſs ' (o) de Guiche, drew him as it were by Force. One of the greateſt Affairs that Henry IV. had ever upon his Hands, was doubtleſs the Siege of Amiens; and yet he took along with him the fair Gabrielle, and lodged her cloſe by him; and would have kept her during all that difficult Expedition, had he had his own Deſires: (p) But he was quickly obliged to remove that ſcandal from his Soldiers Eyes, not only becauſe of their Murmurs, that reached his Ears, but alſo by reaſon of the Reproaches of the Marſhal de Biron. What I have ſaid at the beginning of this Remark, that there have been great Commanders, who though much addicted to their Pleaſures, knew how to quit them when there was occaſion, is not unknown to thoſe who know the Characters of Alcibiades and Sylla. See what Salluſt ſaith of the latter. Sulla ——— animo ingenti, cupidus voluptatum, ſed gloriæ cupidior, otio luxurioſo eſſe, tamen ab negotiis nunquam voluptas remorata (q). See what is ſaid of Alcibiades. Quum tempus poſceret, laborioſus, (Alcibiades) patiens, liberalis, ſplendidus non minus in vita, quam victu; affabilis, blandus temporibus callidiſſime inſerviens. Idem ſimul ac ſe remiſerat, nec cauſa ſuberat, quare animi laborem perferret, luxurioſus, diſſolutus, libidinoſus, intemperans reperiebatur, ut omnes admirarentur in uno homine tantam ineſſe diſſimilitudinem, tamque diverſam naturam (a).

(B) He had been puniſh'd in the ſame manner as Peter Abelard.] On the contrary, you will ſay, he would have grown a Slug and a Coward; for the ſame Spirits that inclin'd him to the Love of Women, made him Valiant, and we have ſeen few Warriours, but what have been Luſcivious. I anſwer, that though it be certain, that many great Generals have been of a very amorous Complexion, yet it does

does not follow, that their Courage and Lust had the same Principle in their Constitution; each of those two Qualities had its Cause, and all that can be said is, that these two Causes concurr'd in forming the Constitutions of these Men. But it is easie to prove, that there is no Connexion between those two Qualities. How many Cowards are there, more timorous than Hares (k) that have a prodigious Vigour in the Acts of Venus? Was there ever a Man more brave and undaunted than the Maréchal de Gassion, who hated (c) Women mortally? The Count de Tilly, who lived chast all his Life (d) time, was one of the greatest Commanders of the XVIIth. Century. Did not Mr. de Turenne, though no Debauchee, match those Thunderbolts of War, who lived at the same time with him, and whose Lewdness made almost as much noise as their Triumphs? And to say something more material, don't we know, that the brave Sigismund Bastori, Prince of Transylvania, surnamed (e) the Invincible, for his great Exploits, was as great a Poltroon in the Wars of Venus, as he was brave in those of Mars, and that having confest his Impotence (f), his Marriage with Mary Christina, Daughter of Charles Archduke of Gratz, was declared null. Some Eunuchs have been very brave Generals of Armies; for not to go so high as the famous Narses, who lived under the Empire of Justin II, in the VIth. Century, do not we know, that one of the most valiant Generals of Solyman, was an Eunuch (g). He was not fortunate, I confess, in the Expedition of Hungary, in the Year 1550, and he died with Vexation, for not having maintained his Reputation, nor answered the Publick Expectation: But for all that, he had a great Courage, and his mortal Chagrin was a proof of it. See Thuanus, who tells a pleasant Humour of that Eunuch, when a piece of ill News was brought him; it was the taking of Gran. A great matter indeed, answered he to the Messenger; that is a small thing; behold here my great Lots, shewing him the lower Region of his Belly. Ejus rei cum trepidus nuncius ad eum venisset, ipsa vultus consternatione magnum aliquod malum professus, purpuratus non sine circumstantium risu consternationi nuntii illudens, & Strigonii, quod nullo negotio recuperari posset, amissionem elevans; his verbis eum excepisse dicitur. Quam tu mihi cladem ingentem, fatue, quod tantum incommodum narras? ea demum mihi clades deplorandæ contigit, cum hinc (genitalium sedem ostentans) ea membra ademta sunt, quibus vir eram (i). Let us conclude from all this, that if Henry IV. had been treated as Abelard, he would have lost nothing, either of his Courage, Prudence, or Wit. Origen, Photius, and Abelard, are a manifest Proof, that the loss of the Masculine Organs doth not in the least prejudice the natural Talents of the Soul.

(BZ) That such a Punishment would have taken away his Courage.] You will find in the preceding Remark, the Commentary or Proof, that this may require. However, I will add, by way of appendix, the following Observations. Was not Annibal one of the greatest Generals of Antiquity, a chast Man? (k) Constat Annibalem——pudicitiam tantam inter tot captivas habuisse, ut in Africa natum quivis negaret. We don't find, that Scipio Africanus was of a very amorous Constitution, and he gave a notable Example of his Chastity, in his Expedition in Spain; for which, (l) he is extremely praised by Historians. Drusus, the Brother of the Emperor Tiberius, and one of the greatest Commanders among the Ancients, was extremely reserved in respect to Women. The Bravery of the Emperor Aurelian was incomparable, and yet attended with the greatest Chastity. We should injure him, should we make the least Comparison betwixt his Bravery, and that of the Lascivious Proculus, who set up for a Tyrant; a Letter of whom Flavius Vopiscus has preserv'd us, which I shall carefully avoid Translating (n). Tacendum non est, quod & ipse gloriatur in quadam sua epistola, quam infam melius est ponere quam de ea plurimum dicere. Proculus Metiano affini S. D. Centum ex Sarmatia virgines cepi. Ex his una nocte decem inivi: omnes tamen quod in me erat, mulieres intra dies xv. reddidi. Gloriatur (ut vides) rem ineptam & fatis libidinosam; atque inter fortes se habere credit si criminum densitate confecerit. Hic tamen quum etiam post honores militares se improbe & libidinose, tamen fortiter ageret——in imperium vocitatus est. You see by this, that he was owned to be a good Soldier, but once more, his had not a Valour that came next that of Aurelian. What shall we say of Alexander, whose Courage was extraordinary? More Praises have been bestowed upon his Chastity, than he deserved; yet it must be confess'd, that by his Constitution he had more Indifference than Inclination for the fair Sex; which is enough to confute those who imagine I know not what Mechanical Connexion betwixt Lust and Valour. To the modern Examples (o) already alledged, I add one of a brave Man, who lived in the XVI. Century, and who deserved the Title of Knight without Fear, and without Blame. It will be easily understood, that I mean Bayard. Love never was his Master, but he was Master of it on some dangerous Occasions. See his Life. What a Catalogue might I not give, if I would reckon up all that have resembled Sardanapalus, Men that were only valiant in Bed, but Cowards and Poltroons every where else? Were Caligula, Nero, and Heliogabalus, great Warriours? Did not they with the most infamous Excesses, plunge themselves into shameful Debaucheries? Was even Domitian (who was the Author of a new Name (p) for their base Exercises, wherein he signalized his Strength) reckoned for a good Soldier, or a good Commander? Those Sparks that were call'd formerly Mignons de Couchette, did sometimes pretend to make a Campaign, in order to avoid the Contempt to which the Suspicion of Cowardise exposed them with the brave; but they acquitted themselves so ill, that we may apply to them with a great deal of Reason, what Jupiter answered Venus, when she complained to him of the Wound she had received in an affisting her Son Æneas in a Battle. Do not you pretend to War, which is not your Province; your Business is Love.

Οὐ σοὶ (q) τ' αὖτ' ἐστὶν ἀρηϊφίλητος ἀοιδή·

Helena gives Paris the like Advice, as I have observed in another Place, where I confute Mr. de Mezeray. That Historian fancies, that the Ladies love brave Men, because they suppose them no less vigorous in the Exercise of Love, than in War. He does not well know their Motives; Glory or Vanity are the great Spring of their Prepossession in behalf of the Brave. Monluc observes, that Women had rather be Widows, than see their Husbands return from the Army in good Health, but loaded with Shame and Dishonour. 'Tis plain, that Lust has no Share in that, and since this is a new Proof against Mezeray, I shall set down Monluc's Words. He speaks to the Governours of a Place, and shews the Prejudice they will do themselves, if they do not defend it well. Not only your Master, continues he (s), and Princes and Lords, will look upon you with an evil Eye, but also Women and Children. Nay, your own Wife, tho' she pretends to love you, will hate you, and esteem you less in her Heart. For 'tis the Nature of all Women to hate Mortally Cowards and Poltroons, tho' they be never so spruce Gallants. And they love the bold and courageous, tho' they be never so ugly and deformed. They partake of your Disgrace; and tho' whilst they are in your arms a-Bed, they pretend to be pleased with your Return; they had rather you had been strangled, or that a Bullet had taken you off. For as we think, that the greatest Shame of a Man is to have a Whore to his Wife; so the Women think, that their greatest Shame is to have Cowards for their Husbands. See then how you will come off, Mr. Governour, if you lose your Post, you will be curst in your own Bed for it.

prodigious (C) Incontinence, that hindered him from making himself as great as he might have done; but notwithstanding that Obstacle, he has justly deserved the Sirname * which he bears. To convince us whereof, we need only consider the astonishing Difficulties he surmounted, before he was settled on the Throne; and the flourishing Condition to which he restored his Kingdom, which he found in the most dismal Desolation that can be imagined. He inherited that Crown in a very remote Degree (D) of Relation. We should probably better know, and admire more his Merit, if he had lived Five or Six Years longer than he did; for he was just upon the Point of entring upon the Execution of a prodigious † Design, when he was killed in his Coach the 14th. of May, 1610, by Ravaillac. Some Historians say, that this was foretold him (E) the Day before; but those who have examined the matter to the bottom, have proved it false. He was so generous, that there is no Probability that

(C) It was his prodigious Incontinence.] I may well call it so, after the Stories D'Aubigne has published of him, especially after these Words of a very grave Historian (a). 'If History made Apologies, it might 'justifie him from the greatest part of these Reproaches, but not however from the Passion he had 'for Gaming . . . . . , much less could it excuse him for his Lewdness with Women, which 'was so Publick and Universal, from his Youth to 'his last Days, that we know not how to give it 'the Name of Love or Gallantry. Mr. de Perefixe tells us something that is very strange. (b) It were to be wisht for the Honour of his Memory, that Gaming had been his only Fault. But his continual Love of the Fair Sex was another, much more blameable in a Christian Prince, in a Man of his Age, who was married, and whom God had so highly favoured, and who meditated in his Mind so great Undertakings. Sometimes he had Desires that were transient, and that stuck by him but for a Night; but when he met with Beauties that struck him to the Heart, he loved them extravagantly, and in those Fits and Transports, he appeared to be nothing less than Henry the Great. We are told, that Hercules took a Distaff, and Spun to please his fair Omphale; Henry did something meaner for his Mistresses. He dress'd himself one Day in the Habit of a Peasant, and carried a Burthen of Straw upon his Shoulders, to be able to accost Madam Gabrielle; and 'tis said the Marchioness of Verneuil has seen him more than once at her Feet, suffering her Disdains and Insults. It must have been a cruel Mortification to the good Huguenots, to see their Chief lead so scandalous a Life, even in Rochel. He debauch'd there, the Daughter of a Magistrate of the Long Robe, and had a Son by her. (c) The Church had often shewn him the greatness of his Fault, which he confest very ingenuously; but he would not be perswaded to make a publick Acknowledgment of it, till a little before the Battle of Coutras. You will find the Circumstances of this, in the (d) Life of Mr. du Plessis Mornai.

(d) Ubi supra.

(D) In a very remote Degree of Relation.] It was '(e) doubtless an uncommon good Fortune, that the 'Crown of France devolved to him: There was never a more remote Succession in any Hereditary 'State than this: For there were Ten or Twelve Degrees of Distance betwixt Henry III. and him, 'and when he was born, there were Nine Princes of 'the Blood before him; namely, King Henry II. and 'his Five Sons; Antony, King of Navarre his Father, and his Two Sons, that were elder Brothers 'to our Henry. All these Princes died to make 'way for him to the Crown.

(E) This was fore-told him the Day before.] We will begin this Remark with the Words of Peter Matthieu (f). 'Hereupon Brosse, a Learned Physician and Mathematician, said to the Duke of Vendosme, pursuing a large Discourse, that if the King 'could avoid an Accident wherewith he was threatned, he would live Thirty Years longer. No Body 'is willing to tell Kings any thing that may displease them: The Duke of Vendosme thinking it more proper that la Brosse should be the Messenger of his Advice, besought the King to hear him: The King 'ask'd him what he would have? At that Word 'the Duke of Vendosme was silent, his Silence increasing the King's Desire to know it, he press'd him, 'the other excus'd himself: At last, the King's 'Command drew from his Mouth what la Brosse had 'told him. You are a Fool, says the King, you 'believe him: Sir, answered the Duke of Vendosme, in these Cases, Credulity is a Fault, but not Fear; the Safety of your Majesty obliges every 'Body, and me more than all the rest, to make light 'of nothing: I most humbly beseech you to be 'pleased to hear him. The King refused it, and 'forbad him to speak of it: I can't, at least, says the Duke, but tell the Queen of it. The King reply'd to him twice, that if he mentioned it, he would never love him more. And so la Brosse was sent away. I have this Discourse Word for Word 'from the Duke of Vendosme. This is very positive; but here follows something that is no less so, which yet overthrows this Narrative of Peter Matthieu. So true it is, 'tis a (g) Philosopher who speaks, that most Historians are Credulous and Lyars, and thereby they always confirm People in their Belief of Prognostications, when they report these Stories without confuting them. But without going farther, why should not the Antients have done it, when we often see it practised in our own Time? Has not one of our Historians, speaking of the Death of our Henry the Great, said, that being advised of it by a Prince that is yet alive, (whom it is not necessary to name) the Day before that Misfortune happened. his Majesty slighting the Information, answered him, that la Brosse was an old Fool of an Astrologer, &c. Which I being desirous to learn from the Mouth of this Prince above Thirty Years ago, in the Presence of a (1) Princess of great Worth, he did me the Honour to tell me, that it was false. And within these two Days only to be farther informed of it, and that I might publish nothing of that Consequence without being very sure of it, I had the Honour to speak to him about it again (2) in the Presence of many Persons of his Family, and he confirmed to me the same thing, adding besides, that the Historian (3) had confounded Times and Things; and that la Brosse had indeed told him, after that fatal Accident, that he had foreseen it by his Majesty's Horoscope, (as Astrologers always do when Things are come to pass) but that he had not given him Notice of it the Day before to acquaint his Majesty with it. This however is written by a French Author, who lived at the same time; who will not believe him then for the future? Will any one think, that a Man appointed and paid for writing History, durst say a thing of this Consequence, and even to a Prince then living who could witness it, if it were not true? And yet it is as I say. If any one doubts of it, he may inform himself, and I am not sorry that I have an Occasion here to mention it, as well to undeceive Posterity, as to shew that, there are a great many things of this Nature written, which deserve no sort of Credit. Observe, that Mr. Petit doth not relate this altogether so faithfully as he should have done. He supposes that the Historian makes the King give this Answer, La Brosse is an old Fool of an Astrologer; but the Historian says not this; for according to him, it was to the Duke of Vendome that the King said, You are a Fool.

Let us produce a second Witness, with the Confutation of what he says. (h) "The Evening of the 'same Coronation, la Brosse an excellent Physician 'and Mathematician, said to the Duke of Vendome, 'that if the King could avoid a dangerous Accident, 'which threatned him, near at Hand, he would 'live Thirty Years longer, and desired him to 'bring him to his Majesty: But the King understanding what Subject he design'd to discourse upon, 'would neither see nor hear la Brosse. The Confutation of this, is contained in the Words of Mathieu. Tis said that la Brosse desired to speak with the King; but if he had done it, the Answer that Du Plein has invented had been true, that the King would have scorned to speak with him, for he looks upon him as a Fool. We find in that he ever advised the Duke of Alençon to get rid (F) of Catherine de Medicis; yet some Memoirs affirm it. He had the usual Fate of great Men, which was to be unfortunate in his Family. The two Wives that he successively married, the latter in the former's Life-Time, gave him a Thousand (G) Discontents. He deserved it, since he had so little regard to the Sacred Laws of Marriage. His Second Wife was one of those † Princesses, against whom he had raised Objections in examining with Rosni, what sort of a Wife was proper for him. His Notions about Marriage (H) are very Curious, and there are scarce any Discourses more solid and more pleasant than that which he had upon that Subject. It plainly appear'd, that Religion was only a false Pretence of the League, and of the King of Spain; this, I say, plainly appear'd, from the Endeavours that were used to hinder the Pope from giving him Absolution. I have related in another Place [a] the pleasant Humour of d'Aubigne, about the Strokes of a Switch, which the

in a Discourse upon the Death of Henry IV. printed at the end of the Memoirs of the Duke of Nevers, that the Duke of Vendome told several Persons, that la Brosse did not speak with him about it.

(F) To get rid of Catherine de Medicis.] Mr. le Laboureur (a) relates how this Queen, seeing Charles IX. near his end, was in fear lest the Duke of Alençon should be advised to pretend to Authority, and even to the Crown, to the prejudice of her Brother the King of Poland. She contrived upon this a former Design of a Conspiracy, which might give her Occasion to secure his Person, as also that of the King of Navarre: She sent them under a good Guard to Bois de Vincennes, till the King's Death, without declaring them Prisoners; in the mean time, she spread abroad the Noise of that Conspiracy, for which she caused the Marshals de Montmorenci and de Cosse to be arrested, and in order to remove all Occasions of doubting of it, she sacrificed to the Interest of State, two Favourites of the Duke la Molle and Coconnas——The Duke of Alençon himself betray'd his Cause, and his Companions, in the fear he was in; and he that kept up best the Character of an oppress King, who would not debase himself, was Henry IV. then King of Navarre. Not but that he feared he was undone, and it was with that Perswasion, as I have learnt from some Memoirs, that he was accused of having advised Monsieur to pretend to be sick, to oblige the Queen to come and see him, and under Pretence of having both something to say to her in particular, to cause her Retinue to withdraw, that they might strangle her. His Reasons for it were, their own Safety, the Opportunity of the King's Death, who was ready to expire, the Credit that time would afford to their Friends, and that the same Policy which made her renounce the Laws of Nature, to destroy her own Son, and her Son-in-Law, dispensed them, upon a stronger Motive than that of reigning, from abhorring an Action, which would preserve to the State two Princes that were necessary to it, by the Death of a Woman who disturbed the Peace, and caused the Ruin of it. He had neither the Courage to do it, nor the Discretion to conceal it some time after, which was the Reason of the mortal and implacable Hatred of Catherine de Medicis, against the King of Navarre; and therefore she did not scruple to have a hand in the Conspiracy against her own Son Henry III. and to embroil the State, when she saw that he had no Children, that she might hinder Henry IV. from succeeding him, and substitute in his room, Henry Duke of Lorrain her Grandson by her Daughter. According to these Memoirs, Henry IV. design'd to be one of the Murtherers of the Queen-Mother.

(G) Gave him a Thousand Discontents.] There's no need of proving this with relation to Margaret de Valois. I will only allege the Proof respecting Mary de Medicis (b). 'The high Esteem and Affection 'the French had for him, prevented their being so 'much offended with his scandalous way of Living; 'but the Queen his Wife was extreamly disturbed 'about it, which occasion'd daily Bickerings be'twixt them, and made her disdainful and ill hu'mour'd. The Discontent and Uneasiness of these 'Domestick Quarrels, no doubt retarded the Ex'ecution of the great Design he had formed for the 'perpetual Happiness and Repose of Christendom, and 'for the Destruction of the Ottoman Power.

(H) His Notions about Marriage are very Curious.] I have a very long Passage to write, which yet I am confident will seem short to some curious Readers; for it contains a kind of a Censure upon many Princesses, and some very solid Thoughts of Henry IV. about the Choice of a Wife. Here is what he said to Roni his Favourite (d). 'So that nothing more 'seems wanting to the Accomplishment of this De'sign, but to see whether I can get another Wife, so 'well qualified, that I may not be exposed to the 'greatest Misfortune of this Life, which is (in my 'Opinion) to have an ugly, ill-humour'd, and quar'relsome Wife, instead of that Ease, Repose and 'Satisfaction I should propose to my self in that 'Condition. If a Wife could be had according to 'one's Wishes, that I might have no Cause to repent 'of so hazardous a Bargain, mine should be endowed, 'amongst other good Qualities, with these Seven; 'namely, Beauty in her Person, Chastity in her 'Life, Complaisance in her Humour, Ingenuity of 'Mind, Fruitfulness of Body, Eminence of Birth, 'and great Estate in Possession. But I believe, my 'Friend, that this Woman is dead, or rather she is 'not yet born, nor ready to be born, and therefore, 'let us consider a little, what Maids or Wo'men, which we have heard of, would be fit for me, 'either within or without the Kingdom. And for'asmuch as I have, in my Opinion, thought of it 'more than you, I will tell you briefly, that I could 'content my self with the Infanta of Spain, as old 'and ugly as she is, provided I could marry with her 'the Low-Countries, tho' it should be upon Condi'tion of restoring to you the County of Bretune; 'neither would I refuse the Princess Rebella (e) 'of England, if she was only declar'd Presumptive 'Heiress of the Kingdom, which is said to belong 'to her; but I must not expect either the one or 'the other, for the King of Spain and the Queen of 'England are very far from having such a Design. 'Sometimes I have heard mentioned some Princesses 'of Germany, whose Names I do not remember; but 'the Women of that Climate would never agree with 'me; and I believe, if I had married one of them, 'I must always have a Barrel of Wine by my Bed'side; besides, I have heard there was once a Queen 'of France of that Nation, who almost ruined the 'Kingdom. So that all these Considerations dis'gust me. Some have also spoke to me of some 'Sisters of Prince Maurice, but besides that they are 'all Huguenots, and that such a Match might make 'me suspected at Rome, and amongst the Zealous Ca'tholicks, and that their Mother was a Nun, and 'something else, which I'll tell you another time: I 'can have no Thoughts of it. The Duke of Flo'rence has a Niece, which they say is very hand'some; but being one of the least Families of Chri'stendom that bear the Name of a Prince, and it be'ing but 60 or 80 Years since his Predecessors were 'only some of the most Illustrious Citizens of Flo'rence, and of the same Race with Catherine the 'Queen-Mother, who has been so mischievous to 'France, and more to me in particular, I am appre'hensive of such a Match, lest it should prove pre'judicial to me, my Friends and my Kingdom. 'There are all the Foreign Women which I think I 'have heard of. As to those within the Kingdom, 'my Niece of Guise is one of those that would 'please me best, notwithstanding the Report that 'some malicious People have spread, that she is 'a little Wanton; but as to my own Humour, be'sides that I believe it to be false, I had rather have 'a Wife given to Gallantry, than one that 'should prove ill-humour'd; of which she is not 'suspected: On the contrary, she is of a very 'sweet which the Proxies of that Prince received, when he was abſolved at Rome. I will ſay ſomething (I) of it again.

HENRY IV. was born at Pau in Bearn, the 13th. of December, 1553. [b] Anthony de Bourbon his Father, and Jane d'Albret his Mother brought him to the Court of France when he was Five Years old; but they ſtay'd there but a few Months, and return'd to Bearn [c]. Antony came again to Court after the Death of Henry II. He was declar'd Lieutenant-General of the Kingdom after Francis II's Death. He order'd the Queen his Wife, and the Prince his Son to come to him. He died of a Wound which he received at Rouen in the Year 1562. and then his Wife whom he had (K) ill-us'd [d], return'd to Bearn, where ſhe openly profeſs'd Calviniſm. She left her Son at the Court of France, under the Conduct of a prudent Tutor, named la Gaucherie. She ſent for him to Pau in the Year 1566 [e], and put Florent Chreſtien in the Room of la Gaucherie deceaſed. This new Preceptor, a good Huguenot, brought up the Prince in the Proteſtant Doctrin: Jane d'Albret declar'd her ſelf their Protectreſs in the Year 1569, and † came with that Intent to Rochel with her Son, whom ſhe from that time devoted to the Defence of this New Religion. In that Quality he was declar'd Chief of the Party, and his Uncle the Prince of Conde his Lieutenant, with Admiral Coligny. He was in the Army ‡ at the Battle of Moncontour, and was eager to be in the Action, but he was not ſuffered, for fear of Hazarding his Perſon. He followed the Army from that time, to the Peace which was concluded the 11th. of Auguſt, 1570, and then he return'd to Bearn. His Marriage with Princeſs Margaret, Siſter to Charles IX. was celebrated at Paris in Auguſt 1572. His Mother arrived there ſome Months before, to make Preparations for the Wedding, and died there as her Son was coming. He took upon him the Title of King, when he received in Poictou the News of her Death. All the World knows, that the Maſſacre was committed a few Days after the Wedding of this New King; and that this Prince ſeeing himſelf reduc'd to chooſe to die, or to go to Maſs, choſe the latter. The Anſwers that ſome Authors aſcribe to him, are only (L) Fancies of their own Brain, and ſome Inſtances of their deſiring to make the beſt Advantage of their Reading. He was obliged againſt his Will to ſtay ſome Years at the Court of France: He knew very well how to diſſemble his Grief, and he often drove it away, by the help of ſome Gallantry, ſweet and agreeable Humour, and of a Complaiſant Converſation, and of a good Family, handſome, well, and likely to have quickly fine Children. I fear only the too great Paſſion ſhe expreſſes for her Family, eſpecially for her Brothers, who might poſſeſs her with Deſires of raiſing them to my Prejudice, and more ſtill to that of my Children, if ever the Regency of the State ſhould fall into her Hands——There are alſo two Daughters of the Houſe of Mayne, the eldeſt of which, as ugly as ſhe is, would not diſpleaſe me, being modeſt and well educated; but they are too Young. There are two in the Family of Aumalle, and three in that of Longueville, which are not contemptible for their Perſons, but other Reaſons hinder me from thinking of them. So much for Princeſſes. You have beſides a Daughter of the Houſe of Luxemburg, one of the Houſe of Guimene, and my Couſin Catherine de Rohan; but ſhe is a Huguenot, and the others do not pleaſe me; and then the Daughter of my Couſin the Princeſs of Conty, of the Houſe of Luce, who is a very fine young Lady, and well bred, who would pleaſe me beſt if ſhe was ſomewhat older. But tho' they ſhould all pleaſe me, as far as I can know them, who can aſſure me, that I ſhall meet with the three principal Qualities which I deſire in a Woman, and without which I would not marry; namely, that I ſhall have Male Children by them, that they ſhall be of a ſweet and complaiſant Humour, and ſufficiently qualified to help me in Sedentary Affairs, and to govern my Kingdom and my Children well, if I ſhould happen to die before they come to Age, as this is like to happen, if I marry at this Age. You anſwered him, May it pleaſe your Majeſty, what do you mean with ſo many Affirmatives and Negatives? From which I can conclude only, that you are deſirous to be married, but that there are no Women to be found that are fit for you; at this rate we ſhould implore the Aſſiſtance of Heaven to make young again the Queen of England, and raiſe from the dead Margaret of Flanders, Mademoiſelle de Bourgogne, Jane la Loca, Anne of Bretagne, and Mary Stuart, all rich Heireſſes, that you might take your choice of them. For according to the Humour that you have expreſt, ſpeaking of Clara Eugenia, you would like ſome of thoſe Ladies who poſſeſs'd ſo great Eſtates. But laying aſide all theſe Impoſſibilities and vain Imaginations, let us conſider a little what is to be done, &c.

Mean time, the Queen of* Navarre, as a moſt wiſe and vertuous Princeſs, endeavoured to reduce him, enduring all that was poſſible, and remonſtrating to him what he ow'd both to God and his People. But all was in vain, he was ſo bewitch'd. Which the Queen ſeeing, ſhe had only Recourſe to her Prayers and Tears, moving Compaſſion in every one but the ſaid King her Huſband. The Queen Mother, during theſe Tranſactions, indeavoured to perſuade her to do as the King her Husband: To whom ſhe finally gave this Anſwer; That if the Kingdom and her Son were in her Hands, ſhe would throw them both to the bottom of the Sea, that they might be no impediment to her, rather than ever go to Maſs, which was the Reaſon they troubled her no more upon that Subject.

(L) The Anſwers ſome Authors aſcribe to him, are only Fancies of their own Brain.] During the Maſſacre, Charles IX. ſent for the King of Navarre, and the Prince of Conde into his Cloſet, and declared to them, if they did not renounce their Hereſie, they bantry, which his own Constitution, and the Corruption of the Ladies made very easie to him. The Lady de Sauves, married to one of the Secretaries of State, was one of his chief Ministers. But he was not so taken up with Love, as to neglect altogether Political Intrigues. He had a Hand in those that were form'd † to take away the Government from the Queen-Mother, and to expel the Guises from Court. The Queen discovering these Practices, caus'd him ‡, and the Duke of Alençon to be arrested, set Guards upon them, and order'd § (M) them to be examin'd, upon many heinous Allegations. These two Princes were set at Liberty by Henry III ¶. Catherine de Medicis carried them as far as Pont Beauvoisin, when she went to meet him. The King of Navarre at last made his Escape in the Year 1576 *, and retired to Alençon. He ‖ sided again with the Huguenots, and profess'd his first Religion a-new. The Rochellers received him into their Town, and after † he had staid with them some Months, he went to take Possession of his Government of Guienne. From that time to the Year 1589, his Life was nothing but a Mixture of Battles, Negotiations, and Love-Intrigues. His Wife was a great impediment to him, and yet she proved sometimes (N) useful to him. There were frequent Ruptures and Pacifications betwixt him and the Court of France; but at last Henry III. confederated with him altogether, and in good earnest, to resist the League, which was more furious than ever since the Death of the Duke of Guise and of the Cardinal his Brother. The Reconciliation and Confederacy of these two Kings, was concluded in April 1589. Their Interview at Tours, the 30th. of the same Month, was attended with great Demonstrations of mutual Satisfaction. They join'd their Troops some time after, to lay Siege to Paris. They besieged it in Person, and were upon the Point of subduing that great City, and chastising it as it deserv'd, when the King of France was kill'd by James Clement at St. Clou. The King of Navarre succeeded him the 2d. of August, 1589, but it was not without very great Difficulties, and without renouncing the Protestant Religion, that he forc'd the Leaguers to acknowledge his Title. The City of Paris persisted in its Revolt till the 22d. of March 1594. I mean the King did not make his Entry into it till that Day. He declar'd War against the Spaniards the following Year, and had not much Reason to be pleased with it. He lost much more than he got by it, but by a good Fortune, unknown to all his Predecessors, he made a Treaty of Peace should be treated as the Admiral. (d) The King of Navarre extreamly astonish'd at these Words, pronounced with a Menacing Voice, and at the dreadful Spectacle he had seen before his Eyes, answered with great humlity and Trepidation; that he begg'd of his Majesty to leave them their Life and Conscience undisturbed, and for the rest, they were ready to obey him in all Things. Though I make use of these Words of Mezeray, yet we may be assured it is the same thing as if I had used the very Words of a Calvinist Historian; for d'Aubigne (e) relates the King's Answer in the same manner: it runs thus in the Inventaire of John de Serres; (f) 'The King of Na- 'varre beseeches his Majesty, to remember his Pro- 'mise, and the Consanguinity so lately contracted, 'and not to injure him in his Religion, which he 'hath learnt from his Youth. The Author of the History of the Memorable Things, says no more of it: Nor is the Author of the Commentary de Statu religionis & reipublicæ in regno Galliæ more Prolix, as to the Sense, tho' he uses (g) more Words; and note, that he expretly observes, that the Answer (h) was made with a trembling Voice. Thus you see Four Protestant Writers, who agree with Mezeray; which shews, that his Sincerity can't be question'd. Which being so, ought we not to laugh at the Historian, who lengthens out the Answer we are speaking of for Three or Four Pages? Our Henry, says he (i), made an Answer, which shew'd from that Time the Heighth of his Courage, the Depth of his Sense, and the great Lenity of his Clemency. He beseech'd his Majesty to remember his Word that he had given him, the Nearness of their Blood, and their new Alliance, and not to offer any Violence to the Religion which he had suck'd in from his Childhood, with his Nurse's Milk. He said, That it was a great Misfortune that so great a King, who had in his Soul the Seeds of so many great Virtues should be so perniciously counselled to force his Subjects by Murders and Massacres, to serve God according to his Fancy. That there was nothing that could subdue a courageous People, and particularly the French, but the Lenity of their Prince, whom they Reverence as a God. That this was the Method Flaminius took to make the Romans Masters of all Greece: so that tho' he was the strongest in the City of Thebes, yet he used as much Persuasion to gain the People, as an Orator would have done from his Pulpit, and that he ought to know, that he commanded a People that could neither bear an intire Liberty, nor a perfect Slavery; and that the Royal Authority was not a Sovereignty over Slaves, but a Government of Fellow-Citizens. That he had often heard that the Romans had commanded all Nations, and made themselves Lords of the World, because they were govern'd by Reason, and did not give themselves up to Revenge——(a) Your Majesty knows, that one Example of the Roman Humanity had a greater force to subdue the Falisci, who were Foreigners, than all their Military Power. What might not your Majesty's Gentleness have done with respect to the Protestants your Natural Subjects? A Great King, as you are, should not do all that he can do; but imitate the Sun, who proceeds more gently, the higher he is rais'd——(b) They who have given you so ill Advice, are more to blame than you: and deserve an equal Punishment with those that poison the Publick Fountains, causing as many to die as drink of them. I have skipt the greatest Part of what this Compiler of common Places has put in the King of Navarre's Mouth; but I shall take nothing from the 'Reply which he falsely ascribed to Charles the 'IX. (c) These, said the King, are the fine Things 'you have learnt of Chrestien your Tutor. But I 'know a finer one than any of them, which is, that 'God has given a Prince the Supreme Command, 'whose Jurisdiction it is not lawful for a Subject to 'incroach upon: The Glory of Obedience is only 'his. Go and do as I command you upon Pain of 'Death. And tho' I am not bound to give any 'Account of my Actions, yet I am willing to let 'you know, that every great Example seems to 'have something of Injustice in it, which is made up by 'the publick Good. Peace (O), wherein he indemnified himſelf for all his Loſſes. This Treaty was concluded at Vervins, the ſecond of May 1598. From that time till his Death, the Kingdom was exempt from Civil and Foreign Wars, excepting the Expedition in the Year 1600. It was undertaken againſt the Duke of Savoy, and laſted but a little while, and was followed with an * Advantageous Peace, as it had been attended with glorious Actions. If the Valour and great Courage of that King had not ſhewn themſelves on a Hundred Occaſions, the wonderful Generoſity, he exercis'd towards his moſt Mortal Enemies, had been look'd upon as a Weakneſs, and an Effect of Fear; but ſince he could not be ſuſpected of Cowardiſe, there is great Reaſon to believe, that he took that Method out of a Noble Clemency. Neverthe-'leſs, being ſenſible that it was an Evil that could 'not be avoided, he reſolved to ſuffer her, and left 'her at perfect Liberty——and (b) accommo-'dating himſelf to the Times, and the Neceſſity 'of his Affairs, he endeavoured to draw ſome Ad-'vantages from her Intrigues and Intereſt. He ob-'tain'd a conſiderable one by her means, at the Con-'ference that he and the Deputies of the Huguenots 'had at Nerac with the Queen-Mother. For 'whilſt ſhe hoped to inchant them by the Charms of 'the Handſome young Ladies ſhe had with her, 'and by the Eloquence of Pibrac; Margaret play-'ed the ſame Artifices againſt her, gained the Gen-'tlemen of her Mother's Retinue, by the Charms 'of her own Women, and imployed ſo dexterouſly 'her own, that ſhe captivated the Soul and the 'Heart of poor Pibrac; ſo that he was altogether 'acted by her Spirit, and did every thing contrary 'to the Queen-Mother's Intention. (O) By a good Fortune, unknown to his Predeceſſors, he made a Treaty of Peace, wherein he indemnified himſelf for all his Loſſes.] Bodin (i) obſerves, that for 100 Years the Spaniards had made no Treaty with France, without having the better of it. He had reaſon for what he ſaid; Henry IV. was the firſt King of France who gained any thing by making Peace with Spain. He recovered all the Places he had loſt in Picardy; and alſo Blavet, which the Spaniards were Maſters of. That Peace did not eſcape the Cenſure of the Criticks. Some blamed the King of Spain, and others, the King of France. I will cite Mr. de Pereſixe. (k) Many among the French, who were not well acquainted with the miſerable Condition, the King of Spain and his Affairs were in, could not apprehend how that Prince could purchaſe Peace ſo dear, as to give up Six or Seven good Places, amongſt others, Calais and Blavet, which might be called the Keys of France. The Spaniards on the contrary, who ſaw that their King was in a dying Condition, his Treaſury exhauſted, the Low-Countries tottering, Portugal, and his Territories in Italy ready to revolt, the Son that was to ſucceed him, a good Prince indeed, but who lov'd a quiet Life, were aſtoniſht that the French, who had ſo bravely retaken Amiens, and reunited all their Forces after the Treaty of the Duke of Mercœur, had not made an Irruption into the Low-Countries, becauſe in all Probability they would have conquer'd the whole Country or at leaſt part of it. The King anſwered, that if he had deſired Peace, it was not becauſe he was tired out with the Inconveniencies of War, but to afford Chriſtendom a Breathing-time; that he knew very well, that in the preſent Conjuncture of things, he might have reapt great Advantages; but that the Hand of God frequently overturns Princes, in the Height of their Proſperity, and that a wiſe Man ought never out of an Opinion of ſome favourable Event, be averſe to Peace, nor truſt too much to the Appearance of a preſent good Fortune, which may be changed by a Thouſand unforeſeen Accidents; it often happening, that a Man caſt down, and wounded, has kill'd him, who would make him beg his Life of him. That Anſwer of Henry IV. does not agree with what is reported by others, that he told the Duke of Epernon, who was preſent at the Signing of the Treaty of Peace, (z) With this Stroke of a Pen, I have done more Exploits than I could have done in a long time with the beſt Swords of my Kingdom. Indeed, there's great Probability, that he promis'd himſelf no Advantage by the Continuation of the War, and I am ſure, that thoſe who were moſt unintereſted, and capable of judging of this ſort of things, were equally convinc'd of the Weakneſs which Philip II. ſhew'd on that Occaſion, and of the Prudence of Henry IV. in accepting ſuch a Peace. The Spaniards were aſhamed of their King's Weakneſs. The Prince his Son, paſſionately deſired that ſo ſucceſsful a War might be continued; and he put (a) out of Favour Don Chriſtopher de Mora, who had repreſented in a Council the moſt forcible Arguments for a Peace. The King of Spain was unmoveable, 'deſiring Peace (b) at any Rate; 'he found no Condition in the Treaty of Vervins, 'capable of diſſwading him from approving it, tho' 'his Council judged the Reſtitution of the Towns ſo 'fortunately taken, and ſo hard to be re-taken, 'ſhameful and prejudicial. He urg'd that it might 'be ſworn and ſecured. 'Tis very probable, he would have had different Sentiments had he been in the Vigour of his Age. But how can it be help'd? 'Tis one of the Faults of old Age, to make People timorous.

I have ſaid elſewhere, that Republicks have an Advantage which Kingdoms want: The Sovereign in a Common-wealth is never too young, nor ever too old. He is not ſubject either to the Infirmities of Childhood, or thoſe of old Age. Kingdoms have not that good Fortune; they Experience one while the Diſorders of a Minority, ſometimes the Heat of Boiling Blood, and at other Times the Slowneſs and Heavineſs of a declining Age. A King is forc'd to complain more than once, that the Number of his Years take away his Activity and Reſolution, and that a young Prince his Enemy poſſeſſes them.

We muſt not wonder that the Criticks found fault with the Peace of Vervins, and that ſome blam'd France, others Spain, and a third ſort Spain and France together. 'Tis the Fate of thoſe great Negotiations; it was the Fate of the Treaty of Ryſwick in the Year 1697. Many People blamed the Allies for not having demanded better Conditions; others blamed France for having given up ſo many Countries. The French repin'd at it, and the Pariſians refus'd to make Bon-fires, till they were forc'd to it by repeated Menaces. They would not have had the Nation return to the Condition of paſt Ages, in which it might be juſtly ſaid, they knew to make War better than Peace, and underſtood as well the Art of giving as of taking. They wiſh'd the popular Diſcourſes of the Flemings had proved falſe. They knew that abundance of ignorant People had ſaid that there was no Reaſon to be alarm'd at the loſs of ſome Towns, but rather to rejoice at it, ſince they would be recovered again fortified, according to Vauban's Method. Scholars expreſt this in another Manner: We loſe Towns built with Brick, they ſhall be reſtor'd built with Marble.

converted any other way: Nay, he found that only way defective, for he gained but one part of the Leaguers: Abundance of (P) Priests obstinately resolved not to pray for him. 'Tis observed in Moreri's Dictionary, that more than 50 Historians, and 500 Panegyrists, Poets, or Orators, have mentioned this great Monarch with Commendation. 'Tis certain, on the other Hand, that a great many Authors have spitefully stained his Glory, and have made it their Business to extenuate his good Actions, and to set his Faults in open view. Mr. de Sulli complains of them, and confutes their Obloquies (Q), and amongst other Things, maintains, that 'tis false, that this Prince granted every thing at the Importunities of his Mistresses. Nevertheless, I believe, that if he had not had faithful Servants to disappoint the Rapaciousness of those Harpies, and whose Countermands he approved of, they had been more Despotick over him. The Instances

(P) Abundance of Priests obstinately resolved not to pray for him.] The King's Attorney-General in the Parliament of Toulouse having Notice, that a great Number of Priests (e) in saying Mass, omitted the Prayer for the King, and that it was suppress'd in many printed Missals (f), complain'd of it in Parliament. It was order'd, that all Priests should be oblig'd to observe the Ancient Custom of that Prayer, in celebrating Divine Offices, and the use of those Missals was forbidden; where that Prayer was not found, and all Printers and Booksellers were commanded to add immediately the Leaf that was wanting, and in case of a Refusal, they were threatned with Corporal Punishment, and the Loss of their Copies. That Decree was made the 7th. of June, 1606 (g). If Twelve Years after the King had abjur'd Huguenotism, and had given good Tokens of his Zeal for Popery, and many Testimonies of his Kindness to the Leaguers, there were still so many Ecclesiasticks, that mortally hated him, what could he have expected from a contrary Conduct? The Fury of the Bigots and Opiniomed, had been infinitely more terrible, if he had neglected the outside of Religion, and acted like a Prince full of Resentment. One of his Historians gives us, as an Instance (h) of an Admirable Politician, what I am going to transcribe: That (i) very Night he play'd at Cards with the Dutchess of Montpensier, who was of the House of Guise, and the strongest Leaguer that was in the Party. Undoubtedly this displeased his ancient Servants, he would have been less forward to have paid such an Honour to a Huguenot Lady; perhaps they said that he went beyond the Parable of the Gospel. That Dutchess hath not yet labour'd in your Vine-Yard, and she hath done all that was possible to ruin it; and yet she is better paid than we, who (k) have born all the Burden and Heat of the Day. In the Parable it was thought enough to equal the Recompence of those who had laboured but an Hour, and had done no Prejudice before, with that of those who had labour'd all the Day. There were doubtless a great many Murmurs of this sort, which could not have been satisfied by this Answer of the Master of the Family (l): Is your Eye evil, because I am good? This would have been but chaffing the Wound; Henry IV. would rather have said for his Vindication, that the Necessity of the Times required such a Conduct. Res dura & regni novitas me talia cogunt Moliri (m). Mr. Du Plessis Mornay, in a Letter which he writ to Morlas in the Year 1594, during the time that they who had followed the League, went off from it upon Advantageous Terms, uses these remarkable Words: (n) 'We 'don't envy your killing the fatted Calf for the 'Prodigal Son, provided you say with a sincere 'Heart to the Obedient Son, You know, my Son, 'that all that I have is thine; don't Sacrifice the 'Obedient Son to give a better Enterainment to the 'Prodigal one. In short, I am glad of all that is done, 'if it be of some Advantage. But I am afraid of 'such Bargains, by which things are given away, 'and nothing is got for them but Words; Words I 'say, spoken by Men, who hitherto never kept 'their Word.

(Q) Mr. de Sulli complains of them——and confutes their Obloquies.] He speaks of some Historians, who had distributed their Praises and Censures unjustly; for they found no Blot in those that hired them, and hardly any thing good in Henry the Great, who gave them nothing. 'And (says he) 'forasmuch as (a) they cannot deny him some Praises, amongst an infinite Number that are every 'where publickly bestowed upon him, they maliciously forgot the most necessary to be known, disguise others, and extenuating them all as much 'as possible, they have invented a malicious Imposture, which is to ascribe to him impudently 'and falsly such Desires, Projects, Designs, Enterprises and Resolutions about Affairs of State, as are 'the most absurd, improper, impertinent and ridiculous that can be imagined. And pretending to 'great Matters, they talk in the very same manner, as if they had been the greatest Confidents of the King, and had been admitted into all 'his most secret Thoughts and Designs, or kept 'Intelligence with one of his most familiar Servants, who told them all. Then proceeding to 'speak of his Conversation, domestick Life, and 'Conduct, and of his Recreations, Diversions, 'Sports, Pleasures, Pastimes and Merriments, tho' 'they were for the most part ordinary, common, and 'familiar to all Men, nay, even to Women, and always most General, Universal, Tolerated, Lawful, and permitted to all Kings, Potentates, Princes and great Lords, there being few to be found 'amongst the most wise, virtuous, debonaire, pious 'and holy, who were not delighted with them, and 'which their People and Subjects have not gladly 'suffered, when for such Pleasures and Pastimes 'there has been no Injustice, Rape, Murder, Violence, Extortion, or Pillage committed. Yet 'when they come to discourse of the Gayeties and 'Mirth of this sweet and good humour'd Prince; 'they so misrepresent them, with so many Lyes and 'Fallacious Circumstances, and mischievous and 'pernicious Consequences, ascribing to him so many vicious, shameful, infamous, nay execrable and scandalous Passions, that one who hears 'them speak, with so much Boldness, Impudence, 'and Rashness, would think, that they are Searchers of the Hearts and Thoughts of Men—— 'or that they have been the King's Confessors or 'Great Penitentiaries——Nay, they have been 'so bold Censurers, as to place in the Number of 'his Mistresses, a Lady, whose Qualities, Eminence, Virtue, and Prudence would have cautioned him, even though he had thought on her, not 'to take her for such a one; and consequently 'those impudent Writers deserve to be severely punish'd for having talked at that rate. In other 'Places they say, that the Women had got such 'Dominion over him, because Vice was grown Natural and Habitual to him, by a long use, and 'great Familiarity with wicked People, and that he 'was become so desperately fond of some of these 'Beauties, that he had no other Will but theirs; 'which was the cause that all his most important 'Affairs were managed by their Mediation, and 'that they were refus'd nothing they could desire. 'They so frequently add so many other foolish 'Things, that all these Impostures being too long 'to be confuted in this present Discourse, (that is otherways design'd) we will refer those who are 'willing to see their Calumnies expos'd, to what 'shall be said of them in several Places of these 'Memoirs, from which it will appear by what 'Means, and for what Reasons, the King would never 'have married a Lady of Pleasure; that Women 'dispos'd of no Affairs, and that he had some Servants, who by his own Command knew how to 'tell them their Thoughts, even in his Presence, 'and to refuse them such Things as they judged unjust or prejudicial to the State, the Affairs and Revenues of the King, or to his People; and they 'were obliged to bear it. I will confirm this by some Words taken from a Letter of Henry IV. in which we shall see the Reflections that were made upon him. (b) 'Some blame me for being too fond Fuit autem Dionyſ. ille, quod ait Niceas Nicænſis libro de Succeſſionibus, jam ab adoleſcentia, tam immani furioſaque libidine percitus, ut ſine diſcrimine cum plebeis ancillis ac pediſſequis coiret, & aliquando cum familiaribus inambulans, ubi ad ancillarum ædes venit, quas pridie ingreſſus aliquot obolos quos debebat non ſolverat, caſu tum forte in locullis habens, diſtenta manu coram omnibus numeravit. Athen. lib. 10. p. 437.

Apoſtate or Deſerter. Some ſay, that ſore Eyes made him change his Opinion; others attribute it to the Pains of the Gravel. Cicero gives us both theſe Traditions (a) Nobis (b) Heracleotes ille Dionyſius flagitioſe deſciviſſe videtur ac Stoicis propter oculorum dolorem. Quis verò hoc didiciſſet à Zenone, non dolere quum doleret? Illud audierat nec tamen didicerat malum illud non eſſe quia turpe non eſſet, & eſſet ferendum viro: Hic ſi peripateticus fuiſſet, permanſiſſet, credo, in ſententia, quoniam dolorem dicunt malum eſſe, de aſperitate autem ejus fortiter ferenda præcipiunt eadem quæ Stoici. I have ſet down more Words than I needed to prove what I have ſaid, and yet I do not think my Labour loſt; for by the Way, I diſcover to my Reader, that the Controverſies of the Stoicks and Peripateticks, upon the Nature of Pain, were but a Diſpute of Words. They both agreed, that it ought to be born courageouſly; but the former deny'd that it ought to be called an Evil, and the latter maintain'd it ought. Here is a thing indeed to make ſuch a ſtir about. We diſpute at this Day, both in Divinity and Philoſophy, about Things wherein the Miſunderſtanding is no leſs viſible. Here is a Paſſage of Cicero, which I will ſet down entire, that we may have a full view of the way of reaſoning of our Philoſopher. He preſum'd much upon the Strength of Philoſophy; for he judged, that it being inferiour to the force of Pain, Pain muſt needs be an Evil. (c) Homo ſanè levis Heracleotes Dionyſius, cum à Zenone fortis eſſe didiciſſet, à dolore deductus eſt. Nam cum ex venibus laboraret, ipſo in ejulatu clamitabat, falſa eſſe illa, quæ antea de dolore ipſe ſenſiſſet. Quem cum Cleanthes condiſcipulus rogaret quamam vatio eum de ſententia deduxiſſet, reſpondit, Quia cùm tantum operæ Philoſophiæ dediſſem, dolorem tamen ferre non poſſem, ſatis eſſet argumenti malum eſſe dolorem. Plurimos autem annos in Philoſophia conſumpſi, nec ferre poſſum: malum eſt igitur dolor. Tum Cleanthem, cùm pede terram percuſſiſſet, versùm ex Epigonis ferunt dixiſſe.

(B) That he was a Debauchee from his Youth.] We have juſt now ſeen, that he philoſophiz'd many Years upon the Auſtere Maxims of the Stoicks; he himſelf affirms it, if we believe Cicero. What muſt we think then of the Story we find in Athenæus? Shall we ſay that this Author diverted himſelf with collecting all the ſcandalous Stories, true or falſe, that he found in the moſt Satyrick Writers? I leave the Deciſion to my Readers. I only put in the Margin the Greek of Athenæus, with Dalechampius's (d) Verſion, which ſhould be rectify'd by Caſaubon's Notes. They who well remember the Seventh Book of Athenæus, will be eaſily determined on Cicero's Side, and believe, that Dionyſius did not deſert the Stoicks, till he had grown grey amongſt 'em; for Athenæus gives him the Name of Old Man, at the time of his Deſertion, and cites Timon the ſatyrer, who ſaid, that this Man had begun to devote himſelf to Pleaſures, when the Seaſon of them was over. 'Tis beſt to ſet down the Original Words; they are in the 6th. Chapter of the 7th. Book of Athenæus, pag. 281. Περὶ δὲ Διονυσίου τοῦ Ἡρακλεώτου τοῦ τὰς ἀρετὰς χαλάσαντος ἀπὸ τῶν ἀκροτάτων ἐπὶ τὰς ἡδονὰς μεταφοιτήσαντος, καὶ Μητροδώρῳ συμπαιζόντος ἐκμανῶς, καὶ τὰ ἐναντία τοῖς ἐκεῖθεν λόγοις ἐπιτηδεύσαντος, ἱστορεῖ καὶ Τίμων ὁ Φλιάσιος ἐν τοῖς Σίλλοις οὕτως·

Εἰπόντ', ἀεὶ δὲ γηρᾷ μᾶλλον ἀνακύπτει.

Quid autem de Heracleote Dionyſio attinet dicere? Aperte quidem & palàm virtutis exuta veſte, cùm indumentum mutaſſe & alienum ſumpſiſſe criminarentur, gaudebat, quamvis jam natu grandis à Stoicorum ſchola defeciſſet, & tranſiviſſet ad Epicurum. De illo non invenuſte Timon ſcripſit:

Ille voluptati ſe tradit jam moriturus.
Tempus amandi, tempus habendæ conjugis, et quod
Rebus ab his tandem moneat deſiſtere tempus.

I add, that Lucian obſerves, that Dionyſius was a very ſober Man, (e) when he quitted the Stoicks. I dare not affirm with Mr. Menage (i) that he had been in Aſia in Alexander's Retinue, and had danced to the Sound of a Flute at this Conqueror's Nuptials. Athenæus indeed ſays this of one Dionyſius Heracleotes, but how many People of the ſame Name doth he mention, without any Mark of diſtinction?

(i) In Laert. l. 7. p. 334.

(C) A perplexing Objection.] Antiochus was the Man that made this Objection; he had embrac'd a Sect, which admitted no Science, that is no Propoſition certainly true, and afterwards he forſook that Party, when he had for a long time maintained Incomprehenſibilty, and written ſubtilly for that Cauſe. Scripſit de his rebus acutiſſimè, & idem hoc acrius accuſavit in ſenectute quàm antea defenſitaverat. Quamvis igitur fuerit acutus, ut fuit, tamen inconſtantia elevatur autoritas. Quia, inquam, etiam iſte dies illuxerit, quæro, qui illi offenderit eam quam multos annos eſſe negaviſſet veri & falſi notam (f)? Now whilſt he was oppoſing Certainty, he cruelly teazed our Dionyſius; You believed a long time, ſaid he, that there was no other Good but Virtue; afterwards you maintained, that Virtus was a vain Name, and that the ſupream Good conſiſts in Pleaſure. You ought therefore to believe, that Falſhood preſents it ſelf to our Minds, and ſtamps it ſelf with the ſame Character, that Truth appears in, and conſequently, that Character which is the Mark of true and falſe, upon which you ground your ſelf in affirming or denying, is fallacious, and deluſive. All the force of this Objection lay in this, that Dionyſius had ſucceſſively maintain'd two contradictory Propoſitions. Antiochus experienc'd the Force of his own Objection, when he changed his Opinion; for he was beaten with the ſame Weapons, that he had imploy'd againſt Dionyſius. Read Cicero's Words; (g) Quoque ſolebat uti argumento tum, cùm ei placebat, nihil poſſe percipi, cùm quæreret, Dionyſius ille Heracleotes, utrùm comprehendiſſet certa illa nota qua aſſentiri dictis oportere, illudne, quod multos annos tenuiſſet, Zenonique magiſtro credidiſſet, honeſtum quod eſſet, id bonum ſolum eſſe; an quod poſtea defenſitaviſſet, honeſti inane nomen eſſe, voluptatem eſſe ſummum bonum: qui ex illius commutata ſententia docere vellet, nihil ita ſignari in animis noſtris à vero poſſe, quod non eodem modo poſſit à falſo, is curavit, quod argumentum ex Dionyſio ipſe ſumpſiſſet, ex eo cæteri ſumerent. This Objection may perplex thoſe modern Proteſtants, who maintain, that the Truths of the Goſpel enter not into their Minds by the way of Evidence, but by the way of Senſe. What will they ſay, if we ſhew them ſome Chriſtians that change their Religion, and like our Dionyſius, for a long time violently eſpouſe the ſame Opinions, which afterwards they reject with an equal Zeal? They may be aſkt, whether the Senſe of Falſhood does not imprint it ſelf on the Soul, with all the ſame Characters as the ſence of Truth?

HERACLIUS, Patriarch of Jeruſalem, in the XIIth. Century, was the maker of his own Fortune. He was born in Auvergne, without Fortune or Friends, and yet he was promoted to the Archbiſhoprick of Cæſarea, and afterwards to the Patriarchate of Jeruſalem. His good Meen and Addreſs gave him Admiſſion into the ſtricteſt Intimacy of the King's Mother; ſo that the Oppoſitions of the Archbiſhop of Tyre, proved vain, though he grounded them (A) upon Prophecies. In vain he proteſted againſt the Election of Heraclius, in vain he appealed to the Pope, and even went to Rome, in order to get it declared void: He had not time (AΔ) to determine that Affair. Heraclius cauſed him to be poiſoned, and afterwards going to Rome, got his Election confirm'd by the Pope. He ſucceeded the Patriarch Almeric, who died in the Year 1180. He led a very ſcandalous Life with a Merchant's Wife of Napoli in Syria, whom he brought to Jeruſalem after the Death of her Huſband *. You will ſee below (B) ſome Circumſtances of it. We muſt not diſtinguiſh him from that

* See, Hiſtoire de la conquête du Roiaume de Jeruſalem par Saladin, Printed at Paris in 1679.

Heraclides honeſtly took this Work for Sophocles's Production, and cited it as ſuch in one of his Books. Then Dionyſius diſcovered to him the Trick, and Heraclides would not believe him; he maintain'd, that it was Sophocles's Work; and even when Dionyſius ſent him his Manuſcript, he perſiſted in his Opinion, and pretended, that Chance might cauſe two Poets wits to jump (c). So ungrateful it is to an Author to acknowledge himſelf caught in that manner. Scaliger being deceived the ſame way by Turrer, was not ſo obſtinate, but he was very much vext at it.

(c) Diog. Laert. lib. 5. n. 92. 93.

(E) His laſcivious deſires accompanied him.] Upon a great Feſtival, which he celebrated as agreeably as he could, he ſent for a Courteſan, that nothing might be wanting to the Pleaſures of the Day; but Age had ſo ſubdued him, that he could do no Exploits. He confeſt his Infirmity in the Words which Homer (d) puts in the Mouth of one of Penelope's Gallants, who not being able to bend Ulyſſes's Bow, cryed out, Let another take it, I am not able to do it (e). Dionyſius in like manner declar'd, that ſince his Strength failed him, another ſhould make uſe of the Courteſan. (f) Φησὶ τὸν Διονύσιον τῆς οἰκέτας συνεστάλθαι, ἐν τῇ ἡλικίᾳ χρόνῳ ἐφ' ᾧ μὴ δυνάμενον διὰ γῆρας χρῆσθαι ἢ παρελόμενον ἑταίρᾳ, γυναικὶ λαβεῖν πρὸς τοὺς συνδειπνοῦντας, ΟΤ δύναμαι τανύσαι, λαβέτω δ' ὅς κ' ἄλλος. *Tradit Dionyſium cum domeſticis, diebus feſtis conjugum, feriis illas agentem, cum ob ſenectutem meretrice quam adduxerant uti non poſſet, ad convivas facie verſa, dixiſſe. (F) Mr. Moreri is groſly miſtaken.] I. He ſays, that Dionyſius of Heraclea——having quitted the School of Zeno, followed the Cynicks. He ſhould have ſaid Cyrenaicks, whoſe Sect was extreamly different from that of the Cynicks. We may judge of it, from the oppoſite Characters, which were found betwixt Ariſtippus and Diogenes. There is not at the bottom any great Difference betwixt Diogenes Laertius, who liſts our Dionyſius in the Camp of the Cyrenaicks, and Athenæus, who enrolls him in the Sect of Epicurus; for tho' Epicurus gave a more virtuous Explication of the Word Pleaſure, he agreed with the Cyrenaicks, that the laſt end of Men, the ſupreme Good, the Happineſs of Man was Pleaſure. II. Theſe Words, he did not ſcruple——to do publickly, what might give him ſome Pleaſure, are a conſequence of his firſt Fault, and a new Fault. If Dionyſius had embrac'd Cyniciſm, he would not have been aſhamed to have debauch'd a Woman in the middle of the Streets; but as he only entred into the School of Ariſtippus, a Pleaſant Debauchee, and a polite Libertine, who underſtood himſelf admirable well, and that the Cyrenaicks, who gave Nature all it deſired, had not however adopted the Impudence of the Cynicks, it is wrong to pretend, that he had no more reſpect than Diogenes for the Eyes of his Neighbours. I confeſs he was willing to be ſeen to enter into the publick Stews, and to have it known, that he had been with Proſtitutes (g); but every Body knows, that this doth not ſignify the knowing a Woman publickly, and in the Sight of Paſſengers, as was the practice of the Cynicks. III. Our Philoſopher's deſerting from the Stoicks, could not be more confeſſedly repreſented, than Moreri has done it. Dionyſius, ſaith he, being exceſſively tormented with a Pain in his Eyes, would never ſay that Pain was indifferent, Is this a Faithful Deſcription of the Change of this Philoſopher? Is not one tempted to fancy here a Man that is put upon the Rack, to make him ſay, that Pain is indifferent, and who obſtinately perſiſts not to confeſs it? See in the Paſſages of Cicero, above quoted, the Genuine State of this Adventure. IV. He ſhould not have taken from Dionyſius Ten Years of his Life; it was at the Age of 80, and not of 70, that he ſuffered himſelf to die with Hunger.

(A) Though he grounded them upon Prophecies.] He ſaid, that the Prophecies foretold, that as the Croſs was conquered by one Heraclius, it ſhould be loſt under another (i). I believe he would have ſpoke more agreably to Hiſtory, if he had ſaid, that as the Infidels had taken the Croſs under one Heraclius, they ſhould retake it under another Heraclius. I know the Emperor Heraclius recovered, by a Treaty of Peace, the Croſs which the Perſians had carried off; but can this be called a Conquering of the Croſs?

(AΔ) He had not time to determine that Affair.] I have found this in a Preface, that James Bongars has plac'd before the Geſta Dei per Francos. He tells us, that William Archbiſhop of Tyre, the ſame that has written the Hiſtory of thoſe Times, made a vain Remonſtrance to the Canons of the Holy Sepulchre, againſt their Nomination of Heraclius to the Patriarchate of Jeruſalem. He alledged to them the above-mention'd Prophecy; and that they might not think that he aſpired to the vacant Dignity, he conjur'd them neither to nominate Heraclius nor himſelf. Nevertheleſs, they were the two that were nominated. The King, according to the Promiſes he had made to his Mother, made choice of Heraclius: The latter immediately publiſh'd his Mandate, commanding Obedience from the Archbiſhops and Biſhops, depending on the Patriarchate of Jeruſalem. Which none excepted againſt but the Archbiſhop of Tyre. He appeal'd to the Pope, and undertook to ſhew, that Heraclius was not worthy of the Patriarchate. He immediately ſet out for Rome, and was very well received there, and put things on ſuch a Foot, that the Depoſition of Heraclius was look'd upon as unavoidable; but the new Patriarch prevented the Blow, by corrupting a Phyſician, who poiſoned William. He afterwards made a Voyage to Rome, and obtained his Point of the Pope. Bongars found this only in French Authors.

(B) Some Circumſtances of it.] The Hiſtory of the Conqueſt of Jeruſalem, which I have cited, was publiſh'd at Paris in the Year 1679. The Publiſher had taken it from an old Manuſcript which Mr. Cabart de Villemont had given him. Theſe Words are to be ſeen in it: The Patriarch kept her (a) openly, as if ſhe had been his Wife, only ſhe did not live with him, and when the Patriarch went to the Miniſter, ſhe was as magnificently dreſs'd, as if ſhe had been an Empreſs or a Queen; and when any Body, who did not know her, asked who was that Lady; thoſe that knew her, anſwered, that ſhe was the Patriarcheſs, the Patriarch's Wife. Her Name was, Patque de Riveri, and ſhe had many Children, by the Patriarch. There goes a Story, that this Patriarch being in Council about important Affairs, a Madman entring into the Room, ran to him and told him, my Lord Patriarch, get a good Reward ready for me; for I bring

Bongars (c) relates in Latin, the ſame Hiſtory, and more at large; for he ſays that the French Author who reports it, obſerves, that that Conduct of the Patriarch ſerved as a Model for others, and that the Prieſts, the Clerks, and the Monks were ſo addicted to Lewdneſs and Adultery, that there was ſcarce an honeſt Woman in Jeruſalem, and that Jeſus Chriſt ſeeing theſe Impurities in a City, where he had ſhed his Blood for the Redemption of his People, would no more ſuffer them, than thoſe of Sodom and Gomorrah; wherefore, he ſo well purged it of that abominable filth, that of all thoſe who lived there in the time of Heraclius, there were only two Perſons, who eſcaped the Chains, when that City was taken by Saladin. The ſame Bongars alledges Marinus Sanutus, and Paulus Æmilius, the firſt (d) whereof ſays that the People call'd Heraclius's Concubine Patriarcheſs; and the other aſſures us, that this atriarch and his Clergy led a diſorderly Life. (C) Who expreſt ſo much Paſſion againſt Henry II. King of England.] ‘ That Prince (f) to expiate the ‘ Crime he had Committed by giving occaſion to the ‘ Aſſaſſins of St. Thomas Archbiſhop of Canterbury, ‘ to Murder him in his own Church, had accepted a ‘ Penance from the Pope, by which he was obliged ‘ to bring in Perſon in three Years time a conſidera- ‘ ble Succour to the Holy-Land. More than ten ‘ were paſt after the time expired, and yet he had ‘ not put himſelf in a Capacity to accompliſh his ‘ Promiſe. This made Heraclius hope for a good Succeſs in his Negotiation. He made a Diſcourſe (g) extreamly Pathetical to this Monarch after he had preſented to him the Keys of Jeruſalem and of the Holy Sepulcher. He was told that he ſhould be ſoon ſatisfied, but the King broke his word with him. Henry conſulted his Clergy, to know whether in the preſent poſture of Affairs, he was obliged to make good his Promiſe, and to accompliſh that part of the Penance which the Pope had laid on him, and to which he had Solemnly obliged himſelf (h). The Patriarch Heraclius was preſent at the Aſſembly where this caſe of Conſcience was examined. (i) All the Biſhops and Abbots ..... concluded unanimouſly ..... that not only the King was not at preſent obliged to make a Voyage into Paleſtine, but that he would do much better for the Salvation of his Soul to remain in his own Dominions; becauſe the promiſe he had made in accepting of the Penance, which might and ought to have been deſpenſ'd with, could not prejudice that which is abſolutely indiſpenſable, and which he made at his Coronation, to govern his Subjects well, and to defend them from the Inſults of Domeſtick and Foreign Enemies; which could not be done in his Abſence in the condition Affairs were in. They all unanimouſly added with the Lords, that as to one of the King's Sons, who was demanded in his ſtead, the Aſſembly could determine nothing thereupon, ſince they were abſent, and the reſolution they were to take, depended upon them. The Patriarch (k) who was a Man of a violent Temper, was ſo provok'd at that Reſolution, that he had like to have ſpoiled all by loſing altogether the reſpect which was due to the King, and treating him in a manner which cannot at all be excuſed, whatever attempt he made to cover it with the Name and falſe appearance of Zeal. He anſwered the King, who offered 50 thouſand Marks of Silver for that War (l). ‘ That they had no occaſion for ‘ his Money but for him; that they had more Gold ‘ and Silver than they deſired, and that they did ‘ not come ſo far but to find out a Man, who had ‘ need of Money to make an advantageous War a- ‘ gainſt the Infidels, and not to look for Money which ‘ wanted a Man ſkill'd in the Art of uſing it well ‘ in that War. For the reſt, added he, ſpeaking in a very affronting manner, you have Reigned hither- ‘ to with great Glory; but know that God whoſe ‘ Cauſe you have forſaken, will immediately forſake ‘ you. To be ſatisfied of it, you need only compare ‘ the Benefits you have received from him with the ‘ Enormous Crimes with which you have repaid him ‘ out of a horrid Ingratitude. You have violated the ‘ Faith, which you owe to the King of France your ‘ Sovereign, and now you alledge the War, which ‘ you fear he will bring upon you as a pretence for ‘ your refuſal. You have cauſed the Holy Arch- ‘ biſhop of Canterbury to be Barbarouſly Maſſacred, ‘ and you refuſe at preſent to go to the Defence of ‘ the Holy-Land, after having Solemnly engag'd in ‘ it by the Sacrament. And when he ſaw the King ſtruck with Indignation and Anger, Do ‘ not believe, continued he thruſting out his Neck, ‘ that I am afraid of the effects of that Fury, which ‘ the truth I ſpeak, and you cannot bear, kindles in ‘ your Soul. Take hold of my Head here; treat me ‘ as you have done St. Thomas: I could as ſoon Die ‘ by your Hands in England as by thoſe of the Sa- ‘ racens in Syria: And indeed you are little better ‘ than a Saracen (m). The King bore patiently all this Diſcourſe, and continued to treat the Patriarch very Civilly, even to the Conducting him in his own Ship to Rouen, from whence ‘ he carried him ‘ to the Frontiers, to the end he might be Witneſs ‘ of the Conference he had there for three Days with ‘ King Philip, upon the Subject of the Holy War ‘ (n). Heraclius went away without obtaining his ‘ Deſires, and even without the Aſſiſtance that was ‘ offered him, which his Paſſion made him foolihly ‘ flight againſt all the Rules of Prudence and good ‘ Sence, and to the great Prejudice of the Affairs of ‘ his Maſter: ſo much it is requiſite that Kings ſhould ‘ not abandon their Intereſts to the Diſcretion of ‘ thoſe who have hardly any, and whom frequently ‘ the violent Paſſions that govern them, deprive of ‘ the little that they have.

HERCULES. There have been many (B) Heroes of this Name; but he of Thebes has been the moſt Famous, becauſe the Greeks aſcrib'd to him the Actions of others, and Talk'd very much of him according to the fabulous Genius of their Nation. I pretend only to ſpeak of him. He paſt for the Son of Jupiter and Alcmena. I have laid in another place † how this Lady was deceived by this God, and I will not repeat it here, nor what is to be found in Moreri. Our Hercules had a prodigious Strength both in the Wars of Mars and (B) Venus. He was alſo a great Eater. (C) I will mention ſervationes ad jus Atticum & Romanum, about Four Years ſince. Monſieur Herault who was offended with that Book, was writing an Anſwer to it in Folio; but Death having ſurprized him, I think it muſt be ſold, ſuch as it is, and an end muſt be put to it where the Author found his own. He ſeemed to be about 70 Years of Age——. He had the Reputation of a very Learned Man, as well in the Civil Law, as in Literature, and he wrote very eaſily upon what Subject he pleas'd. I learn from a Letter of Sarravius (a) that after 27 Years Silence, Heraldus having reviſed his Papers at the Inſtance of his Friends, was ready to publiſh his Book de autoritate rerum judicatarum. What he had prepared againſt Salmaſius was printed in the Year 1650; 'tis a Folio, entituled Quæſtiones quotidianæ, & obſervationes ad jus Atticum & Romanum. There are Two Books in the Catalogue of the Bodleian Library, aſcrib'd to Hier. Herbarius, which certainly were miſplac'd by the Printers; they ought to have been a little higher under Deſiderius Heraldus. Theſe are the Titles of them, De rerum judicatarum autoritate Libri II. at Paris, 1640. Obſervationum & Emendationum Liber unus, ibid.

(A) There have been many Heroes of this Name.] Cicero reckons Six of them, (c) Quamquam quem potiſſimum Herculem colamus ſcire ſane velim, plures enim tradunt nobis ii qui interiores ſcrutantur & reconditas Litteras: antiquiſſimum Jove natum, ſed item Jove antiquiſſimo; nam Joves quoque plures in priſcis Græcorum literis invenimus. Ex eo igitur & Lyſito eſt is Hercules quem concertaviſſe cum Apolline de tripode accepimus. Alter traditur Nilo natus Ægyptius, quem aiunt Phrygias literas conſcripſiſſe. Tertius eſt ex Idaïs Dactylis, cui inferias afferunt. Quartus Jovis eſt, & Aſteria Latonæ ſororis, quem Tyrii maximè colunt, cujus Carthaginem filiam ferunt. Quintus in India, qui Belus dicitur. Sextus hic ex Alcumena, quem Jupiter genuit; ſed tertius Jupiter: quoniam, ut jam docebo, plures Joves etiam accepimus. According to this Account the Ægyptian Hercules was only the third; but the Ægyptians give (f) him the firſt place. Diodorus Siculus (g), who mentions but three Hercules's, gives the Ægyptian the Birth-right, and confeſſes, that the conformity of Name and Inclinations has been the reaſon, that the Actions of the others have been aſcrib'd to the Theban Hercules, who was the youngeſt of them all. 'Tis ſaid that Varro has reckoned up 44 Hercules's.

(B) In the Wars of——Venus.] Some ſay (h) that in ſeven Days he deflower'd Fifty Daughters of Theſtius; others (i) will allow but one Night for it, and add, that he impregnated them all with Boys, and that two of them, the Oldeſt and the Youngeſt, brought him two Sons a piece. According to ſome (k) the Youngeſt would never conſent to the loſs of her Virginity, and for her Puniſhment he Condemned her to keep it for her Life, and ordered her to ſerve him as a Prieſteſs. Thus you ſee the reaſon why the Temple of Hercules at Theſpis was ſerved by a Prieſteſs who was obliged to remain a Maid as long as ſhe Lived (l). Pauſanias could not perſwade himſelf that Hercules could be ſo much Enraged againſt the Daughter of his good Friend (m): He therefore look'd upon the Penalty, which Hercules had laid upon her as a very ſevere Puniſhment. What he ſays of Theſtius's Friendſhip for Hercules, agrees very well with what we read in Diodorus Siculus (n), that Theſtius (o) being deſirous that his Daughters might give him a Poſterity whereof Hercules ſhould be the Father, invited him to a noble Feaſt, and entertained him Magnificently, after which he ſent him his Fifty Daughters one after another. Vigenere has pleaſantly ſaid (p) that it was the ſtouteſt Battle that Hercules was ever engaged in in all his Life. And yet the Antients have not placed this in the Catalogue of his Labours. It has been ob-in one Country, and ſometimes in another, and becauſe he loved the Fair Sex, he had diſperſed ſome Women in the ſeveral Provinces of the World, that he might every where find ſuch that he might diſpoſe of. Lactantius was not in the wrong for Laughing at the Pagans, who placed in the number of the Gods a Man who had left every where ſome Marks of his Incontinence: (q) Hercules——nonne orbem terræ quem peragraſſe ac purgaſſe narrantur, ſtupris, libidinibus, adulteriis inquinavit? nec mirum, cum eſſet adulterio genitus Alcmena. Quid tandem potuit in eo eſſe divini, qui ſuis ipſe vitiis mancipatus & mares, & fœminas, contra omnes leges infamia, dedecore, flagitio afficit? Arnobius very agreeably Ridicules the Pagans for making nine Nights neceſſary to Jupiter to get a Child, and allowing but one to Hercules to get Fifty. (r) Quis illum (Jovem) in Alcmena novem noctibus fecit pervigilaſſe continuis? non vos? ——Et ſane adjungatis beneficia non parva, ſiquidem vobis Deus Hercules natus eſt, qui in rebus hujuſmodi patris ſui, anteiret antevaretque virtutes. Ille noctibus vix novem unam potuit prolem extundere, concumbere, compingere: at Hercules ſanctus Deus natas quinquaginta de Theſtio nocte una perdocuit & nomen virginitatis exponere, & genitricum pondera ſuſtinere. Note that Theſtius was amaz'd at that vigour of Hercules. (C) He was alſo a great Eater.] He gloried to Eat more than others, and he was extreamly troubled to find a Man that could match him in that Point. He (t) diſputed the Prize of Voracity with one Lepreus, and did not get the Victory. They each of them Sacrificed an Ox, and if Hercules Eat all his at one Meal, his Antagoniſt was no leſs Expeditious nor Vigorous upon his Victim. Lepreus ſhould have ſtopt there, but he was ſo Audacious, as to provoke Hercules to another ſort of Combat, to a Duel, wherein he was Kill'd. I ſpeak more fully of this Diſpute at the end of this Remark. Here is another Story. Hercules (a) Travelling with his Wife and his little Son Hyllus, and ſeeing the little Boy diſtreſſed with Hunger, applied himſelf to a Labourer for ſome Food for him; but obtaining nothing he unyok'd one of the Oxen from his Plough, and Sacrificed him to the Gods and Eat him. That canine Hunger did not leave him even in Heaven; hence it is that Callimachus exhorts Diana not to take Hares, but Wild Boars and Bulls, becauſe Hercules retained the Quality of a great Eater amongſt the Gods which he had amongſt Men.

mention ſome Circumſtances of it that are very ſingular, as alſo of his being a great (D) Drinker; in which he did not leſs excel. He ſhewed his Voracity upon an occaſion that gave riſe to an extraordinary Ceremony, which was to offer him (E) Affronts and Curſes during the Sacrifices made to him by the Lindians. Some upon conſideration of his inclination to Wine and Women, have deny'd him thoſe great Archievements (F) which are aſcribed to him. There is one very particular thing ſaid concerning his greedy way of Eating; for 'tis pretended he moved his Ears *: that Phænomenon is Lepreus Challenged Hercules to a Tryal of Gluttony and was worſted. (a) Κλεόδαρος δέ φησιν ὁ Ἡρακλεώτης ἐν τοῖς περὶ τὸν Ἡρακλέα λεγομένοις ἱστορεῖν ἐπὶ λέπρεα παραγενέσθαι, καὶ πυθέσθαι. Inducitur Hercules de voracitate cum Lepreo certans qui eum provocaverat, in qua contentione Hercules victor evaſit. Zenodotus gives an Account, that Hercules had put in Chains Lepreus the Grand-Son of Neptune, after he had cleanſed Augeas's Stable; he ſet him at Liberty when he had finiſhed his Labours, at which time he had three Diſputes with him. One was that they plaid at Quoits, another who ſhould Pump Water beſt, and a third who could Eat up an Ox ſooneſt, in all which Hercules had the Victory. At laſt Lepreus being Drunk Challenged Hercules afreſh, and was Kill'd. Others (b) ſay they did not Diſpute who ſhould Eat moſt, but who ſhould Drink moſt, and that Hercules had the better of it. Others pretend (c) that the Diſpute was, both who ſhould Eat up an Ox ſooneſt, and who ſhould Drink moſt. I will add ſome other Facts in the Note H.

(D) A great Drinker.] To be convinced of it we need only conſider the prodigious Capacity of his Goblet, which required two Men to carry it; but as for himſelf he only needed one Hand to lift it up and Drink it off.

Huic (d) pretium palmæ gemini cratera ferebant

It appears by the Hiſtory of Alexander, that in Feaſts where there was extraordinary Drinking they drank round in a great Cup, which was called the Cup of Hercules. It was reſerved for the laſt, as we may infer from Alexander's not having (e) yet Drank it, when he fell Sick at Table at an Entertainment where he had already drank a great deal. Others ſay, he did drink it, and that it was his fatal Cup. Alexandrum ..... intemperantia bibendi atque ille Herculeanus & fatalis ſcyphus condidit (f). Diodorus Siculus (g) tells us that Alexander having already drunk much, took off at laſt Hercules's Bowl, and immediately fell into a Swoon. To reconcile theſe Differences, I believe, we muſt ſuppoſe this Prince was ſtruck as he was Drinking this Cup, and before he had made an end of it. This Hiſtorian obſerves the extraordinary Bigneſs of this Herculean Cup. But what can be alledged more deciſive hereupon than the words of Macrobius? (h) Scyphus Herculis poculum eſt ita ut Liberi patris cantharus: Herculem vero fictores veteres non ſine cauſa cum poculo fecerunt & nonnunquam cafabundum & ebrium, non ſolum quod is heros vinose fuiſſe perhibetur, ſed etiam quod antiqua Hiſtoria eſt Herculem poculo cunctam navigio ventis immenſa maria tranſviſſe. Sed de utraque re pauca ex Græcis antiquitatibus dicam, multibibum Heroa iſtum fuiſſe, ut taceam quæ vulgo nota ſunt, illud non obſcurum argumentum eſt, quod Ephippus in Buſiride induxit Herculem ſic loquentem, &c. Athenæus ſeems to point out to us the Capacity of this Cup, for he ſays, that that (i) which was the cauſe of Alexander's Death, contained two Congius's. The Poet Steſichorus can teach us a very notable Particular. He ſays that Pholus drank a Health to Hercules in a Pitcher that held 48 Gallons. (k) Centaurorum & Lapithorum convivium deſcribens (Steſichorus) ait Pholum (quem propterea hoſpitem Alcidæ nuncupat Lucanus) impleviſſe Herculi craterem trium lagenarum capacem, quem prior ipſe obbibiſſet: amplum autem fuiſſe oportuit, qui urnam, hoc eſt quatuor, & viginti ſextarios caperet. He drank it off firſt, and was immediately Pledg'd by Hercules.

Hercules (de eo enim loquitur) acceptum in manus ſcyphum plenum, trium lagenarum capacem, ori admovens obbibit, quem Pholus ipſe infuderat. Athenæus explains in a very probable manner, why the Poets have feigned Hercules to have croſt the Seas in a Drinking-Bowl. That Fiction, ſays he, (f) is in all likelihood founded upon the Pleaſure this Heroe took in Drinking in great Glaſſes; for he was one of the beſt Drinkers: (g) Ὅτι δὲ καὶ ὁ Ἡρακλῆς ἐν μεγάλοις ἔπινε ποτηρίοις. Bibacem inter alios Herculem fuiſſe antea nos memoravimus.

(E) Which was to offer him Affronts during the Sacrifices.] I have told above, that Hercules Eat an Ox that he took from a Country Fellow; but I add here, that as he was Eating it, the Clown pour'd out a thouſand Curſes againſt him, which was only a Diverſion to Hercules: So that when an Altar was built to him he choſe this Country-man for his Prieſt, and commanded him to repeat the ſame Curſes as often as he offered Sacrifices; for ſaid he, I never Eat with a better Stomach. Lactantius tells the Story at large: Apud Lindum, quod eſt oppidum Rhodi, Hercules ſacra ſunt, quorum à cæteris longe diverſus eſt ritus. Si quidem non, ἱερεῖα, ut Græci appellant, ſed maledictis & execratione celebrantur; eaque pro victimis habent, ſi quando inter ſolemnes ritus vel imprudenti alicui excident bonum verbum. Cujus rei hæc ratio redditur, ſi tamen ulla eſſe ratio in rebus vaniſſimis poteſt. Hercules, cum eo delatus eſſet, famemque pateretur, aratorem quendam aſpexit operantem, ab eoque petere cœpit, ut ſibi unum bovem venderet. Ille negavit fieri poſſe, quia ſpes ſua omnis colendæ terræ duobus illis jumentis niteretur. Herculis ſolita violentia uſus, quia unum accipere non potuit, utrumque ſuſtulit. At ille infelix, cum boves ſuos mactari videret, injuriam ſuam maledictis ultus eſt, quod hominis eleganti & urbano gratiſſimum fuit. Nam dum comitibus ſuis epulas apparat, dumque alienos boves devorat, illum ſibi amariſſime convicientem, cum riſu, & cachinnis audiebat. Sed poſtquam Herculi divinos honores ob admirationem virtutis deferri placuit, à civibus ei ara poſita eſt, quam de facto βουθυσίαν, id eſt bovis jugum nominavit; ad quam duo juncti boves immolarentur, ſicut illi, quos abſtulerat aratori, eumque ipſum ſibi conſtituit Sacerdotem, ac præcepit, ut iiſdem maledictis ſemper in celebrandis ſacrificiis uteretur, quod negaret, ſe unquam epulatum eſſe jucundius (r).

(F) Have denied thoſe great Archievements.] Megachides in Athenæus cenſures the Poets that came after Homer and Heſiod for making Hercules to command Armies and take Towns, when 'tis certain that (ſ) he was a Man that led a Voluptuous Life, having many Lawful Wives, and getting Children Clandeſtinely upon a great many Young Women; beſides he was addicted to good Eating and Drinking; ſo that according to his Example, they who made Libations to him, left nothing in the Glaſs, they Drank it all up. Other Proofs were brought (t) of his Effeminacy, and 'twas pretended that Steſichorus was the firſt that armed him with a Club, a Bow and a Lion's Skin. We find in Erasmus a Paſſage that violently ſhakes the Tradition of Hercules's Softneſs. 'Tis in the Explication of the Proverb (a). Take heed of a Man with a black Breech. Erasmus tells a Story, that a Mother gave this Advice to her two Boys, that were unlucky Rogues. They had a mind to attack Hercules Sleeping under a Tree, but he awak'd and tied them to his Club (b), and laid them over his Shoulders with their Heads downwards. That Poſture diſcovered to them, that

(O) Three Days in the Belly of a Whale.] I will make use of the Words of the Commentator upon Philostratus, to express that Adventure, and the Occasion of it. (b) 'The Gods having on a time 'conspired together to poison their Sovereign Jupiter, as he came to discover the Plot by Themis, 'he prevented them, and punished them, some one 'way, and some another. As for Neptune and Apollo, he sent them with spite to serve the Masons, 'who were building the Walls of Ilion; where 'being hired by Laodemon, after the Work was finished, he indeed recompenced Apollo with abundance of Sacrifices and Offerings, but he made no 'account of satisfying Neptune. Whereupon the 'God enraged, sent a horrible great Whale, which 'disgorging great Floods of Sea-Water upon the 'Country, drowned it all; and Laomedon was obliged by the Oracle's Advice to deliver himself 'from this Calamity, by exposing his Daughter Hesione, adorned with Royal Robes, as a Prey to be 'devoured by this Monster. Hercules passing by 'chance that way, moved with Compassion, offered 'the Father to deliver her, if he would give him 'the Horses that came of an immortal Race, 'which he had received of Jupiter, for Ganymede that was ravished and carried away by him to 'Heaven, to be made his Cup-Bearer. The Terms 'being agreed upon, Hercules armed Cap-a-pe, 'threw himself headlong into the Throat of this 'Monster; and descending from thence into his 'Belly, remain'd inclos'd there Three Days, hacking and hewing, till he had quite destroyed it. 'Laomedon afterwards not standing to his Articles, 'Hercules return'd to Troy with Six Ships, laden 'with Soldiers, and sack'd it: He put Laomedon 'to Death, and carried Hesione Captive, making a 'Present of her to Telamon, the Father of Ajax, 'for being the first that scal'd the Wall. Vigenere quotes no Body. To supply that Defect, I will set down a Passage of Tzetzes, which (c) Mr. Dreilincourt has communicated to me. (d) Τρισσαις, φησι τοις Ηρακλειδαις δια το ιδ' τῳ κητει ορθος παυσας εαυτον δια δε τουτου παλιν Ανδρομεδαν δια το αφ' ετερου σκοπουντι εαυτον γενεσθαι. The Scholiast upon Homer (e) relates most of the Things that I have cited from Philostratus's Commentator, and tells us this Story was in Hellanicus. Hercules did not come out the same way he writ in; he came out thro' the Breach, I mean thro' the Belly of the Whale. I have not been able to verify whether Natalis Comes has well related what he cites from Androetas of Tenedos concerning the Loss of Hercules's Hair: (f) Ubi vero cetus accessisset hians in ejus os Hercules irruit, ubi cum per triduum fuisset, ceto discupto exiit omnibus amissis capillis capitis, ut scriptum reliquit Androetas Tenedius (g) in navigatione Propontidis. Lycophron plainly intimates, that it was the Heat of the Whale's Belly, which made Hercule's Hair fall off (h).

(P) He was adopted by Juno; but 'tis said that he refus'd, &c.] Juno, who had persecuted him so much whilst alive, found her self disposed to love him when he was dead. Which verifies these Verses of Horace;

(i) Divam qui condidit Hydram,
Nonne & fatali portenta labore subegit,
Comptaque Junonis fastidia supremo fine domarit.

Here is what we are told by Diodorus Siculus. After Hercules was received in the Number of the Gods, he was [illegible] Juno, who lov'd him afterwards [illegible]. The Ceremony of the Adoption was [illegible] went to Bed, and to imitate a true Childbirth, she placed Hercules in such a manner, that he fell to the Ground from under her Petticoats. The Barbarians still observ'd that Ceremony in their Adoptions in Diodorus Siculus's time. Hercules was afterwards married to Hebe; but he refused the Honour which Jupiter would have done him of associating himself in the College of the twelve Great Gods, and he justified his refusal by this Reason, that there being no place vacant in that College, he ought not to be admitted into it, and that it would be very unreasonable to degrade any other God to make room for him (k). Juno had for a long time begun to act as a Mother with respect to Hercules, but it was without knowing him. The matter of Fact was this. Alcmena fearing the the Jealousie of this Goddess, durst not own her self the Mother of Hercules, but expos'd him in the middle of a Field, assoon as he was born. Minerva beheld the Infant with Admiration, she advised Juno to give him Suck, Juno did it; but the Infant prest her Nipple so strongly, as gave her an intolerable Pain, and she left him there. Hereupon Minerva took him, and carried him to Alcmena, as to a Nurse, to which she recommended him (l). Here one might make a Parallel betwixt Moses and Hercules.

(Q) We must say something of Hercules of Gaul.] A modern Author (m) has imitated the Greeks, by refuting them. He has transferred to this Hercules almost all the Actions of the others, and has left nothing to the Grecian but moral Conquests, that is to say, Triumphs over his Passions. According to him, Hercules of Gaul built (n) in Gaul, the City of Alise; he was attack'd by Albion, King of Great Britain, and by Bergiona, both of them Sons of Neptune. He defeated them in Provence, by the Succours he received from his Father, who seeing (o) the Army of his Son unprovided with Arrows, discharged upon his Enemies a Shower of Stones, which overwhelmed them. (p) In quo (lapideo campo) Herculem contra Albionem & Bergiona Neptum liberos dimicantem cum tela defecissent; ab invocato Jove adjutum imbre lapidum ferunt, credas pluisse, adeo multi passim, & late jacent. He was (q) the first of the Gauls, who penetrated into Italy thro' the Alps. 'He rendred Ombria habitable, having 'made the River Arno of its Marshes. He conducted some Colonies of Gauls beyond the Pyrenees, 'where Gerion King of Spain was conquered—— 'He died in that Spanish Expedition, and was honoured with a Stately Temple, dedicated to him by 'the Tyrians, in the City of Gades, where his 'Bones still remain'd in Pomponius Mela's Time (r), who assures us of it. (s) His Accoutrements were, 'a Quiver upon his Back, a Club in his Right Hand, 'a Bow in his Left, having the Face of an old 'Man, bald, wrinkled, swarthy, but venerable, 'drawing a Crowd of People after him that were 'fasten'd with little Chains of Gold and Silver, 'and though the Chains were extreamly little, 'none of these Captives endeavour'd to break them, 'but all on the contrary express'd by their Looks, that 'they would be sorry to be delivered from so soft a 'Vassalage, as being less conquered, by the force of 'Arms of this Gallick Hercules, than by his Elo'quence, which is the Description Lucian hath left 'us of him. This Description agrees but ill with what Mr. Menage has read somewhere (t), which is, that 'the old Gauls had a great Veneration for 'Hercules, because he was GREAT and STRONG, 'and expressing upon their turning Christians, that 'it would be one of their greatest Troubles not to 'see his Image any more, they were comforted by 'being told, that the Christians had a Saint, who for 'his Bulk and Strength was a Match for Six Hercules's.

Mr. Audigier applies the best he can to his Hypothesis, a Story of Diodorus Siculus. 'Tis this, that a Daughter of the King of the Celtæ, proud of her extraordinary Stature, and great Beauty, despised all that pretended to marry her; but when she had seen Hercules, she was seized with a strong Desire to have to do with him by her Father's Consent. Her Passion was gratify'd: Hercules got a Son on her, nam'd Galates (v). The Historian doth not tell her Name; but others say, it was Galate

One of the most famous Athenian Orators observes that Writers were extreamly fond of Celebrating the Combats and Courage of Hercules, but made no mention of his other Qualities, which might yet have afforded them a very noble matter; He says, that that part of Hercules's greatness which they had so much neglected, required an excellent Orator, and that if he had thought of treating it in his Youth, he would have shewn that that Heroe excelled other Men, in Prudence, Knowledge, and Justice, still more than in strength of Body. Old Age, adds he, will not permit me to undertake his Panegyrick on that Subject: I find my self too weak to handle a Theme of that importance, that is so copious *. The Reflection of this Orator may put us in mind of the ill Taste of Man-kind (R). What this great Rhetorician has said of this Hero's Science, may be confirmed from Antiquity, which has acknowledged a most intimate Relation between † the Muses and Hercules. Whence he was Surnamed Musagetes, that is the Companion and Conductor of the Muses, and (S) these nine Goddesses were put under his Protection in the Temple, which Fulvius Nobilior caused to be Built to him. The thought which Posidonius made use of to Ri-

Galatea (a). This Story is otherwise told in the Erotica of Parthenius. There we find that Hercules, as he drove Gerion's Oxen from Erythia, went through Gaul, and came to Bretannus the Father of Celtina, who fell so much in Love with that Heroe, that having stole his Oxen she would not restore them but upon condition of his Lying with her. Hercules as well to recover his Oxen, as for the sake of Celtina's Beauty, agreed to it, and got her with Child of a Boy called Celtus, from which the Celta took their Name. Herodotus (b) tells us that Hercules being in Scythia lay on the Ground in his Lions Skin and fell asleep. When he awak'd he could not see his Mares; he sought 'em in all Parts; and when he came to the Country of Hylæa, he entered into a Cave where he found a Damsel who had a Human shape from her Head to her Waste, but downwards she had the form of a Serpent. He ask'd her whether she had seen his Mares? Yes, said she, I have them in my Custody, but I will not restore them unless you lie with me. He was glad to regain them at that Price, but when the sport was ended she delay'd as long as possible the Restitution of the Mares, for she Vehemently wish'd to begin it again. At last not being able to retain a Man any longer, who was desirous to be gone with his Mares, she said to him, I have kept them for you, and you have rewarded me for it; for you have gotten me with Child of three Boys. (c) Τὰς δὲ Φάσκε ἐκόντας ἔχειν, ἢ ἐκ ἀνιέναι μείνῃ πρὶν ἂ οἱ μιχθῆναι, τὸν δὲ Ἡρακλέα μιχθῆναι ἐπὶ τῷ μισθῷ τούτῳ, αἰτέοντα τὰς ἵππους· ἐπεὶ δὲ ὑπερβολὴν τὴν ἀνιέναι τῶν ἵππων, βουλόμενον ἤδη πλέον χρόνον συνεῖναι τῇ Ἡρακλεῖ. Illamque respondisse, se quidem illas habere, sed non prius redditura si quam cum ipsa coiisset: Herculem pro ea mercede cum fœmina concubuisse. Sed quum illa differret reddere equas, cupida diutissime cum Hercule concumbendi, &c.

Mr. Audigier pretends (d) that Jupiter Celtes, the Oldest of the Jupiters, was the Father of our Gallick Hercules, and that all the great Divinities of Greece (e) were first known in Gaul. This is a very strange pretention, but not so Chimerical as that of the Learned Rudbeck (f).

(R) May put us in Mind of the ill taste of Man-kind.] The Prudence, Philosophy (g), and Justice of Hercules were Qualities infinitely more valuable than the strength of his Arms; and yet the Orators and Poets praised him only for the Actions he performed by that strength; and they said nothing of the Perfections of his Soul. They used this Method as well because they themselves were more affected with a vain Lustre, than with Solidity, as because they were perswaded that their Auditors and Readers would applaude more passionately the Stories of Battles, than the Description of Virtues which are exercised in times of Peace. Horace has very well observed this in supposing that the Dead lent a favourable Ear to the Poesies of Sappho and Alcæus, but were more delighted with the latter, because they treated only of War (h), Revolutions of State, Banishments, &c.

Besides, it must be observ'd that Tyrants overcome, and Monsters subdu'd, and in a word times of Confusion and Slaughter are Subjects more proper to shew the Wit and Eloquence of a Writer, than is the Conduct of an uniform Life led according to the Rules of Virtue. A Historian who has no great events to describe, falls asleep over his Work, and makes his Readers Gape; but a Civil War, two or three Conspiracies, as many Battles, the same Leaders sometimes Humbled, sometimes Exalted, sharpen his Pen, warm his Imagination, and always keep his Readers in Breath. I really believe that if he were commanded to write a History of a quiet Reign, and all of a Piece, he would complain of his Fate much like Caligula who complained that in his Reign there did not happen any great Misfortunes. (k) Queri etiam palam de conditione temporum suorum solebat: quod nullis calamitatibus publicis insignirentur. Augusti principatum clade Variana: Tiberii, ruina spectaculorum apud Fidenas, memorabilem factum: sui oblivionem immissre prosperitate rerum. Atque identidem exercituum cædes, famem, pestilentiam, incendia, hiatum aliquem terræ optabat. Desolations, and publick Calamities are an advantage to an Historian, and give Lustre to his Writings. He pities, if he be a good Man, the great Vestal who was Buried alive; he abhors the Tyrant who to (l) make his Reign more remarkable, oppress her; but yet 'tis favourable Topick, and very advantageous to his Pen, and an ornament to his Book. His Work is a Vessel that never floats better than in a Storm; the Tempest is his best Gale: a Calm is as contrary to it as to a real Ship; And when an Historian can begin like Tacitus with (m) opus aggredior opimum casibus, atrox prœliis, discors seditionibus, ipsa etiam pace sævum. Quatuor Principes ferro interempti. Tria bella civilia, plura externa, ac plerumque permixta, he Prepossesses his Readers in his favour, and knows very well he has found an advantageous Subject. But after all, 'tis a Mark of a depraved taste to prefer an account of Warlike Actions before that of an Equitable Conduct; and to admire a Man more for the strength of his Arms and for his boldness, that give him the Victory over a Wild Boar or a Bull, than for his Virtue, that makes him Master of his Passions, and moves him to Establish a good Government amongst his Neighbours. That Virtue tho' it shines less than the other, participates much more of true Grandeur; there is more reality in the qualities of Hercules which Writers have past over in silence, than in those which they have so pompously Magnified. But they humour'd the publick. Note, that young People are more delighted with Romantick than real Histories, and that after Age has ripened and rectified our Judgment, we had rather read Thuanus and Mezerai, than la Calprenede and Scuderi. But few People lose the taste of their Childhood with respect to the description of a peaceable Reign, and to the History of one full of Troubles and great Events.

(S) These nine Goddesses were put under his Protection in the Temple.] This Temple was built by Fulvius Nobilior who Conquer'd the Ætolians in the year of Rome 565. He was then Consul. The Principal of their Cities was called Ambracia; he made himself master of it, and finding the Statues of the nine Muses, he convey'd them to Rome, and Consecrated them in the Temple which he had built to Hercules, and put them under that God's Protection. Ridicule a Paſſage of Æſchylus's Tragedies was not juſt; Strabo, who cenſured him, (T) did not know wherein the real fault of it lies. It concerns a certain ſhower of Stones, which fell in favour of Hercules when he was Fighting the Ligurians.

HERLICIUS (David) a Philoſopher, a Phyſician, and an Aſtrologer, was Born at Ceitz in Miſnia the 28th of December 1557. He ſtood in need of the Aſſiſtance of his Mother's Relations to ſubſiſt in his Studies; not being able to have a ſufficient ſupply from his Father. He learned to make Verſes and to Sing, and he gain'd (A) ſomething that way in ſeveral occaſions, when neceſſity oppreſt him. He ſtaid but little in the Univerſity of Wittemberg, becauſe Peucer, whoſe Lectures he principally deſired to hear, was Impriſoned. Not being able therefore to improve under ſo excellent a Profeſſor, he went from thence to Leipſick, and there he Studied with very good ſucceſs. He went afterwards to Roſtock where the Profeſſors permitted him to make private Lectures. He acquitted himſelf ſo well of that imployment that the Duke of Mecklenburg made him the Sub-principal of the College of Guſtrow. He continued in it two Years, and ſpent all the time he had to ſpare in the practice of Phyſick †, and in Calculating Nativities. He ſpent the two following Years at Primiſlaw * where he taught Natural Philoſophy, and afterwards in the Year 1583 he accepted a like Circumſtances, had not an Orator who lived five or ſix Ages after made mention of. His Words deſerve to be ſet down. (a) Eidem Herculis Muſarum in circo Flaminio Fulvius ille Nobilior ex pecunia Cenſoria fecit, non id modo ſecutus, quod ipſe litteris & ſumma Poetæ amicitia duceretur, ſed quod in Gracia cum eſſet imperator, acceperat Herculem Muſagetem eſſe, id eſt comitem ducemque Muſarum, idemque primus novem ſigna, hoc eſt omnium Camenarum, ex Ambracienſi oppido tranſlata, ſub tutela fortiſſimi numinis conſecravit, ut res eſt, quia mutuis operibus & præmiis juvari ornarique deberent: Muſarum quies defenſione Herculis & virtus Herculis voce Muſarum. This Orator has Reaſon for his ſaying that great Warriours and the Muſes ſtand in need of one another; the former are to procure Repoſe and Security to the Muſes, and the latter are reciprocally to immortalize the noble Actions of Heroes by their Songs. One might according to the notion of the ſame Orator, apply to our Hercules what has been ſaid, that (b) they who do noble Actions worthy to be Celebrated by the Poets, are lovers of Verſes. Obſerve that Statius ſuppoſes that Hercules underſtood Muſick.

> Dic (c) age Calliope, facinus tibi grande ſonabit
> Alcidæ, tenſoque modos imitabitur arcu.

Others obſerve that he underſtood Aſtrology: Gabriel Naudé gives this for certain, but he makes uſe of it with a little Ignorance, by his leave. 'Tis in that part of his Coups d'état where he ſpeaks of ſome Perſons who have uſed fraud to arrive to the honour of Deification: What Hercules did, ſays he (d), was more ingenious; for being well verſt in Aſtrology, witneſs the Fables of his Life which make him carry the Heavens with Atlas, he choſe exactly the Hour and Time of an Apparition of a great Comet, to put himſelf upon the burning Pile in which he would finiſh his Days, to the end that this new Fire from Heaven might be preſent as a Witneſs, and make it believ'd of him what the Romans afterwards would have the World to believe of their Emperors by means of an Eagle which flew up from the midſt of the Flames, as it were to carry the Soul of the Deceaſed into the Arms of Jupiter. Here is an Author who ſuppoſes that the Apparition of Comets may be foreſeen by Aſtrology. He is miſtaken; his Commentator (e) has cenſured him for it.

Note, that the Temple which Fulvius Nobilior cauſed to be built to Hercules, was almoſt Ruined in the time of Auguſtus, but Lucius Martius Philippus cauſed it to be rebuilt (f), and joined a Portico to it. See Ovid at the end of his 6th Book de Faſtis and Martial Epigram 51. Book 5.

(T) Strabo, who cenſured him, did not know wherein the real fault of it lies.] Æſchylus ſuppoſes (g), That Hercules was admoniſh'd, that being to Fight the Ligurians he ſhould be deſtitute of Arrows, Fate having ſo ordain'd it, and in a place where he could not get a ſingle Stone; but that in ſuch a condition he would move Jupiter's Compaſſion, who by means of a Cloud filled with Stones would furniſh him with Arms with which he ſhould beat the Ligurians. How much better had it been, ſaid Poſidonius, for Jupiter to have darted theſe Stones upon the Ligurians and overwhelmed them, than to have reduced Hercules to ſuch an Indigence, ὡ τοσῶνδε λίθων πτώσεως ἄλλου τὸν Ἡρακλέα (h), Quam ad tot lapidum indigentiam redigere Herculem. Strabo anſwered this Cenſure, and ſaid two things; one is that there was need of abundance of Stones, ſince the buſineſs was to beat a great number of Enemies, ſo that in that reſpect the thought of the Poet Æſchylus was more probable than that of his Cenſor. (i) Τὸ μὲν οὖν τοσοῦτον ἀναγκαῖον ἦν, ὅπως ἐν ἐφόδῳ πολλοὺς βάλλοι· ἐπεὶ τί καὶ τοῦτο μὴ πιθανόν; ὁ μὲν γὰρ ποιητὴς ὑπὲρ τοῦ μύθου τὰ ἀναγκαῖα ἐπεξεργάζεται· τὸν μῦθον. At verò tot lapidibus opus erat contra tantam multitudinem, ut quæquidem in parte fabula autor probabiliora dixerit, quam fabulæ reprehenſor. Secondly, he adds that the Poet having expreſſly ſaid it was a thing ordered by Fate, ſhould have ſtopt the Mouth of all Criticks; for if one ſhould attempt to diſpute upon Predeſtination and Providence, many things would be found both in Morality and Nature, which might give occaſion to ſay, that they had been better ordered in another manner; for Example, it had been better to pour Rain upon Egypt than to moiſten the Earth with the Waters of Æthiopia; it had been better if Paris had been Ship-wrack'd in going to Lacedæmon, than to ſuffer him to carry away Helena, and to puniſh him for it afterwards to the great damage of the Greeks and Trojans; a thing which Euripides attributes to Jupiter. (k) Καὶ τὸν Πάριν εἰς τὴν Σπάρτην πλεῦσαι, μᾶλλον ἢ [illegible] ἀλλὰ μὴ τὴν Ἑλένην ἁρπάσαντα ἄγειν τινὰ πρὸς ἀνθρώπους ἄγριον, ἵνα ποτὲ δυνηθείη Θέσις Ἑλλάνων ἢ βαρβάρων. ὑπὲρ ἐμφυλίου ἀνάγκην εἰς ἓν ἄγειν,

> Ζεὺς γὰρ κακὸν μὲν Τροΐ πῆμα δ' Ἕλλάδι
> Θέλων γενέσθαι, τὰ δ' ἰδιώταν πταίσματα.

Et Paridem cùm Spartam peteret debuiſſe portùs naufragium facere, quam rapta Helena pœnas poſtmodo ſceleris dare, autorem tantæ cladis Græcorum ac barbarorum, quam Euripides Jovi imputat.

> Jupiter malum Troibus, & cladem Græciæ
> Volens contingere, iſta decrevit patrem.

I believe that Strabo acted more ſubtilly than ſincerely. There is no probability that Poſidonius founded his Raillery upon Hercules's wanting ſo many Stones; yet becauſe his Phraſes might receive that Sence, Strabo took advantage of it. But he has not obſerved the true fault of the Cenſure; he ſhould have anſwered Poſidonius, that if Jupiter had intended only and in general to knock the Ligurians in the Head, he had better have done it by caſting thoſe Stones upon them than about Hercules; but that deſigning that Hercules ſhould be the Author of the Defeat of theſe People, the Stones were to fall near him and not upon his Enemies. The Critick went upon a notion which is an inexhauſtible ſource of Paralogiſms. He did not conſider that Deſtiny includes all at once both the end and the means.

(A) He gain'd ſomething that way in ſeveral occaſions.] This is what his Friend Eichſtadius ingenuouſly confeſſes. Sponte, ſays he (l), ad Poeſin & Muſicam accendam ſe dedit, à quo utroque ſtudio etiam

He practic'd Physick there with great Reputation, and yet by I know not what fickleness of Temper, he left that Town in the year 1614, and retired to Stargard, where he spent the rest of his Days. He Died the 15th of August 1636. (p) Diversæ sæpe nationes ad eum confluebant, & ejus experimenta nominisque celebritatem judicium de genituris ab eo poscebant Germani & exteri, præsertim Bohemi & Poloni, quorum liberalitatem præ aliis prædicabat. And being one of those who take care of themselves, he was very careful of his (q) Eyes, that they might be of service to him in his old age; for which Reason he was assisted by his Friend Eichstadius, who studied Astrology: He gave him some Nativities to Calculate, and desir'd his Judgment on them.

(E) That the uncertainty of his Art should not be too much discover'd.] He would never work for those who could not tell the hour of their Nativity, choosing rather to be without their Money, than to expose his Credit (d). What he wrote to Eichstadius shows that he was sincere, and look'd upon Astrology as a venerable Science, the honour whereof he ought to preserve, tho' he were a loser by it. He could not endure that any one should ask him what colour Hair and Cloaths must be of to bring good luck; as knowing he run the risk of being put upon questions of that Nature. He was angry with many Astrologers, who not using the like discretion, expos'd their Prognosticks to Contempt and Censure; and at the bottom he was desirous to be so Rich as not to be necessitated to gain a livelihood by so vile a Profession. (e) Sobriè quoque hanc artem tractari volebat; hinc aliquando in suis literis ita ad me perscripsit: Utinam amicis fortuna me intueretur oculis, ut sine Astrologicis gerris senectuti meæ (quæ mihi excitatem minatur) prospicere possem, nunquam quidem calculo inquirerem. Interim quando multi plura inquirunt, & scire desiderant, quàm Ars nostra ferat, aut patitur, aut habet, aut explicat, malo juxta conscientiam agere, quàm Sanctam Uraniam nostram deturpare & velut stupratæ, eique nigrum falsum vel atram notam aspergere: quam aliis tot superstitionibus Chaldaicis nostra Ars scatet, quas multi ex nostratibus adhuc mordicus tenent. Multi ex me scire laborant, qui colores vestimentorum & equorum fortunati sibi sint futuri? Hæc & alia monstra quæstionum sæpè albis dentibus video, sæpè etiam deteſtor. Anno enim virginitatem nostræ Artis, nec patiar eam ita nefario stupro pollui, ne Mistologi hosce abusus in contemptum Astronomiæ nobis objicere possint. 'Tis hard to imagine how a Man, who had so much business in Physick (f), and who had no Children, should fear to want necessaries in his old Age; unless he made Horoscopes. This might strengthen those Scandalous Stories that went about of him, and make one believe that he was too expensive in his Love Intrigues.

It ſeems that the more People have been deceived, the leſs one ought for the future to fear deception, ſince the word of God which cannot Lie, has promiſed us the overthrow of that potent Monarchy. We ſcarce find in the Writers of the Lives of famous Men the ingenuity which we ſee here. Since I have been upon this work, I have run over a great many Elogies, and Lives of Learned Men; but I have ſcarce ever read that they liv'd ill with their Wives: We are generally aſſured that the ſweeteſt agreement imaginable has been the benediction of their Hymen, when the Neighbour-hood frequently know the contrary. I remember a particular which deſerves ſome regard. A Learned Roman (f) who died in the Year 1640, had kept his Wife in ſo ſevere a Captivity as not to ſuffer any body to ſee her, or her to ſee any body (g). He ſuffered not ſo much as the Parſon of the Pariſh to come near him at Eaſter, to take an account of the Perſons in his Family, and to ſprinkle Holy-Water as is the cuſtom in Rome. He ſaid that the Pope going that way gave his Benediction to the Houſe, and that it was enough; and if the Parſon was importunate the Gentleman threatned to Cudgel him (h). One Day demanding leave for his Wife to be diſpenc'd from keeping Lent, the Prieſt anſwered he would not grant it, unleſs he ſaw with his own Eyes the condition of the Sick Perſon; The Huſband repli'd aloud that the Diſtemper lay in her Womb: Nicius Erythræus was preſent at this Diſcourſe. Atque ipſemet adfui, cum in ſacrario S. Spiritus in Sanis Parocho, negantí, non aliter ſe uxori ejus poteſtatem faciturum veſcendi carnibus, in quadrageſima, niſi ſuis ipſe oculis, quo morbo affecta eſſet, aſpexiſſet, palam multis audientibus, dixit, Uxori meæ morbus in matrice inhæret, placet ne morbi locum aſpicere? 'Tis eaſie to judge whether a Man of this Humour could Live 45 Years with his Wife without any ſort of Diſpute. And yet this is aſſerted in his Epitaph plac'd in the 275th Page of the Bibliotheca Romana of Proſper Mandoſio. Sed quod raro contingit cum Claudia Sebaſtiani Tiburtina uxore, ſine querela conjunctiſſimè vixit annis XLV. Neither Epitaphs nor Elogies are to be truſted to.

(H) His Friend makes but an indifferent Apology for him.] Some, ſays he, maintain, that Herlicius Loved young Laſſes, and his Stars would have it ſo; but if any one would conclude from hence, that the troubles of his firſt Marriage aroſe from this, I Anſwer in his juſtification, that he had no Child by either of his Wives, and that he was uſed to ſay that he ſow'd in a barren Ground; and conſequently he deſired only to be loved by young Maids and not to enjoy them. (k) Fuerunt noſtrâli eum, quum ætas ferret, non abhorruiſſe à puellarum amoribus, id quod in geneſi ejus conjunctio Veneris cum Marte præ ſe ferre videtur. Quod ſi quis hinc eum fortè ſalacem, & hinc multas turbas in priore matrimonio ortas eſſe dixerit, ille ſciat, D. HERLICIUM ex utraque ſua conjuge nullos liberos vel Herliciolum ſuccepiſſe, ſed illorum exortem fuiſſe, atque in ſterili agro (ut dicere ſolebat) laboraſſe, & proinde animo juvenecularum mutuo potiùs, quàm coitu captum eſſe. To confirm this Apology Cardan is alledged, who has proved himſelf Laſcivious by the multitude of his Children (l). Never was a more wretched Apology; for in the firſt place Herlicius did not boaſt of any Continence or Moderation; he only complain'd that he had cultivated a barren Soil. He had therefore laboured, and he confeſt it. What concluſion will you draw after this from his having no Children? Will you hence conclude that if he endeavoured to get the Love of young Women, it was only for the pleaſure of being Loved by them without any farther pretentions? But there are no Engines ſtrong enough to draw that Concluſion. In the ſecond place a barren Wedlock is no proof of a leſſer incontinence; on the contrary Phyſicians ſay, that too great a Laſciviouſneſs is one of the obſtacles to Conception, and that the Reaſon why there are unfruitful Marriages the firſt Year is the too frequent Commerce of the New-Married Couples; ſo that before the firſt Fires are ever, Nature being interrupted and diverted cannot take right Meaſures. Read Ariſtotle cited by Montagne. (m). 'Tis requiſite, ſaith Ariſtotle, to approach a Wife prudently and ſeverely, leaſt the too irrigating pleaſure ſhould carry her beyond the Rules of Reaſon. What he ſays for Conſcience, Phyſicians ſay it for Health; that an Ardent, Voluptuous and Aſſiduous Pleaſure Adulterates the Blood, and hinders Conception. On the other Hand they ſay, that as to a Languiſhing Congreſs, ſuch as this is Naturally, the uſe of it muſt be rare, and with conſiderable Intervals to furniſh it with a juſt and fertile Heat.

Books (l) of his making. I forgot to say that he was a good Lutheran.

HERMANT (Godfrey) one of the most famous Writers of the XVII Century was Born at Beauvais the 7th of February 1617. 'He shewed in his Childhood the 'proofs of a lively Wit and happy Memory, which qualities he preserved to his dying 'Day. He learnt the Latin and Greek Tongues with a wonderful ease, and at an Age 'that others can hardly Read and Write. He was but 12 years Old when Augustine Potier 'Bishop and Count of Beauvais, sent him to Paris to study Rhetorick in the Jesuits College. 'After he had finished his course of Philosophy in the College of Navarre, and of Divinity in the Sorbonne, this good Prelate who loved him, called him back to Beauvais 'to teach School Learning and Rhetorick. He sent him again to Paris in the Year '1640. to be Tutor to Mr. d'Ocquerre his Nephew. That Imploy was no hinderance 'to his professing Philosophy in the College of Beauvais in order to be of the House 'of Sorbonne. He was made Batchelor in 1641, and Canon of the Cathedral Church of 'Beauvais in 1642. Hitherto his Merit was known only to his Friends, but the 'Jesuits having presented a Request to the King in the Year 1643, to be incorporated 'into the University of Paris, Mr. Hermant was made choice of to write against it, and he Composed three or four Pieces which got him a great Reputation. Mr. le Camus (A) Bishop of Bellai, Congratulated him for it in a manner that deserves to be related. He represented to him the resentment of the Jesuits against him; but as Mr. Hermant was no ambitious Man, he did not give them an opportunity to imploy their great Interest to his Prejudice. 'He was made Prior of the Sorbonne in 1644, a Li-'cenciate and Rector in 1646. 'Twas in the second year of his Rectorship that there 'happened one of those casual Conjunctures, which impose upon some People (B) as to

'the increase of their Family. The first imagine 'that if they fail at one time, they shall succeed at 'another: But it happens quite otherwise; for 'what might have been effected by the first enter-'prize may be destroy'd by a second. And which 'is more, these frequent returns, without the 'invitation of Nature, give not the Seed time to 'elaborate and perfect it self, and therefore it is 'not fecund and prolifick, but rather as insignifi-'as Water.

It is a true saying that 'tis better not to have one's Cause pleaded than to commit it to a bad Advocate. Eichstadius deserves to be compared to him whom the Prætor Scipio recommended to one that was at Law. (a) Ille Siculus cui Prætor Scipio patrocinium causæ dabat hospitem suum, hominem nobilem, sed admodum stultum: Quæso, inquit, Prætor, adversario meo da istum patronum, deinde mihi neminem dederis.

(l) There are many Books of his making.] Most of them are in High-Dutch: The Latin are either Poems or Orations, or Tracts of Philosophy and Physick: The Sieur Witte gives a Catalogue of them (b).

(b) Ubi supra p. 87.

(A) Mr. le Camus Congratulated him for it.] Mr. Hermant wrote four things on that occasion 1. Observations upon the request of the Jesuits. 2. The first Apology for the University. 3. Academical Truths. 4. The second Apology, which is a Reply to the Answer which the Jesuits Publish'd. He did not prefix his Name to these Pieces. 'Mr. le 'Camus Bishop of Bellai discovering M. Hermant 'to be the Author, gave him a visit at Alluye-House 'where he Lodged, and imbracing him, said, that 'he blest God for having not only given him so 'much Sence and Learning at an Age so little ad-'vanced, but also a Heart and Courage not to fear 'the Hatred and Vengeance of so terrible a Society 'as that he wrote against. Yet all the evil that 'the Jesuits could do him whilst he Lived, did only 'consist in their not loving him, nor speaking of 'him with esteem, tho' he had been their Disciple. 'His Modesty shelter'd him from their most formi-'dable Resentment, and they could not oppose his 'canvassing for the first Dignities of the Church 'which they dispose of, because he was so far from 'seeking them, that he sincerely slighted them, 'having refus'd some when he was prest to accept 'of them (c). The want of Ambition often proves the best Sanctuary.

How many Reflections might be made upon that Spirit of Policy or false Devotion in the Church of Rome to deny Heretick the Praises that are due to them? But setting Reflections aside, I only insist upon some Facts, and beginning with a Passage in the News from the Common-wealth of Learning, taken from the extract of a Book of Daniel Francus de Papistarum indicibus librorum prohibitorum & expurgandorum. (f) 'He mentions 'the instructions that are given to the Inquisitors, 'wherein we see amongst other things an Order to 'Expunge all the Praises given to Hereticks. 'These are things, which we must see with our 'own Eyes to believe them, it being otherwise 'impossible to imagine that Religion could give 'such a turn to our Minds. Bellarmine was so 'perswaded, that it is part of the Character of 'an Orthodox never to praise a Heretick, that the 'Author censures him for having positively said, (e) Lorenzo Crasso has placed several Protestants (for Example Gustavus Adolphus and Salmasius*) among the great Captains and the Learned Men, whose Eulogies he Publish'd in* Italy.

'(1) that it was never known that the Catholicks 'have praised the Doctrine or the Life of Heretick. He 'shews by the Commendations which Cochlæus, Æneas 'Sylvius, Poggius Florentinus, the Jesuit Clavius, 'Mr. de l'Aubespine, Bishop of Orleans, and Caramuel have given to Hereticks, that Bellarmin's 'Touch-stone is not true. But by this we discover 'the Spirit of the Inquisition. 'Tis something very 'singular; for the Gentlemen of the Inquisition 'will have the Prefaces of Books, Epistles Dedicatory, and in general whatever doth any honour 'to Persons out of the Roman Communion, without 'excepting Princes, to be expung'd. Hence the 'Expurgatory Index's Order, that if any Historian 'has said, such a Day Christopher the Illustrious 'Duke of Wirtemberg was Born, Præclarus Dux 'Wurtenbergensis, that the word Illustrious, Præclarus, shall be struck out, which yet is of so 'little Consequence, that 'tis given in Latin to 'the meanest Scholars. They order also that all the 'Capital Letters put before proper Names to 'signify that a Heretick is called Doctor, Monsieur, 'a famous Divine, or Clarissimus, or Reverendus, 'be immediately expung'd. The Jesuit Severinus affirms in his Mineral that the Praises 'of a Heretick in the Book of a Catholick Writer, 'are an abomination to God, like those abominable Offerings mentioned in the 23. Chapter 'of Deuteronomy and 18. Verse. I have read 'in a Paris Gazette, that in 1633. the Master of the sacred Palace Publish'd in Rome (a) a Prohibition against the keeping of any Prose, Poetry, Image, Figure or Medal made in Memory of Gustavus Adolphus King of Sweden. Mr. Sallo giving an extract of a Book of Father Bona hath the following Reflection: This Author, says he (b), is the (c) first that hath given the Catalogue of the Authors whom he cites with his judgment upon each in particular. There are in his Criticisms things that are very curious. For the rest we need not think it strange that this good Father speaks so ill of Heterodox Authors, even in things where Faith is not concerned, because he wrote at Rome, where it is a Crime to like a Heretick's Book. Let us add to this the words of Balzac (d). 'Madam 'de Saumaise requested me by Monsieur Conrart, 'that I would give her some Lines to be Engraved on her Husband's Tomb. But I took 'care not to promise her any thing, being in a 'condition wherein I could not perform it, and 'under great Pains which gave me no rest, and 'left me no liberty for Poetick Thoughts. Besides, 'Interments and whatever concerns Funeral Obsequies belonging to Religion; I thought that 'the Epitaph of a Huguenot could not be Composed by a Catholick. I say an Epitaph like 'this; which must be placed in a Temple; which 'must be written in a Christian Style; and in 'which it would be difficult not to give to understand by some word favourably explained, that 'the Deceased was just from this Life to a better. 'But you know, my Lord, that these Terms are 'Criminal in our Church, and that they have 'been Condemned at Rome, in the Writings of the 'greatest Personages of our Time.

Note, that this Maxim of Rome is not always observed; for if you consult James Laurent in the 2. and 6. Chapters of his Frodiga Jesuitarum liberalitas, you will there find Praises bestow'd by Catholick Authors on the Virtue and Learning of the Heterodox. See the Margin (e).

(C) I will give an exact Catalogue of the Works he Publish'd.] I name it thus without any scruple, taking it from the Memorial which has been Communicated to us. He Publish'd in 1644. an Apology for Mr. Arnaud his Friend against a Libel of F. Nouet, Intituled, Judicious Remarks upon the Book concerning the frequent Communion. He wrote in 1651. under the name of St. Julian against the Visions of Lalvedie an Arcstate Jesuit; and under that, of Hieronymus ab Angelo Ferti three Latin Letters to Mr. de Sainteleuve against Mr. des Marets Minister of Groningen, who had taken some advantage of a Catechism concerning Grace, Printed by the Order of a Pious Bishop. He gave the Life of St. Chrysostome in 1644. that of St. Athanasius in 1671. the Asceticks of St. Basil in 1673. the Life of St. Basil and of St. Gregory Nazianzen in 1674. He Publish'd some Spiritual Dialogues upon St. Matthew in 1690. Since his Death his Spiritual Dialogues upon St. Mark and a little Treatise of silence have been Printed. A Person of Quality having beg'd of him the Extracts he had made of the Councils, he trusted them to a Treacherous Writer who kept a Copy of them and Publish'd them at Lisle in 1693. with this Title, Clavis Disciplinæ Ecclesiasticæ, seu Index universalis totius juris Ecclesiastici. They are disgraced by some Additions very unworthy of Mr. Hermant, and which might prejudice his Memory if the Publick was not told that they are none of his, especially the Collection of Letters falsly attributed to our first Popes. God grant we may one day see his Ecclesiastical and Secular History of Beauvais and Beauvaisis, and that it may not be lost in the Hands of those, who have seized upon it to the prejudice of one of his Friends, to whom he trusted it, desiring him by his Will to get it Printed (f).

(D) Of his difference with Father Maimbourg.] This Jesuit, 'having made a Collection in his 'History of Arianism of all that was curious and 'fine in the Life of St. Athanasius, thought he 'had nothing to do but to cry down the Author 'by an ill-natured Preface, to disguise his Filchings, and that no Body would ever imagine he 'had vouchsafed to take any thing from a Book 'which he treated with so much Contempt. He 'blames Mr. Hermant. 1. For having related the 'Passages of Authors. 2. For having put some 'illustrations at the end of his Work upon the 'most difficult Points. 3. For having said that 'tis difficult to know any thing more about the 'order of the Sitting of the Council of Nice, 'except that Simplicity, Modesty and Civility 'regulated it, and that the Probabilities that are 'urged to the contrary upon this Subject, are no 'solid Reasons nor strong Decisions. Mr. Hermant 'Printing the Life of St. Basil and St. Gregory 'Nazianzen in 1674. after having justified himself in the Preface against the three Complaints 'of F. Maimbourg, ends his reply thus. But I am 'perhaps already blamed for having been so long 'in refuting an Accusation which has no solid 'Foundation; and in truth I might have intirely 'neglected it. For 'tis certain that an Author 'draws upon him the Indignation of all equitable 'Judges, when having advantaged himself with the 'Labours of other Men, and inrich'd and deck'd 'himself with their Spoils, he abuses them for 'their Pains. This dispenses me from Answering 'in particular, a Man who has thought fit to 'deal with me in this manner, and it suffices me 'that there is nothing more Universally acknowledged by all the World, than this Maxim of 'the Canonists, which, above all things, Orders 'that Restitution be made to those that have been 'Rob'd, spoliatus ante omnia restituendus. I ought 'to make a better use of my Time, than to examine his Faults, which are perhaps more numerous than he imagines. What he has censured 'in my History of St. Athanasius, subsists by the 'invincible force of truth, and I need not bring 'new Proofs for it &c. (g).

HERMESIANAX, an Elegiack Poet, born at Colophon, was honoured with a Statue † in his Country. See the Remarks of the Article LEONTIUM.

HERMIAS, a Philoſopher of Alexandria, in the Vth. Century, ſtudied with Proclus, under Syrianus. He had Two Sons, Ammonius and Heliodorus, who were of his Profeſſion, the firſt whereof became much more famous than the latter. Hermias was a very vertuous Man, good-natured and Sincere. He was as laborious as poſſible, but of a mean Genius, and he could not invent an Argument ſo ſtrong as a Philoſopher has occaſion for. He had an admirable Memory, and recited to a Miracle the Lectures of his Profeſſor, and what he had read in Books: His Maſtery lay only in this; for if the Buſineſs was to ſolve the Objections and Doubts of a Diſputant, he quickly expoſed his weak ſide. His Morals (Z) were wonderful. 'Tis ſaid, that he did not approve the uſe of diminutive and cockering Words, which Mothers and Nurſes beſtow upon Children, and that he ſeverely * reprimanded his Wife upon that Account ?.

HEROLD (Baſil John) was born at Hochſted * upon the Danube, in Suabia, in the Year 1514. He applied himſelf diligently to Learning, and went in the Year 1539, to Baſil, where he ſtudied all at once Divinity and Hiſtory. He married there, and was made Miniſter of a Village of that Canton; but as the Bookſellers found him fit for their Service, they cauſed him to return to Baſil in the Year 1546. His Application in preparing Work for them, was incredible, and as an Acknowledgment for his long Labours, the Magiſtracy of Baſil made him a Burgher in the Year 1556. From that time he took the Name of Baſilius: he was ſtill alive in the Year 1566 †. I will give the Titles (A) of moſt of his Books. Lezana the Annaliſt of the Carmelites, has committed a groſs Fault (B) ſpeaking of this Author. Konig has made two Writers of John Herold, and Baſil John Herold, when they are one and the ſame Man. There was in the XV. Century, a Dominican, named John HEROLDUS, a German. He was an eminent Divine, and a very good Preacher. He compoſed many Books, which have been publiſhed in ſeveral Places. An Edition of his Works was publiſhed at Mentz in the Year 1612, in Three Volumes in Quarto.

(Z) His Morals were wonderful.] We may judge of them by the Maxims upon which he went in his Bargains. He maintained, That we muſt not take Advantage of the Seller's Ignorance, but acquaint him with the juſt price of the Merchandice, if he is ignorant of it. They who did otherwiſe, were according to him, guilty of a very great Injuſtice. They did not rob like Highway-men, and at the Peril of their Lives, but they defrauded the Law, and corrupted Juſtice. He did not approve that Axiom, volenti non fit injuria. He practiſed that fine Theory; for one Day perceiving that a Man who ſold him a Book did not put it at the juſt Price, he minded him of it, and paid him more than he ask'd: He did the ſame Thing on many other Occaſions (c), and as often as there was Opportunity. Eraſmo Rot. contra dialogum famoſum anonymi cujuſdam medici.* That Piece was printed at Baſil (g) in the Year 1541. His Six Books Belli ſacri hiſtoriæ continuatæ, were printed with Guilielmus Tyrius, in Folio, in the Year 1560. They begin at the Year 1185, and end at 1521. His leges antiquæ Germanorum were printed at Baſil, in 1557, as alſo his Princeps juventutis, ſive panegyricus Ferdinando Archiduci Auſtriæ dicatus, cum hiſtoriola Turcici belli anno 1556. geſti. He tranſlated many Books into the German Tongue, whoſe Titles you will ſee in the Epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheque. His Pannoniæ Chronologia is commonly joined with the Decads of Bonfinius. His Treatiſe de Germaniæ veteris vera quam primam vocant locis antiquiſſimis; item de Romanorum in Rhatia littorali ſtationibus, & hinc ortorum ibidem vicorum atque municipiorum hodie ſuperſtitum originibus, has been inſerted in the firſt Volume of Simon Schardius de ſcriptoribus rerum Germanicarum. Chriſtopher Lehman (a) has cenſured him in the firſt Book of his Chronicle of Spire; but an Apology has been made for Heroldus. One may ſee how laborious he was, by conſulting the Preface (b) which he prefixed to the firſt Tome of the Treaſures of Eugyppius. He there promiſes a Collection of Stratagems, and I ſee in Geſner's Epitome, that he publiſh'd Six Chiliads of 'em. He made a Funeral Oration upon the Emperor Ferdinand, which was printed at Franefort, in the Year 1564. (B) A groſs Fault.] He ſays under the Year 1159, that St. Antoninus was in the wrong to ſet down Word for Word, a Paſſage of John Heroldus, without confuting him. This Paſſage contains a Deſcription of the firſt Habit of the Carmelites. The Jeſuit Papebroch took notice of that Blunder, by ſaying, that St. Antoninus was a whole Century before John Heroldus; for, adds he, St. Antoninus died in the Year 1459, and the Princeps juventutis which Herold dedicated to the Archduke Ferdinand, was printed in the Year 1557. (e) The Difference is not altogether a Century: we have ſome Books of Heroldus printed in the Year 1540. Nevertheleſs, Lezana is very much miſtaken. Here is a Queſtion HERWART (John George) Chancellor of Bavaria, about the beginning of the XVIIth. Century, made himself famous by the Apology he wrote for the Emperor Lewis of Bavaria, against the Falshoods of Bzovius, many other Faults of whom he censured besides. Scaliger † looks upon him as a bad Chronologer. Our [illegible] was originally descended from a Patrician Family of Augsburg. I will give the Title (Z) of a Chronological Work which he composed, and that of a Book published by his Son, containing a very particular Opinion concerning the first Deities of Paganism; for the Author asserts, that the Winds, the Needle toucht with the Load-stone, &c. were the first Gods of the Ægyptians, and that they were adored under mysterious Names. A Branch of the Family of Herwart transplanted to Paris, makes there a considerable Figure *.

HESHUSIUS (Tilemannus) a Divine of the Augsburg Confession, born at Wesel (A) in the Year 1526, has been famous for his restless and impetuous Temper. He was very young when he had considerable Posts given him at Heidelberg, that of Professor of Divinity, and that of Preacher in the Church of the Holy Ghost. He did not discharge them without many Troubles; for there arose a violent Quarrel betwixt him and William Clebitius, upon the Doctrine of the Eucharist. The Elector Palatine Frederick III. being perswaded that Melanchton's Suffrage would be of great Weight to terminate the Dispute, consulted him upon that Subject. His Answer provoked Heshusius, who would not bate any thing of Luther's Opinions; and as there was no Appearance of seeing (B) an end of these Quarrels whilst he staid at Heidelberg, he was ordered to depart. He betook himself to Saxony, and published some contentious Writings in the University of Jena. Being called into Prussia, he taught Divinity in Konigsberg, till he was driven thence in the Year 1577, with the Ministers of his Faction. He had a furious Contention † with Wigandus, upon Controversies (C) of small

(Z) The Title of a Chronological Work which he composed, and that of a Book published by his Son.] Chronologia nova, vera, & ad calculum astronomicum revocata, at Munich in 1612. in Quarto pars prima. The other Part was printed in the Year 1626. Pars altera quæ est Chronologicorum seu emendatæ temporum rationis, adversus incredibiles aliorum errores, in Quarto. You will see his Son's Christian Name in the Title, which I have promised: Admiranda Ethnicæ Theologiæ mysteria propalata, ubi lapidem magnetem antiquissimis passim nationibus pro Deo cultum, & artem qua navigationes magneticæ per universum orbem instituerentur à veterum sacerdotibus sub involucris deorum dearumque, & aliarum perinde fabularum cortice summo studio occultatam esse noviter commonstratur. Accessit exacta temporum ratio adversus incredibiles Chronologiæ vulgaris errores. Opus diu desideratum. Jo. Fridericus Herwart ob Hohenburg in Schwindeck S. E. Bavariæ &c. à Consiliis ex incompletis optimi parentis P. M. eruit monumentis, atque ad finem perduxit, at Munich, 1626, in Quarto. This Book has a great deal of Learning in it. There is a Table before it, intituled, Tabula nautica & hieroglyphica descriptionis totius mundi vetustissima, quæ Theologiam Chaldæorum Babylonis, Ierogrammateon Ægypti, & Orphei Phrygis, nec non Magiæ, Sophæque Zoroastris & Magorum Persidis ostendit originem. Vossius's Silence about the Books that I have mentioned, may be well wondered at. That Learned Man doth not speak of them, either in his Collection of Chronologers, or in his great Work of the Origin of Idolatry, where he heaps together Abundance of Things concerning the Load-Stone, and where he has not forgotten to say, that the Winds were Worshipped as Gods. Could he intirely forget that Herwart the Father and Herwart the Son were Authors? That would be wonderful in a Man of so much reading. Would he have omitted to cite them, though he knew their Works? That would be no less strange in an Author, who was so inclinable to make a shew of his Reading.

(A) Born at Wesel.] According to Moreri, he was born at Ober Wesel upon the Rhine, in the Diocess of Triers; but Quenstedt (g) who says it was at Wesel in the Country of Cleves, seems more worthy to be believed.

(B) No Appearance of seeing an end of these Quarrels.] Melanchton's Answer was composed in the Year 1559, and was published after his Death, contrary to his Design (h). Heshusius rag'd furiously against him, and forgot all the Respect that was due to that great Master. (i) Heshusius itaque cum Lutheri de cœna sacra sententiam mordicus retineret ac propugnaret, à principe Electore, ut finis esset convitiorum & insectationum in sua urbe, dimissus offensusque vehementer judicio Melanchthonis de se, acerbè respondit, ac ne mortuo quidem & bene merito præceptori pepercit. Calvin censures him for that Fury against Melanchthon. Pauliſper expendant lectores, says he (k), quam atrociter Philippum Melanchthonem suum præceptorem, cujus memoriam sancte revereri debuerat, fugillet ac lacerat ——Probrosis elogiis Philippum ita digito monstrat, ut videri possit data opera materiam ejus traducendi in scribendo libro captasse.

(C) Upon Controversies of small Importance.] This is the Ground of the Quarrel. Heshusius in a Book (m) against Theodorus Beza, advanced, that the Flesh of Jesus Christ in abstracto, is adorable. (m) Non solum in concreto dici debere, filium Dei esse adorandum, omnipotentem & vivificum, sed etiam in abstracto carnem Christi esse adorandam; quia majestas adorationis sit carni communicata. His Adversaries assaulted him, pretending that he taught, that the Flesh of Jesus Christ is adorable in it self, independently on the Hypostatick Union: quod in abstracto & in sua essentia caro Christi, etiam extra unionem considerata, sit adoranda. He denied this to be his Opinion, and explained his Notion; but his Adversaries were not content with it. Bishop (b) Wigandus, maintained this to be a dangerous Proposition: Humanitas Christi in abstracto est adoranda, omnipotens, vivifica. Heshusius maintain'd that he had not advanc'd it, and explain'd himself once more, but got nothing by it. A Synod was called, who rejected Heshusius's Expression, and even Wigandus would force him to retract it publickly. Heshusius refusing to do it, was expell'd the Country, tho' he promised to correct any improper Expressions that might have escaped him: All the Ministers that took his part, had the same Treatment. The Administrator of Prussia, in the Year 1578, consulted the Divines that met at Hertzbergh, for the Formulary of the Concord, and receiving an Answer that was favourable to Heshusius, he ordered Wigandus to speak no more of that Dispute. This was the Eleventh Schism of the Lutheran Church (c). 'Tis of greater use than is imagined to know this sort of Histories; we therein discover small Importance. He retired to Lubeck, and afterwards to Helmſtad, where he was made Profeſſor of Divinity. He died there the 25th. of September 1588. He ſtoutly aſſaulted the Doctrine of (D) Ubiquity, in the Conference of Quedlenburg, in the Year 1583. Melchior Adam, from whom I borrow what I have ſaid, has been very barren (E) in his Account of this Man's Adventures. I adviſe thoſe who would ſee them more at large to conſult the Life of Heſhuſius, written by his Son-in-Law. Heſhuſius was baniſhed (F) Four times. And he took care, if we may believe Calvin, that it ſhould do him no Prejudice. He wrote (G) many Books. HIEROCLES, Author of a Book † intituled, Φιλαλήθης, The Lovers of Hiſtory, vended a great many Fables, if we may judge of his Book by Tzetzes's Quotations out of it. He ſaid, that in the torrid Zone there were Men whoſe Ears ſerv'd them for Umbrello's, and others, whoſe Feet did them the ſame Service, when they lifted them up. He boaſted to have ſeen it, and to have heard ſay, that there were Men who wanted Heads, and others who had Ten Heads, four Hands, and four Feet ‡. 'Tis not known at what time he lived, but there is no Probability that it was the ſame HIEROCLES, who from a Wreſtler became a Philoſopher *, and who was a Native of Hyllarima, a Town of Caria.

HIEROCLES, a great Perſecutor of the Chriſtians, in the beginning of the IVth. Century, was Preſident in Bithynia, and then Governour of Alexandria. He was the chief Promoter of the bloody Perſecution, under the Empire of Diocletian. He was

'Tis said that the Holy Martyr Ædesius, animated with a noble Zeal, came up to him, as he presided at the Condemnation of the Christians in Alexandria, and confounded him with shame in Words and Deeds. I mean that Ædesius, gave him (B) a Box on the Ear upon the Tribunal, charging him with his infamous of Lindanus, wherein are these Words: (a) Hesshusii, à Tilmanno Heshusio quem Calvinus Servetianum infamat, Boquinus, Arrianum: Wilhelmus Cleinwitzius vero præter peculatum plurimis de fidei capitibus accusat: quibus hoc (b) anno suæ respondit defensione objecta inficiatus, nisi quod illud Trinitas est unitas negat se meminisse an dixerit in lectionibus: cum ita disertè docuit de præsentia Christi corporis in cœna objectione quinta. There are three things in this Passage to be Animadverted on. 1. 'Tis an impertinent piece of Injustice to charge a Man with the Heresies, of which his Adversaries accuse him in the heat of a Dispute. Has not Hunnius a Lutheran Author, written a huge Book, in which he glories, to have convinc'd John Calvin of Judaism? Who but a Fool would infer from thence that Calvin entertain'd Jewish Notions? Thus under the pretence that Calvin, Boquin, and other such Adversaries of Heshusius exasperated by his Contumelies, have imputed to him Arian Doctrines, a wise Man will not think he has sufficient Grounds to call him an Arian. He will judge that such Accusations may easily be the fruits of two great Leisure, which is often abused to examine all the words of an Enemy and to wrest them in order to find Heresies in them by means of far fetched Consequences. 2. The Injustice, which would be only impertinent, if one knew not Heshusius's Answer, becomes wholly Criminal, when one finds him denying publickly the things his Adversaries accused him of. Now Lindanus confesses himself that he knew this. 3. Tho' this Divine should have taught some Heresies, it doth not follow, that there was a Sect of Heshusians in Germany. A Professor, who teaches particular Doctrines, has not always some Disciples, much less has he always some, who separate from the generality; which is necessary to deserve the name of a Sect.

Prateolus upon the bare Authority of Lindanus, has Ranked the Heshusians in the Catalogue of Hereticks. Father (c) Gaultier has done the same upon the sole Credit of Prateolus.

(A) Two Fathers of the Church have confuted him.] That is to say, Lactantius and Eusebius. The first relates (e) that at the time of his teaching Rhethorick in Bithynia, and when the Temple of the Christians was demolished there, there were two Writers who took Pen in Hand to insult the oppress Truth. One was a Philosopher, whose work was despised and quickly fell to the Ground: The other was one of the Judges, who treated that Subject more Maliciously. (f) *Alius eandem materiam mordaciùs scripsit, qui erat tum è numero judicum, & qui auctor in primis faciendæ persecutionis fuit, quo scelere non contentus, etiam scriptis eos, quos afflixerat, insecutus est. Composuit enim libellos duos non contra Christianos, ut inimicè insectari videretur, sed ad Christianos, ut humanè, de benignè consulere putaretur; in quibus ita falsitatem scripturæ sacræ arguere conatus est, tanquam sibi esset tota contraria; nam quædam capita, quæ repugnare sibi videbantur, exposuit, adeo multa, adeo intima enumerans, ut aliquando de eadem disciplina fuisse videatur . . . . præcipuè tamen Paulum, Petrumque laceravit, cæterosque discipulos, tanquam fallaciæ seminatores, quos tamen rudes, & indoctos fuisse refutavit: nam quosdam eorum piscatorio ministerio fecisse quæstum . . . . . ingentorum hominum manu latrocinia fecisse . . . . . Item eum facta ejus mirabilia destrueret, nec tamen negaret, voluit offendere Apollonium vel paria, vel etiam majora fecisse. We do not see here the Name of this Writer; but I doubt not that Lactantius spoke of the same Judge, whom he calls (b) Hierocles in another Book: to confirm which, I observe two things; one is the Title of the Book of this great Persecutor of Christianity, the other is the name which; Eusebius gives to the Author of it. (i) Ausus est libros suos nefarios, ac Dei hostes [illegible] annotare. These are Lactantius's Words. Now Eusebius (k) has named Hierocles for the Author of the Book intituled [illegible]. 'Tis therefore certain that he whose name is not mentioned in the fifth Book of Lactantius, is the same that he calls Hierocles in his Tract de mortibus Persecutorum. Note, that Eusebius in refuting this Author, insisted only on the Parallel of the Miracles of JESUS-CHRIST and Apollonius Thyanæus, not touching upon other Points, but contenting himself to say that Origen had confuted them before in his Book against Celsus, and that Hierocles was a bold Copier of other Mens Thoughts, and Words. Note farther, that with respect to this Parallel, the Life of Apollonius was only lightly run over and Reflected upon. 'Tis certain Eusebius did no great Exploits upon that Subject. This is what Dr. Cave says of it: Posterioris hujus operis partem de comparatione Apollonii cum Christo refutandam in se suscepit Eusebius libro contra Hieroclem; quod & SATIS JEJUNE præstitit, cum potius Philostrati libros de vita Apollonii in eo opusculo breviter percurrit & refellit (l). Note lastly, that Lactantius did not undertake a particular Confutation of Hierocles, and that he is so far from following him step by step, that he never expressly answers any Objections taken from the Work of this Enemy of our Lord. The end he proposed to himself, was to Establish in general the Foundations of the Gospel, and to ruin those of Paganism, and he thought this was sufficient to overturn all that the Adversaries had Published or should Publish for the time to come. (m) Ii ergo, de quibus dixi, cum præsentes me ac dolentes, sacrilegas suas literas explicassent, & illorum superba impietate simulatus, & veritatis ipsius conscientia, & (ut ego arbitror) Deo, suscepi hoc munus, ut omnibus ingenii mei viribus accusatores justitiæ refutarem; non ut contra hos scriberem, qui paucis verbis obteri poterant, sed ut omnes, qui ubique idem operis efficiunt, aut effecerunt, uno semel impetu profligarem. Non dubito enim, quin & alii plurimi, & multis in locis, & non modo græcis, sed etiam latinis literis monumentum injustitiæ suæ fixerint, quibus singulis quoniam respondere non poteram, sic agendum mihi hanc causam putavi, ut & priores cum omnibus suis scriptis everterem, & futuris omnem facultatem scribendi, aut respondendi amputarem.

(B) That Ædesius gave Hierocles a Box on the Ear upon the Tribunal, charging him, &c.] Eusebius doth not express this so clearly, but we must believe that the thing is implicitely contained in the words he makes use of. (n) [illegible]. Cum verbis simul & factis illum pudore atque ignominia perfudisset. Here is the Note of Valesius upon this Passage: (o) In hoc Eusebii loco, [illegible] quidem designat verbera quibus judex affectus est ab Ædesio; aliqui verò denotat convicia, quibus Ædesius judicem ipsum appetiit. Utrumque autem indicat Eusebius his verbis: [illegible], &c. Eusebius doth not tell us the name of the Judge who was thus treated, but we learn from other Authors that it was Hierocles. HIEROCLES, the Son of that Alypius who Commanded in England, and whom Julian the Apoſtate accuſed, ſent to Jeruſalem to Rebuild the Temple there, was jointly with his Father under the Empire of Valens, and ſo tortured that they could not tell what Member † to Rack, to make him ſpeak by the violence or his Pains what they expected him to declare. Order was given at laſt that he ſhould be led to Execution; but as he was going, the People in a Body Addreſſed themſelves to the Emperor, and ſo Paſſionately Interceded for him as to obtain his Pardon. This we may learn by comparing a Paſſage of Ammianus Marcellinus (A) with another of St. Chryſoſtome.

(C) We will point out ſome Errors of Moreri and Cardinal Baronius.] I. He gives the Title of Platonick Philoſopher to our Hierocles, who was no Philoſopher, generally ſpeaking. I have not found any Author among the Antients who makes him of that Profeſſion, and I find that Dr. Cave amongſt the Moderns, doubts (c) whether he may be called a Philoſopher. II. 'Mr Moreri ſpeaks of another Hierocles, a Pagan Philoſopher, one of the Judges of 'the Areopagus, who undertook to demonſtrate 'that Apollonius Thyaneus and Jeſus Chriſt, were 'the ſame Man. He adds that Euſebius writ againſt him. This is to multiply Beings without neceſſity; for the Hierocles which Euſebius confuted, was the ſame that Mr. Moreri mentioned in the Preceding Article, and called a Platonick Philoſopher. III. Beſides, we do not know any Hierocles that was a Judge of the Areopagus. Cardinal Baronius, who miſ-led Moreri in that, might have eaſily avoided that Miſtake; for (d) he bottoms upon Lactantius whoſe very words he ſets down. Now Lactantius ſaith expreſly that the Author who wrote againſt the Chriſtians, was one of the Judges in Bithynia. Seeing then Baronius very juſtly ſuppoſed that this Enemy of the Chriſtians was called Hierocles, he might eaſily conceive that he was not to be placed among the Judges of the Areopagus. Note, that he ſaith, and with reaſon, that Euſebius and Lactantius wrote againſt the ſame Hierocles, and yet Moreri who follows him, has given us two Hierocles's, one refuted by Lactantius and the other by Euſebius. IV. He has not well underſtood theſe Words of Baronius: (e) Nihil magis monſtrare conatus eſt (Hierocles) quam Apollonium æqualem fuiſſe Chriſto. For he thought they meant that Hierocles pretended to prove that Apollonius was (f) the ſame with JESUS-CHRIST. What I have further to ſay, concerns him leſs than the Cardinal. We have ſeen above that Lactantius makes mention of two Heathens, who wrote againſt the Chriſtians. Baronius pretends that our Hierocles is the ſecond of thoſe Authors, and that Porphyrius was the firſt. Moreri mentions this without finding fault with it. 'Tis true he declares that he follows in this the opinion of the Cardinal. Let us turn then to Baronius and tell him, that he could not have found Porphyrius in that place of Lactantius, if he had well examined things. The firſt of theſe two Heathen Authors was at Nicomedia (g) at the ſame time with Lactantius, and there Publiſh'd his Invectives againſt the Chriſtians. He was a Man made up of Vices, Covetous, Voluptuous, and Prodigal at his Table. He was very Rich, and made his Court to the Judges very diligently, in order to grow Richer ſtill, that is, to ſell their Sentences, and to ſtop the Proceedings of his Neighbours, whom he drove out of their Poſſeſſions. The three Books he Publiſh'd againſt the Chriſtians, were Fooliſh and Ridiculous; he underſtood nothing of the matter and knew not what he ſaid. The Chriſtians Ridicul'd him for it, and baffled him (h). This is the Character of that Author and of his Book, if we credit Lactantius. How comes it then that Baronius (i) could diſcover Porphyrius by ſuch Marks? Where has he found that this Philoſopher made a long ſtay at Nicomedia? Men never ſollicite the favour of the Judges to maintain their Poſſeſſion of Lands, which they have unjuſtly Uſurped about their Country Houſes: they never do this, I ſay upon a Journey; 'tis a way of acting which ſuppoſes a fixt Abode and a conſtant Settlement. Porphyrius then muſt have been thus Eſtabliſh'd in Nicomedia, if Baronius was in the right; now that is a matter which no body hath ſpoke of; his Abode at Rome and Sicily, took up the greateſt part of his Life: beſides, he is not accuſed of having been addicted to Pleaſure; and after all, he did not write fooliſhly againſt the Chriſtians. He has been complained of for his Cavils, his Malice, and his Calumnies; but he has not been reproached with want of Wit, nor has it been ſaid that his Books were (k) Impertinent and Ridiculous, and even expos'd him to the cenſure of the Heathens, inſtead of the Glory that he promis'd to himſelf. (l) Verum hic profuſa immanitate contemptus eſt; qui & gratiam, quam ſperavit, non eſt adeptus; & gloria, quam captavit, in culpam, reprehenſionemque converſa eſt. According to Baronius (m) he had been a Chriſtian; ſo that he could not be ſo groſly Ignorant of the matter he treated of, as he that is mention'd by Lactantius; for you may obſerve, that when this Father tells us that the other Writer examined many particular things, he adds: He ſeems to have been formerly a Chriſtian, (n) ut aliquando eo eadem diſciplina fuiſſe videatur. This Obſervation might have been of ſome uſe to Baronius, not to have found Porphyrius in the Deſcription that Lactantius has made of a Philoſopher, who Impertinently and Ignorantly attack'd the Perſecuted Chriſtians. For what remains, the Preface which that Philoſopher put before his Book, may teach us the Conformity between the Pagan and Chriſtian Perſecutions. An intereſted and flattering Writer never fails to engage his Pen againſt the perſecuted Party. He looks upon it as a fair opportunity to praiſe his Prince; he takes hold of it, and dwells upon the importance of the ſervice done to God, and ſhews that Inſtruction and the Authority of the Laws ought to go Hand in Hand, that erring Men, being thus enlighten'd may be reſcued from the Puniſhments to which their obſtinacy would expoſe them. This Voluptuous Philoſopher of Nicomedia forgot none of theſe common Places: One would think that he has been the Model of many French Authors, who have written during the Perſecution of the Proteſtants. See what a turn he gave to things. (o) Profeſſus ante omnia philoſophi officium eſſe, erroribus hominum ſubvenire; atque illos ad veram viam revocare, id eſt, ad cultum Deorum; quorum numine, ac majeſtate (ut ille dicebat) mundus gubernatur, nec pati, homines imperitos quorundam fraudibus illici: ne ſimplicitas eorum præda, ac pabulo ſit hominibus aſtutis. Itaque ſe ſuſcepiſſe hoc munus, philoſophia dignum; ut præferret non videntibus lumen ſapientiæ; non modo ut ſuſceptis Deorum cultibus refanieſcant, ſed etiam ut pertinaci obſtinatione depoſita, corporis cruciamenta devitent; neu ſævas membrorum lacerationes fruſtra perpeti velint. Ut autem appareret, cujus rei gratia opus illud elaboraſſet; effuſus eſt in principum laudes; quorum pietas, & providentia (ut quidem ipſe dicebat) cum in cæteris rebus humanis, tum præcipue in defendendis Deorum religionibus claruiſſet; conſultum eſſe tandem rebus humanis, ut cohibita impia, & anili ſuperſtitione, univerſi homines legitimis ſacris vacarent, ac propitios ſibi Deos experirentur. It is eaſier HIEROCLES, a Platonick Philoſopher in the Vth Century taught in Alexandria with great Repute; he got his Reputation by the ſtrength of his Parts, and by the readineſs and beauty of his Expreſſions †. He Compoſed ſeven Books upon Providence and Fate, and inſcribed them to the Philoſopher Olympiodorus; who by his Embaſſies did great ſervice to the Roman Empire ‖ in the Reign of Honorius and Theodoſius Junior. Thoſe Books are not now in being, and we know nothing of them but by the Extracts which we find in Photius. By which we underſtand that Hierocles had Demonſtrated a perfect Agreement betwixt the Doctrines of Plato and Ariſtotle, and that they who had deny'd it were not acquainted with the Opinions of theſe two great Men ». He turn'd his Wits a thouſand ways to explain the Difficulties of Providence, Fate and Free-will, and pretended that the Ground or Key of all theſe things conſiſted in the paſſage of Souls from one Body to another, and in the Life they had led before they entred into Humane Bodies. He laid out all his ſtrength that way, and had no more left to furniſh him with good Arguments to Eſtabliſh the Doctrine he undertook to prove ¢. For which Reaſon Photius obſerves that all that great Equipage of Reaſonings dwindled into meer Trifles *. (A) Comparing a Paſſage of Ammianus Marcellinus.] 'Tis this: (a) Ipſe quoque Alypius poſt multationem bonorum exſulare præceptus, filium miſerabiliter ductum ad mortem, caſu quodam proſpero revocatum excepit. The Paſſage of St. Chryſoſtome is in the third Homely upon the incomprehenſible Nature of God. This Father deſigning to repreſent to his Hearers the force of the united Prayers of a whole People, alledges an Example that they had ſeen ten years ago, when a Criminal who was led Gagg'd to the place of Puniſhment, obtained his Pardon at the requeſt of all the People of Antioch, who went in a Body to beg it of the Emperor. Valeſius (b) do's not doubt but that this Criminal was Hierocles the Son of Alypius.

(A) That Plato had taught that the World was produced out of Nothing.] Hierocles (e) moſt ſolidly confuted the Platoniſts, who maintained that God working from all Eternity by his Power and Wiſdom, was not able to form a World without the Concourſe of an increated Matter. Therefore they ſaid that he produced things only by co-operating with Matter, whoſe Exiſtence did not depend upon him. All things, added they, were virtually contained in Matter, and God had nothing to do but to draw them out, and ſet them in order. Hierocles Argued with a great deal of judgment againſt that Suppoſition: He ſaid that ſuch a Work of God (f) would not be ſo much a ſign of his Goodneſs, as the effect of a ſuperfluous Diligence; for why ſhould he go about to diſpoſe and ſet in order what he has not made? Is not good order ſufficiently found in this, that a Being ſubſiſts Eternally of it ſelf? Whatever happens to ſuch a Being, is it not Extraneous to its Nature? And is it not conſequently an Imperfection? (g) Τί γὰρ δὴ μᾶλλον ἂ μὴ ὑπέστησαν διαπονήσεται σπουδῆς καὶ τῆς αὐταρκείας ἐκτὸς ἐν τῇ ἀγαθότητι τῆς ἰδίας φύσεως κειμένης; τὸ γὰρ ἀγαθότητος καθ' ἑαυτὸ ἀμοιβὴ ὑφεῖσθαι τι προσδέεται, καὶ μᾶλλον προσλήψεται τὸ δὲ παρὰ φύσιν ἀνυπόστατον, καὶ τῇ μάταιον σπουδῇ, ὅτι οὐ δεῖται τῆς ἀτοπίας· ὅλως δὲ τὸ κατορθοῦσθαι, οὐκ ἐν ἀγαθῷ ἐστὶν ἐν μὲ ἀπὸ χείρω μίμει, ἀλλὰ κ τὸ ἀπὸ τίνι. Quorſum enim ea, quæ non condidit, digerere conatur, cùm omnino bona ordinatio in natura eorum ingenita conſtat. Si quid enim ingenito, ac per ſe ſubſiſtenti addatur, præter naturam fiet. Quod autem præter naturam efficitur, vitiatur: quare diſtam materiam ornari minimè bonum, ſiquidem non ſolum in tempore, ſed & abſque cauſſa ingenita ſit. He concludes from hence that God would have began (h) his Work with an ill Action, namely by undertaking to diſpoſſeſs of its natural State, a ſubſiſtance that was Increated as well as himſelf, and his own Siſter. Theſe Reaſons are ſo ſtrong, that whoever conſiders them well, and is concern'd for the Glory of Plato, will indeavour to ſhew that he did not admit two Principles Collateral, Eternal, and Independent of one another, God and Matter. This doubtleſs was the Reaſon of our Hierocles attributing to him the Doctrine of a true Creation. I believe he had read it in the Chriſtian Writings, and that being ſtruck with the Arguments that deſtroy the Exiſtence of an increated Matter, and joining withal the Idea of a Creator, which carries the Divine Power and Majeſty to the higheſt Point, he ſuppos'd for the honour of his Sect, that its Founder had known God under the Idea of a Nature, the ſimple Act of whoſe Will was ſufficient for the Formation of the Univerſe. (i) Ὁ δημιουργὸς θεὸς, φησὶ, περιῤῥήγνυσι τὸν Πλάτωνα ὑφειμένως πάνυ ἐμφανῶς τὸ ἀΐδιον διαπορήσαντα, εἰ μόνον προϋπῆρχεν ὑποκείμενον ἀρχὴν γὰρ τὸ ἄνευ βούλησεως εἰς ὑπόστασιν τῶν ὄντων. Plato opificem Deum cenſuit ſuſtinere omnem ſpectabilem & inaſpectabilem mundum, nulla prius exiſtente materia productum. Sufficere enim illius voluntatem ad ſuſtinendum univerſum. But it were eaſie to ſhew that this is an officious Lie, ſince Plato has clearly maintained the Concourſe of an independent and increated Matter. We may ſay then, that Hierocles has here ſhewn his induſtry as much as in any other occaſion, I mean the induſtry (k) of putting upon the expreſſions of Dead Authors ſuch a Senſe as one has a mind to, or of finding at leaſt two or three different Syſtems in their Works. He underſtood that Game; for the two Explications he gave of Plato's Gorgias were in nothing like one another, and yet they ſeem'd to comport with the Platonick Doctrine. Theſe are ſports of Wit, but they require a very copious imagination. HIERO I. King of Syracuſa was the Son of Dinomenes, and Brother of Gelon, who after he had gained the Sovereignty of Gela, was ſo Fortunate as to ſee the City of Syracuſa ſubmit to him, when he intended no more than to reſtore ſome Inhabitants that the Mob had Baniſhed out of it. He was ſo well pleaſed with this new Acquiſition, that he Voluntarily quitted Gela to his Brother Hiero, and wholly employed himſelf to find out the means of rendring Syracuſa † a moſt flouriſhing City. He Reigned there Glorioufly and Happily; he acquired a great Reputation by his Victories, and the love of his Subjects by his Equity and Moderation a. Hiero who ſucceeded him, did not tread in his ſteps; he was Covetous, Violent, and altogether different in his Conduct from the Virtuous Gelon: which was the reaſon that many were ready for an Inſurrection; but the Memory of his Predeceſſor was ſo dear and glorious, that it kept them to their Duty b. He had a great deſire to put his Brother Polyzelus to Death, whom he ſaw beloved by the Syracuſians, and who was ſuſpected by him of aſpiring to the Crown. He would have ſent him to the Aſſiſtance of the Sybarites Beſieged by the Crotoniates, to the end that he might periſh in the Battle; but Polyzelus who foreſaw the deſign, refuſed that Employ; and ſeeing that this furiouſly provoked the King his Brother, he retreated to Theron who Reigned in Agrigentum. They were afterwards reconciled by the Mediation of Theron. The latter might have taken Advantage of that miſunderſtanding, but he was c a good Man, and would do one good Office for another (A). His Son Thraſydeus ſucceeded him, and was Unfortunate in the War that he undertook againſt the Syracuſians. Hiero with a good Army made an Irruption into the Country of the Agrigentines and gained the Battle, whereby Thraſydeus loſt his Crown d. Obſerve here a difference betwixt the Poets and the Hiſtorians. The ſame Hiero who is ſuch an Accompliſh'd Prince (B) in the Odes of Pindar, is a wretched King in the Hiſtory of Diodorus Siculus. It ſeems that if the Poet Flatters him too much, the Hiſtorian is not juſt to him; for he doth not ſay all the good of him that he might, I mean that Hiero Civiliz'd and mended himſelf by the Diſcourſes (C) he had with ſome ingenious Men whom he loved and loaded with his Favours. He Died e in the Town of Catana in the ſecond Year ſelves. This Theoſebius ſeeing his Wife was Barren, made a Ring of Chaſtity and gave it her. I preſented you, ſaid he, (l) formerly with a King of Generation, but now I give you a Ring of Continence, which may always (m) aſſiſt you to behave your ſelf Chaſtly: Live with me if you pleaſe, or if you can contain; but if that condition doth not ſuit with you, I am willing you ſhould Marry another Man, and I only ask one thing, which is, that we may part good Friends. She willingly accepted the condition. My Author ſtops there, and leaves us in uncertainty, for we don't know, whether his Wife accepted the firſt or the laſt. He ſhould not have left ſuch an Ambiguity in his Story.

(C) Jonſius who proves . . . . our Hierocles to have lived after Euſebius is otherwiſe miſtaken.] His firſt proof is taken from the mention Hierocles made of Plutarch the Athenian, (n) who lived after Jamblicus. Now the latter flouriſhed under Julian the Apoſtate; We have ſtill ſome Letters which that Emperor wrote to him. The ſecond proof is taken from this, that Olympiodorus, to whom Hierocles Dedicated his Books, did not precede the Reign of Honorius and Theodoſius Junior; for he wrote a Hiſtory commencing in the ſeventh Conſulſhip of Honorius and the ſecond of Theodoſius Junior, and he continued it to Valentinian, Honorius's Succeſſor, or as far as the year 425 (a). Jonſius had Reaſon after this to maintain that Euſebius, who was the Author of the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, the Evangelical Preparation, &c. did not confute the Writings of this Hierocles; but he Errs in ſaying that another Euſebius did. The cauſe of his Error was this. He thought that the ſame Hierocles who wrote the ſeven Books upon Fate, made a Hiſtory of Apollonius Tyaneus, Intituled Philalethes, the refutation whereof we have in the Works of Euſebius. This was to confound Hierocles the Perſecutor of the Chriſtians under the Emperor Dioclesian, with Hierocles the Philoſopher of Alexandria, under Theodoſius Junior. 'Tis a little ſurprizing that Jonſius who had a vaſt and exact Knowledge of Synonymous Authors, did not know the Preſident of Bithynia, and the Governour of Alexandria, who did ſo much miſchief to the Chriſtians, and who wrote againſt them and was called Hierocles. Beſides, this Learned Man was miſtaken in thinking that Euſebius refuted the Opinions of one Hierocles upon Fate. 'Tis certain that Euſebius only confuted the Opinion of Apollonius, as he found it in Philoſtratus. (b)

(A) Would do one good Office for another.] Whilſt Hiero was preparing to make War againſt Theron, to whom his Brother was retired, the Inhabitants of Himera ſent him Deputies to offer him their Succours, and to declare they would live under his Dominion. Thraſydeus, Theron's Son, had been made their Commander, and was become odious to them by his Violences and Cruelty. Hiero made uſe of that Conjuncture not to puſh on his deſign of War, but to turn things towards a pacification. He informed the King of Agrigentum of the deſign of the Inhabitants of Himera. This Intelligence cauſed Theron to take the neceſſary Meaſures to fruſtrate the Conſpiracy, and to make Peace with the King of Syracuſa, and to reconcile the two Brothers (c). Moreri in a Citation from the 11. Book of Diodorus Siculus, affirms that Hiero Defeated Theron the Tyrant of Agrigentum who did Laugh at him. I have found no Footſtep of this in Diodorus Siculus. Note, that the Hiſtorian Timæus had reported that Theron, who could not abide that his Son-in-Law Polyzelus ſhould be ill uſed by Hiero, Declared War againſt him; but it was immediately terminated before the Hoſtilities were begun (d). Let us ſay by the way that Demarete, Theron's Daughter (e), was Married to King Gelon, who ordered when he Died, that ſhe ſhould Marry Polyzelus (f).

(B) Hiero who is ſuch an Accompliſh'd Prince in the Odes of Pindar.] He won the Prize at the Horſe-Race in the Olympick Games. He did the ſame at the Pythick Games; and was alſo Victor at the Chariot-Courſe. Theſe Victories were Magnificently Celebrated by the Poet Pindar (g), and you may believe that tho' Digreſſions take up more than three fourths of his Odes, he forgot not to ſay that Hiero had all the Virtues of a good and brave King. Note, that the Inſcription of his ex voto (h), teſtifies that he won the Prize thrice at the Olympick Games, twice at the Horſe-Race, and once at the Chariot-Courſe.

year of the 78th Olympiad in the 12th year † of his Reign. It was a Town that he had renewed, he had driven out ᵃ the Inhabitants and had ſeated there a Colony of Greeks drawn out of Peloponneſus and Syracuſa. He changed the name of Catana into that of Ætna, and would himſelf ᵇ be Sir-named Ætneus, when he was Proclaimed Conqueror in the Pythick Games. The Funeral Honours that were paid to him in this new Town, were like ᶜ thoſe of Heroes. His Brother Thraſybulus Reigned after him, but his Tyrannical Actions moved the Syracuſans to an Inſurrection, and reduced him to ſuch a condition as to be forced to ſubmit to a hard Capitulation. He retired into Italy into the Country of the Locri, and there ſpent the reſt of his Days in a private Life, having Reigned but one year. The Syracuſans having reſtored the Republican Government, maintained it till the Tyranny of Dionyſius. The Interval was 60 years ᵈ. 'Tis ſomewhat ſtrange that Dinomenes, Hiero's Son, did not Reign after him. He ſurvived him as we learn from the Inſcription of the Gifts which his Father had vowed to Jupiter Olympius. The Offerings which this King of Syracuſa Conſecrated to the Temple of Delphi were Magnificent ᵉ. His firſt Wife who was the Daughter of Anaxilaus King of Rhegium and Couſin to Theron, brought him no Children ˣ; but by his ſecond Wife the Daughter of Nicocles, he had Dinomenes above mentioned ᵘ. Some will have it that he gave him the Command of the Town (D) of Catana with the Title of King of Ætna. I do not know to which of his two Wives we muſt aſcribe the Anſwer mention'd by Plutarch ʳ.

King of Syracuſa deſcended from the Family of Gelon, who Reigned in the ſame place; but whereas his Mother was a Servant, Hierocles his Father looked upon him † as a Child that diſhonoured his Houſe, and abandon'd him to the Mercy of Fortune. He many days was fed by Bees, and as the South-ſayers declared, that this was a ſign he would be King, Hierocles ſent for him back to his Houſe and Educated him with all poſſible care. The Child improved very much by ſuch an Education, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf many ways. He was a Man of admirable Beauty and Strength. He ſpoke with a great deal of Grace, and he often Fought with thoſe that provoked him, and always had the Victory. Pyrrhus gave him many Military Rewards †. which the weakneſs of his Body gave him in the Converſation of the Learned, and became himſelf a Learned Man; and afterwards recovering his Health he continued to love theſe ſorts of Converſations, and often Diſcourſed with Simonides, Pindar and Bacchilides (i). The Author I have this from adds, that Hiero was a great lover of Learning, and very liberal, that he had a great Soul, Lived without jealouſy with his three Brothers whom he affectionately lov'd, and was mutually beloved by them, and that his inclination to make noble Preſents, determined Simonides tho' very Old, to croſs the Sea to wait upon him (k). Some Criticks (l) pretend that Chronology will not permit us to affirm that Hiero ever ſaw Simonides, but they have been ſhewn to be in an Error (m). All the Ancients were perſwaded of their Interview and Converſation. Xenophon has ſuppoſed a Dialogue between them (n) which is a good Piece. Hiero ſpeaks in it like a Man of Parts and ſtrong Senſe. Timæus the Hiſtorian ſaid (o) that Simonides Mediated the Peace betwixt Hiero and Theron. See alſo Athenæus (p) and Pauſanias (q); and take notice that tho' the Elogies which Pindar and Ælian have beſtowed upon this King of Syracuſa had nothing of Flattery in them, it could not thence be concluded that what Diodorus Siculus ſaith is falſe; for what he ſays of the Avarice and Violence of Hiero might be true, with reſpect to the time that preceded his Sickneſs. I do not obſerve this to excuſe him in all reſpects; I perſiſt to blame him for having paſt over in ſilence Hiero's amendment, and for having too plainly inſinuated (r) that he never grew a better Man. This I think to be very falſe; and we had better doubtleſs give a little Credit to Ælian and Plutarch (ſ), and ſet that Prince as an Example of the Truth of Horace's Maxim;

Nemo (t) adeo ferus eſt ut non miteſcere poſſit,
Si modo culturæ patientem commodet aurem.

The Sickneſs, which made our Hiero fond of learned Converſations was the Gravel. The Scholiaſt on Pindar cites upon this (v) a Work of Ariſtotle that is loſt. Meurſius is groſly out in aſcribing to Hiero II. what belongs to Hiero I. I mean the Learning that he got upon his Bed, &c.

John Benedictus, who ſays in his Commentary (k) on Pindar, that Hiero gained the Prize of the Horſe-Race at the Olympick Games in the 73d Olympiad, is miſtaken; for that Prince was King of Syracuſa (l) when he gained it: But he did not begin to Reign in Syracuſa till the third (m) year of the 75th Olympiad. The ſame Commentator pretends, that he Died after ſuch an other Victory obtained at the Games of the 77th Olympiad. This is to make him Reign above 16 years, and to contradict the beſt Hiſtorians without any Reaſon.

Muſa etiam apud Dinomenem ad canendum mihi obſequere, præmium quadrigarum, Gaudium enim non alienum a filio victoria patris. Agedum poſtea Ætnæ regi gratum excogitemus hymnum: cui urbem illam cum divinitus fundata libertate, Dorica vibra in legibus Hiero condidit. Benedictus makes this Note upon it. Poſtquam poëta laudavit Hieronem ab avitam, & filium Dinomenem à ſtudio in patrem: ad alias ejuſdem Dinomenis laudes digreditur: quem Ætnæ regem appellat: nam illam à ſe conditam Hiero dedit filio adminiſtrandam: eumque ducem Ætnæorum conſtituit. This increaſes our wonder to ſee Thraſybulus ſucceed Hiero. I believe the Syracuſans befriended the Brother to the prejudice of the Son, to do a greater honour to the Memory of Gelon; for Dinomenes Hiero's Son was only Gelon's Nephew, but Thraſybulus was Gelon's Brother; and thus ſetting thoſe upon the Throne who were more nearly related to Gelon, they more plainly ſhew'd that they looked upon him as the Foundation of the pretenſion to the Crown.

make him Captain-General against the Carthaginians, and afterwards to raise him to the Throne *. He went on soon after to make War Vigorously against the Mamertins, whom he had already Beaten in some Engagements, and he resolved to drive them out of Messina, which they had seized against all Right and Reason. They found themselves incapable of resisting him, and therefore they had recourse some to the Carthaginians, others to the Romans. The question was warmly debated at Rome, whether they should be Succour'd, and it was carried in the Affirmative, and this was the first beginning of the first Punick War. The Consul Appius Claudius being ordered to Succour the Mamertines, Landed his Troops in Sicily in the year of Rome 490. They delivered up their Town to him, and obliged the Carthaginian General, who Commanded in their Fortress, to leave it. The Carthaginians laid Siege to Messina, and made a Treaty of Alliance with Hiero, who join'd his Troops with theirs. The Roman Consul resolv'd upon giving Battle, and first attack'd the Syracusans: The Battle was very sharp; Hiero behav'd himself very Valiantly, but was beaten, and thought it convenient to return to Syracusa. Appius Claudius having obtained such a Victory over the Carthaginians found himself Master of the Country, and advanced as far as Syracusa, and Besieged it. Hiero seeing Sicily in Consternation, and the Carthaginian Forces much weakened, made Proposals for Peace with the Romans: His Proposals were accepted, and from that time till his Death, he faithfully adhered to their Interests † and gave them all the Proofs of a (B) most sincere Friendship. Had he Lived but five or six years after this Alliance, and did we judge of things by our Present Age, we should have Reason to wonder at his Constancy. Much more ought we to admire it, when we consider that he lived near 50 years after? This long Reign was a very happy one; for Hiero's Conduct was attended with so much Prudence, that it preserv'd him secure amongst his own Subjects, and procur'd him a great Reputation abroad, and gave success to all his publick and private Affairs. He Cultivated the Friendship of the Greeks, and was proud of their Crowns ‡. His Sons Erected him a Statue on Horse-back, and another on Foot in Olympium ^; his Subjects Erected others also in the same place §. The Money he gave to the Rhodians, and the Presents he made them after that great Earth-quake, which had made havock of their Isle, and over-turned their Colossus, is a very remarkable Instance of his Liberality, and Magnificence ||. He ordered a Ship to be Built which was one of the most famous Vessels in Antiquity; Archimedes ¶ was the Director of the Work. You will find the Description of it in Athenæus  who cites a Book written purely upon that Subject by one Moschion. The 16*th* Idyl of Theocritus is Address'd to this King of Syracusa, and the Author seems to complain of having praised him without obtaining a Recompence. Hiero Compos'd some but I will here disentangle that matter, which is somewhat maimed in that Author's Narration. I say then, there was a misunderstanding betwixt the Citizens of Syracusa and their Army, and that the Army Encamping near Mergana proceeded to the Creation of the Magistrates, and conferred that Dignity upon two Officers of War, Artemidorus and Hiero. The latter being introduc'd into Syracusa by the Clandestine Intrigues of his Friends, surmounted the Oppositions of the contrary Party, and behaved himself with so much humanity and greatness of Soul, that the Inhabitants agreed to acknowledge him for their Prætor, tho' they look'd upon those Assemblies as unlawful, in which the Soldiers pretended to confer Magistracies (b). Polybius who is here my Author, relates two Instances of Hiero's Ability. The first was, that he remedied a Disorder which was very prejudicial to the State. The Syracusans who staid in the Town, whilst the Troops and the Prætors were in the Field, raised a thousand Seditions, and laboured to introduce Innovations. It was therefore necessary that in the Army's absence some Persons should keep the Citizens to their Duty. Leptines was a very proper Man for this, as having a great many Clients, and much credit with the People. For which reason Hiero secured him by Marrying his Daughter, and by that means gave Order that the publick Tranquillity should be preserv'd in Syracusa, whilst he was abroad at the Head of the Army. His second piece of Policy was his getting rid of the old Foreign Soldiers, who were Mutinous and Debauched. He drew out his Forces under pretence of Ingaging the Mamertins (c), and when he came in sight of the Enemy, he divided his Army into two Parts; he placed the Syracusans on one side, and the Foreigners on the other; and putting himself at the Head of the former, as if to make an Attack, he left the others expos'd to the Mamertins, who cut them in Pieces. He raised other Troops, and so seasonably Assaulted the Enemy, that he obtained a glorious Victory. They made him King after that Exploit (d).

(B) And gave them all the Proofs of a sincere Friendship.] I will shew what he did, when the Roman Affairs were in a great Confusion after the Victory that Annibal obtained over them, near the Lake (a) Trasimenus. It was the third Battel they had lost in Italy since Annibal enter'd it, that is, in 2 years time. Less than that now adays would incline a Prince to quit his Allies, and take the Conqueror's side; a Prince, I say, whose Territories should be situated as Syracusa was with respect to the Republick of Carthage. And yet Hiero proved a generous Ally, he stood fast to the interest of the Romans, and sent them good Supplies. Read these words of Livy: (b) Per eosdem dies ab Hierone classis Hostium cum magno commeatu accessit. Legati Syracusani in Senatum introducti nunciarunt, eadem C. Flaminio consulis exercitusque allatam adeo agre tulisse regem Hieronem, ut nulla sua propria, regnique sui clade moveri magis potuerit. Aurum & à civitatibus quibuſdam allatum, gratia rei acceptâ, non acceſſiſſe populum Romanum: victoriam, omenque accipere: ſedemque ei ſe dive dare, dicare Capitolium, templum Jovis Optimi Maximi. In ea arce urbis Romæ ſacratam, volentem propitiamque, firmam ac ſtabilem fore populo Romano. Tunditores, ſagittariique, & frumentum traditum conſulibus. We ſcarce now ſee ſo generous a Conduct amongſt private Perſons. Gelon the Son of Hiero did not imitate ſo good an Example. He forſook the vanquiſh'd Party without any regard to the trouble he ſhould give his Father. You'll ſee Livy's Words in this Paſſage of Caſaubon. Fides vera & conſtantia ejuſdem (Hieronis) in conſervanda Po. Ro. majeſtate laudari ſatis pro merito non queat; quum præſertim ea mox & deinceps perſæpe ſcuta ſint tempora, quæ ejus conſtantiam eximiè probarent. Quot & quantas clades populus Ro. bello Punico primo, & ſecundi initio ſit perpeſſus, nemo neſcit. Solent adverſa hominum voluntates, & abdita mentium mutare. Hieronis propoſitum & conſtantiam in ſuſcepta ſemel amicitia Romanorum, non Regulî calamitas, non Claudii naufragium, non Thraſymenus, non Trebia, poſtremo ne Cannenſis quidem dies potuit labefactare. Manet inconcuſſa illi fides, etiam tunc quum & in Italia & extra Italiam omnes Po. Ro. ſocii & amici ad Pœnos fortunam ſecuti inclinabant: ne domus quidem Hieronis tota (verba ſunt Livii) ab defectione abſtinuit, namque Gelo maximus ſtirpis contempta ſimul ſenectute patris, ſimul poſt Cannenſium cladem Romana ſocietate ad Pœnos defecit. Hiero tamen nihilo ſecius immotus ſtetit, ceu Marſica quædam cautes, eaque etiam tunc fides conſtitit: quam etiam ad extremum vitæ conſtantiſſimè ſervavit (c). Let us add ſtill one Obſervation. This Prince's Fidelity to the Romans was ſometimes very burthenſome to him; for the Carthaginian Veſſels (d) made great Ravage in his Country. When he Died he recommended it (e) to the Tutors of his Grandſon, who was to be his Succeſſor, not to ſuffer any change in the Alliance he had ſo faithfully kept with the Romans.

(C) And Died at the Age of 90.] Livius affirms it as we ſhall ſee in the following Remark. Lucian (f) cites Demetrius Caliſtranus, who wrote that Hiero Died of Sickneſs at 92 years of Age, having Reigned 70. Let us keep to the round number of Livy and Valerius Maximus. (g) Siciliæ rector Hiero ad nonageſimum annum pervenit. Note by the way, a ſmall miſtake of Father Hardouin. (h) Hieron, Siciliæ Rex, quem inter ſcriptores de agricultura memorant Varro, & Columella l. 1. c. 1. cum Attalo Philometore Pergami rege. Multa de eo præclare habet Valerius Max. l. 8. c. 13. p. 405. Conſult Valerius Maximus in the place that Father Hardouin has quoted, and you will find nothing about Hiero but the ſeven words that I have ſet down, but you will find there a great many curious things concerning Maſſaniſſa King of Numidia. I am perſwaded that a falſe glance of the Eye was the cauſe of Father Hardouin's miſtake. A Line ſkip'd, made him believe that the whole Page related to Hiero: That little leap Eclipſed Maſſaniſſa in the following Line: This is a cauſe of miſtakes that ſpreads it ſelf farther than is imagined. A Writer, who is to conſult many Authors, dwells upon things as he can; his Eyes run over the Pages with great ſwiftneſs; they glance ſometimes ſo lightly upon certain Lines, that the Mind retains no Idea of them, and then the Pen joins ſuch Facts together as ought to be ſeparated. To conclude, Hiero did not Reign 70 years as Lucian affirms: he was Prætor ſeven years (i) before he was Proclaimed King.

(D) But his Daughters prevented him.] It was becauſe they ſaw that their Husbands and themſelves ſhould have the chief management of the Kingdom. Livy deſcribes this in an admirable manner. In Sicilia, ſays he (k), Romanis omnia mutaverat mors Hieronis, regnumque ad Hieronymum nepotem ejus tranſlatum, puerum vixdum libertatem, nedum dominationem modicè laturum. Late id ingenium tutores atque amici ad præcipitandum in omnia vitia acceperunt. Quæ ita futura cernens Hiero, ultima ſenecta voluiſſe dicitur liberas Syracuſas relinquere, ne ſub dominatu puerili per ludibrium bonis artibus parrum firmatumque interiret regnum. Huic conſilio ejus ſumma ope obſtitere filiæ: nomen regnum penes pueros futurum ratæ, regimen rerum omnium penes ſe, viroſque ſuos, Andronodorum, & Zoilum: nam iis tutorum primi relinquebantur. Non facile erat nongeſimum jam agenti annum, circumſeſſo dies noctesque muliebribus blanditiis liberare animum, & convertere ad publicam privatamque curam. Itaque tutores numero quindecim puero reliquit.

(E) There was nothing but Confuſion in Syracuſa after his Death.] The firſt thing that was done, was to preſent to the People Hiero's Will, and Hieronymus the new King, who was but fifteen years Old. Some People hired to make Acclamations approved of the Will: Others were diſſatisfied and conſidered the Kingdom as an Orphan who had juſt loſt his Father. A little after they proceeded to the Funeral Solemnity, which if it was conſiderable for the number of the Aſſiſtants, (a) it ought rather to be attributed to the love of the People than to the care of Hiero's Family. After this Andronodorus Son-in-Law of the Deceaſed, and one of Hieronymus's fifteen Tutors, declar'd, that the King was of Age to Govern, and that the Minority was expired. By this he aſſumed to himſelf the Power of all the others. The Royal Equipage was introduced, and whereas Hiero always went in a common Dreſs, his Grandſon was ſeen to appear in Purple with a Diadem and his Guards. This outward Pomp was attended with an equal Pride, Cruelty, and Debauchery; and one would have thought that Hieronymus made it his buſineſs to make the loſs of his Grandfather's Reign Lamented. Had he had the qualities of the beſt Princes, he would have ſcarce contented the Syracuſans, they ſo adored his Predeceſſor. What diſcontent then muſt they have had under a Succeſſor ſo unlike him? I cannot ſufficiently admire the Majeſty of Words that Livy makes uſe of to repreſent it. (b) Vix quidem ulli bono, modeſtoque regi facilis erat favor apud Syracuſanos, ſuccedenti tantæ charitati Hieronis: Verùm enimvero Hieronymus, velut ſuis vitiis deſiderabilem efficere vellet avum, primo ſtatim conſpectu omnia quàm diſparia eſſent, oſtendit. Nam qui per tot annos Hieronem, filiumque ejus Gelonem, nec veſtis habitu, nec alio ullo inſigni differentes à cæteris civibus vidiſſent, conſpexere purpuram, ac diadema, ac ſatellites armatos, quadrigiſque etiam albarum equorum interdum ex regia procedentem, more Dionyſii tyranni. Hunc tam ſuperbum apparatum, habitumque convenientes ſequebantur mores: contemptus omnium hominum, ſuperbæ aures, contumelioſa dicta, aditus non alienis modo, ſed tutoribus etiam difficiles, libidines novæ, inhumana crudelitas. This young King choſe rather to make an Alliance with the Carthaginians than with Rome (c); but he had not time

HIERO a great Friend of Nicias, and Head of the Colony that rebuilt * Tharium, called himself the Son of Dionysius (A) Sirnamed χαλκους that is to say of Brass, æneus. He was reared up at Nicias's House, and he himself instructed him in Literature and Musick. Therefore he used a great many Artifices to keep up the interest of Nicias †. I have found a fault in Amiot, and in some Dictionaries [a].

HIEROPHILUS, a Physician of whom I can say nothing else but that he taught his Art to a certain Maid call'd Agnodice. She disguised herself in a Man's Dress; for there was a Law among the Athenians †, which forbad Women and Slaves to Study Physick. Agnodice becoming a Midwife, gave occasion to the change of that Law. 'Tis too curious a Piece of History (B) to be omitted in a Remark.

time allowed him to do them Service; they conspired against him and killed him (d). Andronodorus certified himself as well as he could in some Places of Syracusa; and yet in spite of the Counsels of Demarata his Wife, (e) Hiero's Daughter, he submitted to the new Republican Government, and was made Prator: But new Troubles arising he tried to make an Advantage of them, (f) being won of the continual instigations of his Wife. He concerted his Enterprize with Themistius the Husband of Harmonia, Gelon's Daughter, and trusted it to a Comedian, who betrayed him; so that he and Themistius were killed as they came into the Senate (g). To justify this Murder, 'twas necessary to represent to the People the Crime of these two Men. The Orator who was charged to do it, said amongst other things that their Wives had fill'd them with Ambition. The People tumultuously cried out thereupon, that these two Women ought to Die, and all the Race of the Tyrants. Which was immediately Decreed and Executed. Livy relating this Tragical Adventure, inserts a Reflection upon the capricious and uneven temper of the Mob (h). Sub hanc vocem ex omnibus partibus concionis clamor oritur, nullam earum vivere debere, nec quenquam superesse tyrannorum stirpis. Hæc natura multitudinis est: aut servit humiliter, aut superbè dominatur: libertatem, quæ media est, nec spernere modicè, nec habere sciunt, & non fermè desunt irarum indulgentes ministri, qui avidos atque intemperantes plebeiorum animos ad sanguinem & cædes irritent: sicut tum exemplo Pratores regationem promulgarunt. Acceptaque penè prius quàm promulgata est, ut omnis regia stirps interficeretur. Missique à Pratoribus Demaratam Hieronis, & Harmoniam Gelonis filias, conjuges Andronodori & Themistii, interfecerunt. There remained a Daughter of Hiero named Heraclea: When she knew that they were come to kill her, she shut her self up with her two Daughters in her Chappel, and applied her self to her Penates, using the most pathetical Supplications and the strongest Arguments to save her Life, or at least that of her Daughters: But all in vain; she was hurried from the Chappel and Murdered. Her two Daughters who had escap'd from the House, were killed in the Streets (i). See the Margin †.

(A) The Son of Dionysius Sirnamed χαλκους.] This Dionysius was a Poet. Some of his Poems were still Extant in Plutarch's time (k). His Elegies are cited by Athenæus (l), and Aristotle (m). He was also an Orator; for he was Sirnamed χαλκους, because the Athenians being perswaded by one of his Orations, made use of Brass Money (n). See the Margin (nn).

(B) 'Tis too curious a Piece of History.] Hyginus relates, (o) 'that the Antients having no Midwives, 'a abundance of Women Died in Travel, because 'shame hinder'd them from applying to the Phy'sicians; and there was a Law among the Athenians 'forbidding Women to meddle with Physick. 'Hereupon Agnodice a young Woman having a 'great inclination for that Science, disguised her'self in Man's Apparel, and Learned it. After 'which she us'd to seek out Women that were in 'Child-Birth, and to take away all scruples, she 'immediately shew'd them what she was, and so 'brought them to Bed. The Physicians observing 'that they lost their Practice with the Women 'Sued her, accusing her of an infamous Com'merce with that Sex. They complained also of 'I know not what Collusion, and certain pretended 'Illnesses that they had to countenance the Gallant. 'In a Word they caused her to be Condemned by 'the Areopagites; but she shewed so plainly the 'Proofs of her Innocence in a full Senate, that the 'Physicians were forced to recur to the Law that 'Prohibited Women the Profession of Physick. The 'Athenian Ladies interposed and caused the Law to 'be Reformed; so Women were permitted to 'learn the Art. The Author from whom I borrow these Words makes a Reflection upon Hyginus: 'There is, says he, (p) but little exactness in these 'Words of Hyginus: For it might be concluded from 'his Discourse, that after Agnodice laid the Women, 'they no longer imploy'd the Physicians, which 'would prove against this Author's own Observa'tion, that they made use of their good Offices be'fore. But if there be no exactness in his Words, 'we may at least excuse him from a Contradiction, 'by supposing he meant that the Women having 'been affrighted in their Lyings-In by Agnodice, would 'no longer make use of any But by her in their 'other Indispositions, herein they had no temptation 'against imploying the Physicians. This Author makes another Remark upon Hyginus's observing (q), that before Agnodice Practised Midwifry, many Women Died who durst not make use of a Physician. 'It is still confest, says (r) the Writer of the News 'from the Republick of Learning, that shame is 'no less subject than other things to the humours 'of the Fashion. Time has been that it was a 'shame to make use of a Man-Midwife, and we 'Read in Louise Bourgeois a very dexterous Mid'wife, that Henry IV. charged her to do her Duty 'so well with Queen Mary de Medicis, that it 'might not be necessary to have Recourse to a Man; 'for her Modesty, added he, would suffer too much 'by it. At present 'tis à la mode to be void of that 'shame; Our Age is much more inlightned than 'the preceding. That Raillery against our Age 'is not well grounded; for if on one Hand there 'is now less shame in some respects, Impudence on 'the other Hand is less than it was at Athens. Is 'there any Virtuous Women at present, who durst 'in a full Auditory take up their Coats and Demonstrate to the Judges that they are Women? Thus Agnodice did in the Areopagus, the gravest and most venerable Tribunal that was in the World. Quod cum vidissent medici, se ad famam non admitti, Agnodicen accusare cæperunt, quod diceret eum glabrum esse & corruptorem earum, & illas simulare imbecillitatem. Quo cum Areopagita confedissent, Agnodicen damnare cæperunt. Quibus Agnodice tunicam allevavit, & se ostendit fœminam esse (s). Can there be a more Extravagant Impudence than this? Before which had she not given sufficient Proofs of her want of Shame? Could not she have discovered her Sex by more modest Methods than those she used with the Women? (d) Quæ cum credere se noluisset, æstimans virum esse, illa tunica sublata ostendebat se fœminam esse. Those (e) Prelates, who to purge themselves of Incontinency, have shewn their Nakedness in full Councils, do not come up to the Impudence of this Athenian Woman.

I have said elsewhere that Albertus Magnus Practised Midwifry, if we may believe the Scandalous Chronicle (f). If this be so, 'tis a long time since the Modesty of the Athenian Women is not in Being; and as the Reputation of Albertus was that Charles Stephens, Lloyd and Hofman say, that

HILDEBERT, Biſhop of Mans and afterwards Archbiſhop of Tours in the beginning of the XIIth. Century, had led a very ſcandalous Life (A) before he came to the Mitre. 'Tis in vain to wrangle hereupon with the (B) Annaliſt of the Romiſh Church, and to oppoſe the Diſcoveries of a Critick againſt him. Father Maimbourg made uſe of (C) an Action of this Prelate, to inſult thoſe few Biſhops, who oppos'd the Extention of the Regale. The Note I ſhall make upon this Subject, will contain ſome things relating to our Hildebert's Hiſtory. Illyricus has rec-well Eſtabliſhed, who knows but that ſome Women gloried in being delivered by his Hand; juſt as Moliere's nice Ladies would have every thing even their under Stockings, of the beſt Faſhion?

Since the firſt Edition of this Dictionary I have ſeen in the Journaliſts of Leipſick, an Obſervation which will ſerve here for a Supplement. It muſt not be denied, ſay they, but that the French are the beſt of all Nations to inſtruct us how Women are to be brought to Bed. 'Tis not becauſe they have a more happy Genius, but becauſe they have frequent occaſions of being preſent at Child-Births. The mode is come into France, that even New-married Women caſting away all ſhame, permit themſelves without ſcruple to be ſeen and handled by the Chirurgeons, and all ſorts of Women deſire their Preſence and Aſſiſtance when they are ready to Lie-in. A quite different Cuſtom prevails in other Nations: For ordinarily Women and eſpecially thoſe who have been lately Married are ſo ſcrupulous, that they can hardly be perſwaded to ſubmit themſelves to the Mid-wives and their particular Friends: 'Tis only neceſſity brings them to it, and when the Pain is ſo ſtrong as to overcome their Repugnance. As I do not Tranſlate this word for word, I will put down the Latin of the Leipſick Journal, to ſhew that I expreſs the Sence of it with all the neceſſary faithfulneſs. (g) Non eſt negandum, de adjuvandis parturientibus Gallos præ cæteris nationibus nos inſtruere poſſe, non ingenio, ſed occaſione, qua licet ipſis quam frequentiſſime partui adeſſe, feliciores. Ita enim moris apud ipſos eſt, ut poſito pudore, etiam recens nupta ad tactum atque explorationem omnem chirurgos admittant faciles, & partus tempore præſentes atque adjutores fœmina qualibet eos expetant. Quod longe ſit aliter apud cæteras nationes, ubi plerumque vix perſuaderi poſſunt uxorcula, cumprimis nuper in matrimonium ducta, ut obſtetricibus propriiſque ſexus amicis ſui faciant copiam, niſi doloribus ac neceſſitate victa. It is thus, that the Gentlemen of Leipſick ſpeak at the beginning of the Extract of a Book Publiſhed by a Paris Chirurgeon (b) in the year 1694. and Intituled the Practice of Mid-wifery. That Chirurgeon did not Print his Obſervations, till after a long Experience, and his aſſiſting at the Deliveries of four or five thouſand Women. Another Chirurgeon (i) of the ſame City Publiſh'd another Book the year following Intituled, Obſervations upon the Big Bellies and Deliveries of Women, &c. There are in it 700 choice Obſervations (k) amongſt more than three thouſand others, which the Author has made. This is enough to prove that 'tis the great Faſhion of Paris to make uſe of Men and not of Women Midwives. The time will come perhaps that the ſame Mode will prevail over the greateſt part of Europe; ſhame will undergo the Fate of a thouſand other things, that follow the odd and inconſtant Laws of Cuſtom.

(A) A very Scandalous Life.] Even after his promotion to an Arch-deaconry, he kept ſo many Concubines, that he had Baſtards in abundance. This is what Ivo Biſhop of Chartres writ to him: (l) Dicunt quidam de majoribus Cenomanenſis Eccleſiæ qui anteactam vitam tuam ſe noſſe teſtantur, quod ultra modum laxaveris frena pudicitiæ, in tantum ut poſt acceptum Archidiaconatum, accubante lateribus tuis plebe mulierculariam multam generis plebem quærorum & puellularum.

(B) To wrangle hereupon with the Annaliſt.] Juret (m) cenſures Baronius for having written in his Annals upon the Authority of this Letter of Ivo of Chartres, that Hildebert before he was a Biſhop was addicted to Women, pretending that this Letter was written to one Aldebert and not to Hildebert. Aldeberto, Cenomanenſis Eccleſiæ electo. 'Tis thus this Letter is Intitled at the end of the Manuſcript Letters of Ivo of Chartres in the Library of St. Victor——But Father Sirmond in his Notes upon Godfrey of Vendome has very well juſtified Baronius: Theſe are his Words. Ildebertus vir in Epiſcopatu eximius, ante illum, vitæ ſolutioris, ut indicat Ivonis epiſtola 277. Quam quidem, qui de Ildeberto, quo de agimus, ſcriptam, pertinaciùs neget, is, opinor, clauſis oculis ſibi credi velit. Reque enim alia Ivonis tempore Cenomanenſis Epiſcopi electio fuit, quàm Ildeberti? Quem præterea ſcimus ex Archidiacono, quod Ivo notat, ad Epiſcopalem Cathedram evectum. Neque tamen hæc ita differo, ut viri docti, qui contra ſenſit, nomini obtrectem: ſed quia immortalis memoriæ Cardinali Baronio me debere judico, ut quæ rectè & verè ab eo dicta ſunt, ea ut pro veris habeantur, enitar quoad poſſum (n). Mr. Menage adds ſome good things to theſe Reaſons of Father Sirmond. Ildebertus, ſays he, (o) 'and Aldebertus is the ſame Name: And Ildebert 'Biſhop of Mans calls himſelf Aldebertus in one 'of his Letters Printed in the thirteenth Volume of 'the Spicilegium. Rannſo, Dei gratia, Dunelmenſi Epiſcopo, omni honore & gratia ſublimando, 'ALDEBERTUS, humilis Cenomanorum Sacerdos. He is thus called in a Charter of the Abbey 'of Etival produced by M. Pavillon in his Obſer- 'vations upon the Life of Arbriſſel. Aldeb. Epiſcopo Cenomanenſi: For thus it ought to be 'Read, and not, (i) Alberto Epiſcopo Cenoma- 'nenſi: There having been no Albert Biſhop of 'Mans. In a Charter of Frontevaux, produc'd by Coſnier, at Page 131 of his Notes upon the Life 'of Arbriſſel, he is alſo called Audebertus; which 'is the ſame thing as Aldebertus. Courvaiſier in 'the Life of Ildebert, confirms the Letter of Ivo 'of Chartres, by this place of the Necrologium of 'Sr. Peter of Mans: Tertio Idus Auguſti, obiit 'Gervaſius, Hildeberti Præſulis filius; materis Eccleſiæ Canonicus; qui vivens, ad hujus Eccleſiæ ſervitium quandam contulit Bibliothecam; cujus anima quiete fruatur æterna: Pretending that this 'Gervaſius was the Natural Son of Ildebert. Bon- 'donnet pretends he was only his Spiritual Son. 'But in the Geſta of the Biſhops of Mans, Publiſhed 'by Dom. Mabillon in the third Volume of his 'Analecta, the delicta juventutis of this Biſhop are 'mentioned, which farther confirms Ivo of Char- 'tres's Letter. (p) Mr. Menage alledges in his Additions two Charters produced by Father de la Mainferme (q), in which our Hildebert is called Audebertus. Thus Juret's Criticiſm falls (r) to the Ground, together with the Praiſes given him by Father Maimbourg. See the following Remark.

(C) Father Maimbourg made uſe of.] He firſt praiſes this Prelate. Bleſſed Hildebert, ſays he (a), Biſhop of Mans and afterwards Archbiſhop of Tours, was one of the moſt Holy and Learned Prelates that the Gallican Church ever had. 'We 'have ſome Epiſtles and ſome other fine Works of 'his in the Bibliotheca Patrum. It is he whom St. 'Bernard calls the excellent Pontif and the great 'Pillar of the Church; of whom the moſt famous 'Writers ſpeak with the greateſt Commendations, 'and whoſe Sanctity God himſelf was pleaſed to 'declare and honour by Miracles wrought at his 'Tomb. And upon this occaſion I think my ſelf 'oblig'd to ſay, that I may give the Honour that is 'due to his Memory, that thoſe who have written 'upon the credit of an Epiſtle of Ivo of Chartres, 'that when Hildebert was made Biſhop of Mans, he 'led a very ſcandalous Life, have taken him for 'another, being miſled by the Inſcription of that 'Epiſtle, wherein they have found Hildeberto in- 'ſtead of Aldeberto, which is Read in the old Co- 'pies, as Monſieur Juret to whom we owe this 'important Remark, has ſhewn in his Learned 'Notes upon Ivo of Chartres. After this Maim- 'bourg ſays that Hildebert was Tranſlated from the Biſhoprick of Mans to the Arch-biſhoprick of Tours by Pope Honorius II. in the year 1125, and that having found two Canonries in his Church, which reckoned him amongst the Witnesses of Truth, for a very smart Letter (D) that he wrote against the Court of Rome. He was of no great Birth (E).

HILTEN (John) a German Cordelier, took upon him to ground some Predictions upon the Book of Daniel (A) in the year 1485. Melanchthon who had seen the Original of that Work, reports that the Author foretold that in the year 1516. the Papacy should begin to fall, and that afterwards it should decline more and more, till it came to its downfal, and never should rise again; and that about the year 1600, the Turks should be Masters (B) in Italy and Germany *. Some tell us † that he Foretold that in the year 1600 there should be seen a Man extreamly Cruel, and that in 1606 Gog and Magog should Reign over all Europe. After having with a great deal of ‡ Pains sought out the end of the World, he placed it † in the year 1651.

(e) He says in the next Page that in the year 1107. Hildebert being Persecuted by the King of England, went to Consult Pope Paschal, and to implore his Assistance, and that having held a Synod at Nantes under Pope Honorius, he sent the Acts of that Synod to the said Pope.

Lewis the Big had fill'd during the Vacancy of the Archbishoprick, (b) He went himself to Court to make his most humble Remonstrances to the King. He was heard, but being not contented with the Sentence that was pronounced, he demanded a Canonical Determination; his obstinacy occasion'd the Revenues of his Archbishoprick to be Confiscated. Then he had only Recourse to the most submissive Entreaties, Recommending himself to a Bishop who was in the King's Favour. 'I do not Write to you, 'said he, (i) to complain of the King's Proceedings, 'to Exasperate you by my complaints, to raise 'Clamours, Troubles, Seditions and Tempests a- 'gainst the Lord's Anoinred, and to demand the 'Rigour and Censures of the Church against him. 'So far from that, I only desire that you would 'be so kind as to intercede for me, and by your 'good and charitable Offices to prevail with the 'King, not to exercise his Anger and Indignation 'against a poor Bishop loaded with years, who 'only desires to live a quiet Life. Father Maimbourg does not fail to observe that the King, 'continued in 'full Possession and Injoyment of his Right, and 'that Pope Honorius, that most Holy Pontif and 'Great Protector of this Archbishop, found no fault 'with it. Observe how this Historian in his History of Lutheranism, inserts an Episode upon the Affair of the Regale, to make his Court to the King by decrying the Conduct of the Bishop of Pamiers and Pope Innocent XI. He took the same Method with respect to all the Affairs of the Time, as he has been upbraided with it in the fourth and fifth Letter of the Critical Answer to his History of Calvinism.

(D) For a very smart Letter——against the Court of Rome.] 'Tis a very lively Description he has given of the Disorders of this Court, and I think it has lost nothing of its Strength in Mr. du Plessis Mornai's French Translation of it (c). Hildebert was only Bishop of Mans when he wrote this Letter, but when he wrote another to Honorious II. complaining of the drawing of all Causes to Rome by way of appeal, he was Archbishop of Tours. He made a Description of Rome in Verse, concluding with these Words.

Urbs felix, si vel Dominis urbs illa careret,
Vel Dominis esset turpe carere fide.

Happy City, if it had no Masters, or if those Masters were ashamed of their want of Faith. Coeffeteau (d), do's not deny but that the Letter to Honorius is Hildebert's; but he do's not think so of the other. 'Tis not credible, says he, that this Epistle should be his, since it is not only wanting amongst those that are Printed, and even among those that are in Manuscript, which we have seen amongst other rare Books of Messieurs du Puy—— but also because excepting some youthful Sallies of this Prelate, we find that he was always very Modest, and especially very Respectful to the Holy See, as we shall shew by and by (e). And indeed, neither Vignier, nor Illyricus, nor du Plessis mention upon what Subject it was written. They have only given us a Fragment of it without any Title or any other Marks. It is fit the Reader should know what was reply'd to this. 'If this will serve for a Reason, it will serve us 'doubly, and we shall shew with better Argu- 'ments and Testimonies the baleness of his Party, 'in Forging new Pieces and Falsifying the old ones. 'Illyricus finding it amongst others, Published it 'in its own words, which are plainly different from 'his Style. If he and others after him, give it us 'without any other Title and Argument, it can be 'no new thing to those who have seen those that 'are Printed, amongst which there are many, 'which 'tis impossible to guess to whom they 'were written, and to know particularly upon 'what Subject (f). 'Tis Rivet that speaks thus: a little after he observes that Gretserus cannot believe (g) that the 82*d Epistle, wherein is mention'd the taking away or moderating the Appeals, could come from* Hildebert; though Coeffeteau says, that it is truly his. The curious may consult Father Hommey's Supplementum patrum, where there are several Pieces of Hildebert, with Notes upon his Epistles, and the Names of those to whom he wrote them (h).

(E) He was of no great Birth.] (i) 'There is a 'place in Maine near Montoire called Lavardin, 'which has given its name to a most noble Family 'of Vendomois ——La Croix du Maine in his 'Bibliotheque says, upon the Article of James La- 'vardin, that Hildebert Bishop of Mans, was of that 'Family; which is not true. He was born at 'Lavardin; but he was not of the House of Lavar- 'din. He was a Man of a great deal of Learning 'and Merit, but of no Birth. The words of La Croix du Maine are these, (k) That Houle (l) of Lavardin has produced Learned Men long ago; for Hildebert Bishop of Mans, and afterwards Archbishop of Tour, 500 years ago, was of that House, and Sirname, and was in his time reckoned the most learned Poet and Orator, as his Epistles and Latin Poems Witness.

(A) Upon the Book of Daniel in the year 1485.] I have met with this Date in a Passage mention'd by Melchior Adam, which teaches us also where this Fryar Studied. Ego olim juvenis, 'tis Hilten who speaks (m), almæ matris Universitatis Erphurdensis alumnus, ardens philosophus: nunc senex cauli solitudini deditus ab anno Christi millesimo quadringentesimo septuagesimo primo, in hunc annum millesimum quadringentesimum octogesimum quintum ejusdem Domini Jesu Christi voluntate, qui & me instigavit ex suo libro cognoscere veritatem, contra vanos errores de futuro tempore nunc volantes. Quam me solum sciens amor Dei & proximi non sinit, sed & aliis pris & benevolis impertiri admonet. Melchior Adam, a few lines before, says that Hilten lived in the XIVth Century. This want of Attention is very common among Writers.

(B) The Turks should be Masters in Italy.] He seemed to promise that the Turks should be the Instrument of a wonderful Reformation by the ruin of the Papacy; but those who should Reform, were to Abolish Mahometanism; after which the Roman Emperor was to resign his Crown to JESUS CHRIST never to be restor'd. (n) Ita dygerit omnia Calchas. It appears by the Event that John Hilten knew no more of the matter than that Diviner of the Grecian Army. His words are these. (o) Piures gloriantur Romanum Papam esse monarcham, quia Jesus omnia dedit Petro & ejus successoribus. Fateor, verumquamdiu sunt ejus vicarii. Sed leguntur revelationes S. Brigittæ: & videbitur querela Christi de perversione illius vicariatus. Quapropter Deus dedit gladium Mahometo, quo monarchiam illam à vicario ad ejus Dominum Jesum Christum compellit, vicarium & omnes Christianos reformando. Qui plene reformati exurgent, & delebunt sectam Mahometi. Quo facto, ultimus Imperator Romanus reget nobis cum effectu Jesu Christo coronam regalem, & omne jus Imperiale; non recepturus, ut Constantinus.

Mr. du Pleſſis Mornai has only taken ſo much of thoſe Predictions (C) as was for his turn. Hilten was perſwaded that Charity did not ſuffer him to ſuppreſs that Knowledge which God had given him about things to come [e]. 'Tis ſaid that he Died [f] in the year 1502.

HYPERIUS (Andrew Gerard) a Celebrated Miniſter and Profeſſor of Divinity, was Born at Ipres in Flanders the ſixteenth of May 1511. He took the Name he is known by from the place of his Birth *. His Father who was an Advocate, and who made him Study in ſeveral Places, finding himſelf near his end in the year 1525. recommended it to his Wife to ſend him to Paris to continue his Studies there. Which was done in the year 1528. Hyperius Studied there three years together Philoſophy in Calvi-College; and after a little Journey that he made to Ipres, returning to Paris again, he Studied Divinity till 1535. He afterwards went to Louvain, and took ſeveral Journies into ſeveral Provinces of the Low-Countries, and into Germany, whereby the Attempts his Friends had made without his Knowledge, to get him a Benefice, proved ineffectual; for when it had been repreſented to Carondilet, Arch-biſhop of Palermo and Chancellor of the Emperor, that Hyperius had Travelled in Germany, he was ſo ſuſpected of Hereſy, that it was his buſineſs to think of a Retreat. He went over into England, and lived above four years with (A) an Engliſh Gentleman a lover of Learning. He croſs'd the Sea again in 1541, with a deſign to ſee the Univerſity of Strasburg, and particularly Bucer, who render'd it very famous; but going by the way of the Country of Heſſe, he met with Feldenbaur at Marpurg, a Profeſſor of Divinity, who was one of his Friends, who to retain him, gave him hopes of an employ in the Univerſity of that Town. He actually ſtaid there, and a little while after ſucceeded his Friend who Died in January 1542. He Exerciſed that Function ſomewhat more than two years without Marrying; but thinking he could not live conveniently without a Wife, eſpecially his Health being none of the beſt (a Reaſon which diſcourages many from ſuch a Thought) he Married in 1544. a Widow, by whom he had ſix Sons and four Daughters. He Died at Marpurg the firſt of February 1564, having exerciſed his Profeſſion of Divinity above 22 years with the greateſt Application. He wrote many Books, (B) ſome of which have been Copied (C) by a Doctor of Louvain. He Laboured eſpecially to teach the Students in Divinity a good Method of Preaching. He had a very clever Wit; and beſides his skill in Languages, Hiſtory, Philoſophy and Divinity he had an excellent Art of Teaching. He uſed himſelf to it very early; for when he Studied at Paris he was a Private Maſter to many Scholars. He was

(C) As was for his turn.] John Hilten (a) a Monk of Henae in Thuringia, being put into Priſon for having reproved ſome Monaſtical abuſes, 'when he was very Sick, ſent for the Guardian 'and told him, I have ſpoke no great matter againſt 'Monkery, but there ſhall come one in the year 1516. 'who ſhall overturn it, and they ſhall not be able to 'reſiſt him. And in that very year Luther began to 'Preach. Du Pleſſis Mornai is out by one year, for Lutheraniſm began not till 1517. I believe alſo that he miſtakes the Place, and that he ſhould have ſaid Eiſenae inſtead of Henae. He ſhould have added, that the thing happened about the year 1500 (b) according to Melanchthon.

(A) With an Engliſh Gentleman a lover of Learning.] He was the Son of William Montjoy, whom Eraſmus that was infinitely oblig'd to him, has ſo much prais'd. (c) In Carolum Montjoium, Guilielmi filium, Baronem inedit (Hyperius) quem Eraſmus Roterodamus ampliſſimè in ſcriptis ſuis ac ſæpè commendat. Is amicè cum Hyperio multis ac variis de rebus collocutus cùm ingenium ejus perſpexiſſet, oblato liberali ſtipendio, domum ſuam eum invitavit, ubi annos quatuor amplius ſuaviſſimè Hyperius cum Montjoio vixit in otio literario. Note that in Paul Freherus's (d) Theatrum we find Montiſius inſtead of Montjoius, and that tho' Eraſmus Dedicated his Livy to Montjoy the Son, and ſpoke well of him in ſome other Places, yet thoſe great and frequent Praiſes mention'd here can properly belong only to the Father. The Son was ſtill very young when Eraſmus Died (e).

(B) He wrote many Books.] If we may believe Verheiden, Hyperius's Writings that are Publiſh'd would make ſeven Volumes in Folio. Some of them concern Rhetorick, Logick, Arithmetick, Geometry, Coſmography, Aſtronomy, Opticks, Phyſicks, &c. Others are either Commentaries upon the Scripture, or Treatiſes of Divinity. His Book de recte formando Theologiæ ſtudio, and another de formandis concionibus ſacris, were ſo well approved by a Doctor of Louvain, that he inſerted them almoſt intire in the Books he Publiſhed upon the ſame Subject at Antwerp in the year 1565. Hyperius was but a young Student, when he made an Oration (f) at Paris, which has been ſince Printed, in Praiſe (g) of one of his Friends.

(C) Which have been Copied by a Doctor of Louvain.] Valerius (h) Andreas owns it. This Doctor was a Spaniſh Monk of the Order of St. Auguſtin, named Laurentius à Villavicentio. He is often quoted for a famous Plagiary. The firſt Author that I have found to take notice of it, was the Learned Raynoldus; he mentions it in the fourth Chapter of the firſt Book of his Treatiſe de Idololatria Romana Printed in the year 1596. and he obſerves that this Monk Corrected all that in Hyperius diſguſted the Church of Rome. Some time after Keckerman (i) mentioned the ſame Filching, owning that Raynoldus had obſerved it before. (k) Voetius ſpoke of it, quoting Keckerman in a Theſis maintained in 1655. But he would have this ſloſſem Work to be Hyperius's Method of Divinity. Now that Method has only three Books, whereas the Work that Raynold, Keckerman and the Bibliographer of the Low-Countries, ſay the Spaniſh Monk Adopted, has four, and is commonly quoted by this Title, de ratione ſtudii Theologici. Certainly this laſt is not the ſame Book with Hyperius's Methodus Theologiæ. We muſt believe that Voetius has not been altogether exact. Mr. Colomies (l) likewiſe mentions this Robbery, citing Raynoldus. Mr. Racius (m) mentions it only upon the credit of one of his Friends who wrote to him, that Simon Oomius ſpoke of it in the ſecond Preface of a Dutch Book; and both he and Mr. Konig (n) will have this Plagiariſm to reſpect the Book Intituled Method of Divinity. A Modern Author (o) cites upon it not only Keckerman and Colomies, but alſo John Heilfeld cap. 25. Sphingis Theologicæ Philoſophicæ. 'Tis to be obſerv'd that none of theſe Authors except Valerius Andreas, ſpeaks of the double Plagiariſm of the Spaniſh Monk; they only obſerve that which relates to the Book Intituled de ſtudio Theologico. But on the other Hand Nicolas Antonio does not only ſay, that Villavicentius took all that he thought good in two Books of Hyperius, to make two others upon the ſame Subject; but beſides aſcribes to him the ſame Conduct with reſpect to two other Proteſtant Books; one is de Phraſibus ſacræ Scripturæ; the other is Tabulæ compendioſæ was modeſt in publick Entertainments, affable and civil in Converſation; and as he hated (D) an Extravagant way of Drinking in great Glaſſes, and that vain Jeſting, which is too much uſed in our Converſations, ſo he equally delighted in well regulated Treats, and agreeable Diſcourſes. In a word, he was a Man of a true Wit, attended with Virtue and Zeal. Thoſe who would know more of him, may read the Writers I quote †. There is ſome difference between Verheiden's and Melchior Adam's (E) Account. I can ſcarce believe (F) that Hyperius had been a Monk. HIPPARCHIA, the Wife of the Philoſopher Crates, was ſo charm'd with the Diſcourſes of that Cynick, that ſhe was reſolved to Marry him at any rate. She had a great many Admirers, whoſe Nobility, Riches and genteel Carriage were Extraordinary. She was importun'd by her Family to make choice of a Husband amongſt thoſe Rivals; but nothing could bring her off from Crates. She declar'd that ſhe valued him above all the World, and that if ſhe had him not, ſhe would Stab her ſelf. The Family upon this Declaration, Addreſs'd themſelves to Crates, intreating him to uſe his Eloquence and Authority with her, to cure her of her Paſſion. He us'd all his Wits, without gaining any thing upon her Obſtinacy. At laſt when he ſaw all his Arguments and Counſels were of no Weight, he diſplaid (A) his Poverty before her, he diſcovered his Crooked Back, he laid his Staff, his Wallet, and his Cloak upon the Ground, ſaying to her, See here the Man that you'll have, and the Goods that you'll ſtock with him; conſider well of it, you can't become my Wife without leading the Life which our Sect prescribes. He had ſcarce made an end of ſpeaking, but ſhe declared

(D) As he hated an Extravagant way of Drinking in great Glaſſes.] See what his Funeral Oration ſays of it; (a) In colloquiis & converſationibus humanus & æquus, & quemadmodum immania illa in conviviis hominum pocula, & ſcurriles in colloquiis nugas ex animo fuit averſatus, ita moderatis conviviis, jucundiſque amicorum conſalutationibus nonnunquam interfuit.

(E) Between Verheiden's and Melchior Adam's Account.] Verheiden has made but a very ſhort Elogy; but the other's Account is larger and more Chronological. The latter, does not ſay that Hyperius Travell'd into Spain: He only ſays that he ſaw the Provinces of Italy between the Alps and Bologna; and that, during his Studies in Paris, and Louvain. He makes him firſt teach Philology at Marpurg, and afterwards Divinity. Melchior Adam ſays nothing of his Profeſſing Philoſophy.

(F) I can ſcarce believe that Hyperius had been a Monk.] The Extract of his Funeral Oration does not ſpeak of it: We may be ſure then that Wigandus Orthius has not ſaid it; for it would be a thing that Melchior Adam would not have paſs'd over in ſilence, altho' he had given but a Curſory Draught, and not a long relation fill'd with a hundred Particularities. However I would not truſt to that Reaſon; I have ſought and at laſt found Wigandus Orthius's Oration, and I can ſee nothing in it that can give me any ſuſpicion that Hyperius was ever a Monk. Let it not be objected to me that this is a Negative way of Reaſoning: I do no. pretend to plead the Cauſe of that way of Arguing (b); but I care ſay it is here concluſive, both becauſe he that made Hyperius's Funeral Oration, could not be Ignorant whether he had been a Monk or not, and becauſe if he knew it, all the Reaſon in the World obliged him to obſerve it. No Body went about to conceal theſe ſort of Truths concerning Muſculus, Marlorat, Peter Martyr, Zanchius, and many other Pillars of the growing Reformation who came from the Cloiſters, and there could not be perhaps a Man more incapable of ſilence upon things of this Nature than Orthius. He who thought himſelf obliged to tell in a Funeral Oration, that Hyperius went to wait for his Cloaths at Marpurg, becauſe (c) he knew he could live cheaper there than in any other place on the Banks of the Rhine. He tells you a hundred particulars like this, which Melchior Adam has faithfully Copied. And therefore I don't ſee that Mr. Moreri could ſay without being miſtaken, that Hyperius was a Monk of the Order of St. Dominick, in which he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his Learning; but that he afterwards baſely Apoſtatized. In this he has been only the Tranſcriber of Valerius Andreas, who had told that Lie before. This Bibliographer of the Low-Countries, who is beſides miſtaken in placing Hyperius's Death in the year 1560, is not excuſable for not having ſaid at laſt, that Hyperius was a Miniſter at Marpurg; and Moreri who has ſaid it, ought to be blamed for his ſilence about his Profeſſing Divinity. His want of exactneſs appears alſo in this Expreſſion. He fell into the Errors of Luther which he Taught. To what end is this laſt Remark expreſt in an indeterminate Manner. Was it not enough for him to have given him the Title of a Proteſtant Miniſter at the firſt Line of the Article? Did not that import that Hyperius taught the Proteſtant Doctrine? Beſides, it is not true that he followed the Reformation of Luther, the Index (e) of Prohibited Books might have redreſt Mr. Moreri upon that Point.

He led her to the Portico. 'Twas one of the moſt Sumptuous Publick Buildings, and the moſt frequented of all others, and there he Conſummated the Marriage. All the People might have ſeen it, and the Spouſe was reſolved to entertain the Company with that Shew; but a Friend of Crates ſpread on his Cloak about them, and made a ſort of a Curtain of it, which Screen'd them from the view of the Spectators. To ſhew that I lend nothing to my Author, I will ſet down his Words. (b) *Adcoque ut Crates; exſtiterat; ut ſenex nobilis, ſpretis juvenibus proceris, vilem eam ſibi optaverit. He adds that Mr. Petit the Phyſician has made a fine Poem upon the Amours and Nuptials of this Cynick. This Poem is called Cynogamia. Many will call to mind here a French Verſe, mentioned by Furetiere, (d) Voulurent chauds de reins faire noces de chien.

(B) She went a Feaſting with him.] This, and the Cuſtom of Rambling about with Crates, were two things not practiced by the other Grecian Women. They were ſhut up in the middle of the Houſe, and were Viſited by none but their Relations, and never went to Dine but at their Relations Houſes. Cornelius Nepos, who relates it, obſerves that the Romans had quite contrary Cuſtoms. Women lived then at Rome, as they do now at Paris. The Mode of Italy is quite chang'd: It has for a long time reſembled that of Antient Greece. Altri tempi, altri cuſtumi. Let us ſee the Words of Cornelius Nepos: (e) Quem Romanorum pudet uxorem ducere in convivium? Aut cujus materfamilias non primum locum tenet ædium, atque in celebritate verſatur? Quod multo ſit aliter in Græcia. Nam neque in convivium adhibetur, niſi propinquorum; neque ſedet niſi in interiore parte ædium, quæ γυναικωνῖτις appellatur: quo nemo accedit niſi propinquâ cognatione conjunctus.

(C) Conjugal Duty in the middle of the Streets.] We need not wonder that Hipparchia ſet her ſelf above Cuſtom with reſpect to the two Points I have mentioned, when ſhe was able to trample upon decorum with reſpect to the third. The Contempt of Cuſtom cannot be carried farther. This was a great Triumph of Love; ſhe Sacrificed to it the Virtue that is moſt Natural to the fair Sex, that Shame or that Modeſty, which is a thouſand times deeper Rooted in the Heart of Women, than Chaſtity it ſelf. And what is more ſtrange, Hipparchia was prepar'd for this Impudence all at once; there was no need of leading her to it by degrees. Juvenal obſerves that when the buſineſs is to ſatisfy Love, there is nothing inſuperable to Women. Are they to go on Ship-Board with their Husbands whom they don't like, they know not how to reſolve upon it; the Perils and Inconveniencies of the Sea diſcourage 'em. But are they to Embark with a Gallant, they have the beſt Stomach in the World for it, and a Tarpaulin's Life is a pleaſure to 'em (f). Hipparchia juſtified this Obſervation; ſhe doted upon Crates; He would have her to ſhake off all Shame, non aliter hæc ſæva conſtant, ſaid he to her in all likelihood: She would do it to Gratify him. Many Authors report the Fact. Sextus Empiricus (g) and Theodoret (h) Witneſs it; I have already cited others. But St. Auſtin had a very particular thought upon this Subject; he believed that the Cynicks uſed only Poſtures and vain Efforts. Illum (Diogenem) vel illos qui hoc feciſſe referuntur, potius abbitror concumbentium motus dediſſe oculis hominum neſcientium quid ſub pallio gereretur, quàm humano premente conſpectu potuiſſe illam peragi voluptatem. Ibi enim Philoſophi non erubeſcebant videri ſe velle concumbere, ubi libido ipſa erubeſcere furgere (i). A Modern has ſet up for a Cato againſt this Father of the Church, and has given him a very ſevere Reprimand for that Thought. St. Auſtin adds, ſays he, 'that he cannot believe that Diogenes and 'thoſe of his Sect, who are reported to have done 'every thing in Publick, injoyed a real Pleaſure; he 'thinks they only imitated under the Cynick Cloak, 'the motions of thoſe that Couple, impoſing by that 'means upon the Eyes of the Spectators. . . . . 'I am aſhamed to mention this, and I deſire you to 'Read his own Words (k). ——— How could 'ſo great a Man allow himſelf the Liberty of di'ving into thoſe Cynical Secrets? How could St. 'Auſtin's Hand lift up Diogenes's Cloak, to let 'us ſee ſome motions, which Shame (tho' that 'Philoſopher Profeſt to have none) Made him 'hide with his own Cloak (l).

(D) To have no ſhame of any Corporal Exerciſe.] Some think the Cynicks had their Name, becauſe like Dogs they lay with their Wives in the Street: Nam quid ego de Cynicis loquar? Quibus in propatulo coire cum conjugibus mos fuit. Quid mirum ſi à canibus quorum vitam imitantur, etiam vocabulum nomenque traxerunt (m)? The Cynicks pretended they went upon Reaſon, for ſaid they, if it be Lawful to know ones Wife, 'tis Lawful to know her in Publick: But it is Lawful to know ones Wife, therefore 'tis Lawful to know her in Publick. Hoc illi canini Philoſophi, hoc eſt Cynici non viderunt proferentes contra humanam verecundiam, quid aliud quam caninam, hoc eſt immundam impudentemque ſententiam, ut ſcilicet quoniam juſtum eſt quod fit in uxore, palam non pudeat id agere, nec in viſo, nec in platea qualibet conjugalem concubitum devitare (n). 'Tis a wretched Sophiſm, à dicto ſimpliciter ad dictum ſecundum quid. 'Tis as if one ſhould ſay; 'tis good to drink Wine, therefore 'tis good to drink it in a Fever. Theſe People did not know that there are many Actions that are good, but in ſome Circumſtances, the Omiſſion of which may render an Action evil, which with them would have been good. To lend Money to a Friend in order to pay his Debts is a very commendable Action: But to lend it him to make himſelf Drunk, or to Game, is an evil Action. There are ſome Actions eſſentially evil; which cannot be good under any Circumſtances; but there are ſome things which are good or evil according to the Times, and Places and other Circumſtances, wherein they are committed. I confeſs that this is not ſufficient to Non-plus the Cynicks; for they might turn their Argument thus. When a thing is good and Lawful in it ſelf, one ought not to be aſhamed of doing it: But the Conjugal Duty 'tis in it ſelf a thing good and Lawful; and therefore one ought not to be aſhamed of paying it: And conſequently it may be Lawfully paid in Publick. For if any thing could ſpoil that publick Action, it would be only want of ſhame in ſome Circumſtances, wherein Men are obliged to be aſhamed. The difficulty then comes to this one Queſtion. Ought one to be aſhamed of paying the Conjugal Duty in the Face of the World? A pretty queſtion, you will ſay; who can doubt it? Diogenes would Anſwer, I do, and do you prove that I am in the wrong. The Anſwer to him would be, that ſhame with Relation to theſe Actions is a Natural Impreſſion, and that therefore 'tis to offend againſt Nature not to be aſhamed in theſe Occurrences. But, he would reply, that if it were a Natural Sentiment, the Animals, which ſo faithfully follow the Inſtincts of Nature, would ſeek Shades and dark Receſſes for the work of Multiplication. Now nothing is more falſe than this. At leaſt all Men would in the like Caſes ſeek the darkeſt Retreat, which ſtill is falſe; for many People in the Indies Propagate in the Eyes of all the World. This is what the famous Pyrrhoniſt Sextus Empiricus obſerves (p) in order to ſhew, that the common Practice is not Grounded upon an immutable and Eternal nal Law of Nature, but upon a meer Custom, and the Impression of Education. He might have alledged the Custom of the Mosynians, whose Article may be seen. A modern Author has observed, that some Nations have made Love 'in the Temples, 'and said, that if that Action displeased the Deity, 'he would not suffer it in other Animals (a). He adds, that a 'Mahometan Sect practises the same at 'this Day, and that the new World appear'd to us 'in that Innocence. It might be replied to Diogenes, that 'tis enough that the civiliz'd Nations are subject to Shame, and that it is nothing to us what the barbarous Nations do; but he would reply in his Turn, that the People we call Barbarous, have less departed from the Rule of Nature, than the People who have so much multiply'd by their Subtilties of Wit, the Laws of Decency and Civility; and that in fine, natural Right being not subject to Prescription, every one is permitted to repossess himself of it in all Times and Places, without any regard to the Arbitrary Yoke of Customs, and the Opinion of his Fellow-Citizens.

A REFLECTION upon the Weakness of Reason.

This shews how humane Reason can lead us astray. It was given us to direct us in the right way; but it proves an Instrument that is Desultory, waveving and supple, and which turns every way like a Weather-Cock. See how the Cynicks make use of it to justify their abominable Impudence. I may add for the Honour and Glory of the true Religion, that it furnishes us with the best Weapons against the Sophistry of these People; for though we could not shew in Scripture, any formal Precept, for hiding the Privacies of Marriage in the dark, it suffices to say in the first Place, that the Spirit of the Scripture engages us to avoid whatever may slacken the Impressions of Shame; and secondly, that there are precise Texts, forbidding us every thing that shocks decorum, or scandalizes our Neighbour. I do not know whether any of the Casuists, who have so much abused their Leisure in examining many Cases of Conscience, that are Metaphysical in some Respects, have ever thought to what kind of Crime the Impudence of a Crates, or of a Diogenes ought to be reduc'd. They did not believe there was any Divine Law about it, nor that a Man was obliged to conform to Municipal Customs. They believ'd that Non-Conformity in such Cases would at most incur the blame of Rusticity, and want of Complaisance to a received Custom: to be incivil, ill-bred, and an ill Observer of Fashions, is no criminal or evil Action, morally speaking. What then could be said against the Cynicks, without condemning them by reveal'd Truth? I have never read any thing whatever upon this Point, and I don't know whether any one has said, that at present a Cynical Action would only be criminal: 1. Because of the Scandal given to one's Neighbour. 2. Because of the Contempt of the Municipal Customs. 3. Because of the Negligence of preserving the Barriers of Chastity. I suppose a Man perswaded, that the Action in it self is not verbally forbidden in Scripture, nor contrary to the Law of Nature. If it was contrary to it, the Sentences that command a Congress, would be so many Crimes chargeable upon the Judges.

Diogenes was guilty of a most impudent and abominable Practice in publick. 'Tis a very strange and scandalous thing, to see Chrysippus, that celebrated and rigid Stoick, praise that infamous Action (b). Sextus Empiricus owns, that it was look'd upon as detestable, tho' Zeno, the Founder of the Stoicks, and many others, approved it. To conclude, the Cynicks in vain sought out Arguments to colour their abominable Impudence. They durst not continue in it. The publick Indignation was probably a stronger Bridle for them, than the Idea's of Virtue. St. Augustin observes, that at last a natural Modesty got the better of this sort of People. (c) Vicit tamen pudor naturalis opinionem hujus erroris, nam etsi perlibent, hoc aliquando gloriabundum facisse Diogenem, ita se tantemisse sam suam nobilitatem futurum, si in hominum memoriam inferior ejus impudentia regeretur, postea tamen à Cynicis fieri cessatum est: plusque valuit pudor ut erubescerent homines hominibus, quàm error, ut homines canibus esse similes abhorrerent. But as there are always some Exceptions to the most general Rules, we see in Lucian the Cynick Peregrinus, coming near the Conduct of Diogenes. (d) ὁ δὲ πολλὰ δὴ καὶ ἄλλα ἐπιδειξάμενος ἄξια ἀκούειν, τὰ μὲν ἄλλα ἐᾶν, τὰ δὲ ἀπόῤῥητα δὴ καὶ μόνοις ἐπιτήδεια εἰπεῖν.

Those who think it strange, that I should mention such impudent Actions, ought to be reminded of the Privileges or Duties of an Historian. Whoever at present writes the History, either of an ancient Philosopher, or of any other Person who has acquired a Name in the preceding Ages, has the Liberty of relating whatever he finds in Books, whether it deserves the Praise or the Horror and Execration of the Reader; and if he should be contented to collect only what is commendable, he would very ill discharge the Duties which the Nature of his Work requires of him. In writing the Life of a Modern, there is more Liberty allow'd; for if he has committed beastly Actions, unknown to the World, they may be past over in Silence, according as one thinks it necessary to prevent some Inconveniencies, that might arise from the Publication of such things. But when the Business is about a Fact mention'd by a Hundred Authors, we are no longer Masters of the like Caution; and if one chooses to suppress it, 'tis a useless Scruple, since the Readers will easily find some other way, what you are so industrious to conceal from them. The Impudence of Diogenes the Cynick, is so well known in the World, that some Jests go about of him, which are not founded on the Testimony of any ancient Writer. 'Du Maustier put 'me in mind of a Book of the same Orleans, intitu-'led, The Human Plant to the Queen: 'tis a ridicu-'lous Title, which makes me remember Diogenes's 'Plante Hominem. These Words are Cardinal Du Perron's. Abundance of People tell the same thing in their ordinary Conversations. 'Tis found in a great many Books, where 'tis said, that Diogenes embracing a Woman in the middle of the Streets, being asked what he did? Answered, φυτεύω ἄνθρωπον, I plant a Man. No Antient that I know of, tells the Story, and Mr. Du Rondel, whom I have consulted upon it, answer'd me, that he had never found it but in Modern Authors. Now when a Story so ill grounded, is spread about the Impudence of this ancient Philosopher; 'tis not likely that People should be ignorant of what has been said of him by the Authors whom I quote. To what end then should I suppress these Facts? I desire likewise the Reader to observe, that when infamous Actions are but faintly represented, they do not so strongly produce the Horror and Indignation they deserve. I add, that 'tis more useful and important than People are aware of, to mention the horrible Abominations which the Pagan Philosophers approv'd. This may humble and mortify human Reason, and convince us of the infinite Corruption of Man, and teach us a Truth, of which we should be always mindful, namely, that Man wanted a revealed Light to supply the defect of the Philosophical; for you see, that the Stoicks, who cultivated Morality beyond the other Philosophers, and had very sublime Ideas of it, did nevertheless approve the beastly Obscenities of Diogenes. To them we may particularly apply the general Declaration of St. Paul against the Heathens, (f) Thinking themselves wise, they became Fools.

(E) Made a subtle Objection to him.] It was a Sophism easie to be resolved and retorted. 'If I did, 'said she, the same Action which you could justly 'do, I could not be accused of having done an unjust 'Action: Now if you should beat your self, you would 'do justly; therefore if I beat you, I can't be accus'd 'of having done an unjust Action. Theodorus did not stand to answer her as a Logician; he threw him-himself upon her, and untied her Cleaths. According to the present way of dressing one self, and speaking, we might say, he took up her Petticoat. 'Tis the Explication which Mr. Menage (g) gives these Words of Diogenes Laertius, ἀνέτρεψε ἐπὶ τὰ ὑποκάτω. Here is a brisk and gallant way of answering the Sophistry of a Woman. Hipparchia was not out of Countenance, and Theodorus having cited a Verse of a Tragedy, representing a Woman who had quitted the Spindle and the Distaff, she answered him, I find my self there, not come to us. Mr. Moreri (G) has committed some Faults upon this Article; and so has Lorenzo Crasso (H). I forgot to say, that Hipparchia and Metrocles her Brother, who was Crates's Disciple, * were born at Maronea *. They flourished in Alexander's time. The product of Hipparchia and Crates's Marriage was a Son called Pasicles †.

HIPPARCHUS, a great Astronomer, a Native of Nicæa in Bithynia, flourished between (A) the 154th, and 163d Olympiad. We have still one of his Works; 'tis his (B) Commentary upon the Phænomena of Aratus. Mr. Rohault (C) is grossly out in saying, this Astronomer did not know the particular Motion of the fixed Stars, from the West to the East, which varies their Longitude. Pliny makes frequent and very honourable Mention of Hipparchus. He places him in the Number of those sublime Genius's,

I am that Woman; but do you think I have made an ill Choice, rather to spend my time in Philosophising, than in Spinning? Let us now see what Theodorus might have answered her, if he would have given himself that Trouble. Answering directly, he might have said, that the Action of Theodorus beating himself, and that of Hipparchia beating Theodorus, were two different Actions, and not one Action of the same Species. There were therefore four Terms in Hipparchia's Syllogism. To the end that two Actions may be alike, 'tis requisite there should be the same Relation in both, betwixt the Agent and the Patient; but such a Relation was not to be found in Hipparchia's Hypothesis. If Theodorus had been willing to answer by way of Retortion, and puzzle Crates's Wife, he might have done it thus: If I do the same Action which your Husband might lawfully do, I can't be accus'd of an unjust Action. But your Husband acts lawfully when he kisses you, &c. therefore if I kiss you, &c. I cannot be accus'd of doing an unjust Action. One might have seen, whether Hipparchia, who was a brazen-fac'd Woman, durst have answered him before Witnesses, Concedo totum.

(A) Between the 154th, and 163d, Olympiad.] We have the strongest Argument that can be for it, since it is drawn from the Astronomical Observations which he made in that interval of Time. Ptolemy relates some of them (f). Vossius had reason for his placing Hipparchus under the Reigns of Ptolemy Philometer, and Ptolemy Evergetes, and for censuring Suidas, who contented himself to say, this Astronomer liv'd in the time of the Roman Consuls; he should have denoted a more determinate Time; that of the third Punick War, and that of the War of Numantia. So far Vossius is on sure Ground; but when he says he agrees with Suidas as to the time (g) of Hipparchus, he forgets himself, and is guilty of an Untruth; for Suidas no more agrees with Vossius upon that Point, than with an Author who should place Hipparchus at the beginning of the IVth. Century of Rome, or at the end of the Vth. Calvisius (h) err'd in saying, that Suidas has placed Hipparchus 130 Years after the first of the Ptolemies. A French Author (i) is no less mistaken in affirming, that Hipparchus lived in the Time of Plato. Moreri, who had no other Author but Vossius upon this Article, might sure have found an infallible Preservative against the Faults he has made. He has placed Hipparchus in the Year 570, and 80 of Rome, under the Reigns of Ptolemy and Philometer Evergetes Kings of Egypt. Ought he not to have made the time betwixt the 580th Year of Rome, and the 625th, correspond to the Olympiads (k) set down by Vossius? Besides, when one says barely Ptolemy, 'tis a sign one speaks of the first Prince of that Name who reigned in Egypt; and there are few exact Writers, but more precisely denote him. 'Tis therefore a gross Fault to use the Word Ptolemy simply, and absolutely, when one means not him who had Egypt to his Share, after the Death of Alexander. 'Tis plain, Moreri does not speak of him, or if he doth, he commits a great Blunder; for a Man who liv'd in the 570th. and 80th Year of Rome, could not possibly flourish under the first Ptolemy, who died in the 468th Year of Rome. He is mistaken in another thing; he supposes there was a King of Egypt, called Philometer Evergetes.

(B) For his Commentary upon the Phænomena of Aratus.] 'Tis properly a Critical Book upon Aratus; for Hipparchus accuses him of having pillag'd Eudoxus's Books, and even in those Things wherein Eudoxius was mistaken. He finds the same Fault with Aratus the Grammarian, who had made a Commentary upon Aratus. The first Publisher of Hipparchus's Commentary was Peter Victorius. Petavius has given us a more correct Edition of it, and has added a Latin Translation of his own (l). The other Works of Hipparchus were de Confirmatione stellarum inerrantium, & statione immota, deque mensurno luna motu secundum latitudinem (m) &c.

(C) Mr. Rohault is grossly out.] Great Mathematicians, like him, are not commonly well vers'd in the Knowledge of matters of Fact (n), and Historical Blunders frequently escape them. However, let us see what this excellent Cartesian says, who by the sole Orthography of the Word Hipparchus, shews that he did not understand Greek.

Genius's, who by the Prediction of Eclipſes diſcovered that Men ought not to be ſurpriz'd at theſe Phænomena; and that the Gods themſelves (E) were Subjected to ſome Laws. He admires him for having taken a Review of the Stars, for having counted them, and obſerved their Situation and Magnitudes, which put his Poſterity in a Capacity of diſcovering not only whether they are Born and Die, but alſo whether they change their Place, and increaſe or leſſen. We learn from this Paſſage

'Hipparchus, ſays he (a), lived the greateſt part of his Life, without making any other Obſervation about the fixed Stars, than that they had a Motion from Eaſt to Weſt, in Circles which he thought exactly parallel to the Equator; which made him conclude, that they were all inchaſed in one and the ſame ſolid Heaven, (which is called the Firmament) which he placed above all the Planets: And becauſe he did not think it was neceſſary that the Heaven ſhould borrow this ſimple Motion from any other Heaven above it; he maintain'd it was the laſt of all the Heavens, and that it ſerv'd to draw all the others the way that it turn'd, and ſo was the Primum Mobile. Hipparchus being then of this Opinion, that the fixed Stars did not change their Place in the Heaven, he thought they might ſerve to determine the Periods of the Planets, juſt as Rocks in the Sea may ſerve to point out the Courſes of the Ships, which leave no Footſteps of their Paſſage behind 'em. He imploy'd therefore his Induſtry in meaſuring the Diſtance betwixt every fixed Star, and the Sun's Ecliptick, which is called the Latitude of a Star; then to determine the Number of Degrees, and Minutes of the Ecliptick, which are reckon'd from Weſt to Eaſt, from the firſt Point of Aries to the Point over-againſt which every Star correſponds, which is called the Longitude; but Death having prevented him, Poſterity only could execute his Deſigns. Ptolemy, who lived about Two hundred Years after Hipparchus, propoſed to ſettle the Motions of the Planets; and having had the Curioſity to obſerve, whether his Predeceſſor had been exact in obſerving the Longitudes and Latitudes of the fixed Stars, he found that their Latitude was juſt as Hipparchus had obſerv'd it, but that the Longitude was augmented two Degrees. He concluded from thence, that beſides the Motion the fixed Stars had from Eaſt to Weſt in Twenty four Hours, they had another from Weſt to Eaſt in Circles parallel to the Ecliptick, by which being advanced two Degrees in two Hundred Years, Thirty ſix thouſand Years would accompliſh their entire Revolution. And whereas the Firmament could have but one Motion, which was properly its own, he attributed to it that Thirty ſix thouſand Years, and maintain'd, that it borrow'd its Diurnal Motion from Eaſt to Weſt, from a Heaven beyond it. And thus it began to be believ'd, that the Primum Mobile was a Heaven, which had no Stars in it, and which embrac'd the Firmament.

(b) Regis ſyſtême de Philoſophie Tom. 3. p. 42. & 43. Edition of Lions 1691. in 12.

Mr. Regis (b) another great Carteſian, advanced the ſame Thing in fewer Words; but Mr. Gadroys, another excellent Carteſian, well knew, that the Diſcovery of the particular Motion of the fixed Stars towards the Eaſt, ought to be aſcribed to Hipparchus (c). Probably he had made a greater Attention than others to a thing which Gaſſendus has related. 'Tis this: the Chaldeans, Ægyptians and Greeks, believ'd that all the fixed Stars were ſituated in the Concave of the higheſt Heaven, and conſequently of the Primum Mobile, and therefore had no Motion, but from Eaſt to Weſt upon the Poles of the Equator. But at laſt, Hipparchus 130 Years before Jeſus Chriſt, found that this Hypotheſis could not ſubſiſt; for having conſider'd, that by Timocharis's Obſervation, made 200 Years before, there were Eight Degrees betwixt the Sword of Virgo towards the Weſt, and the Point of the Autumnal Equinox, and that he could find but Six Degrees Diſtance betwixt that Star, and that Point of the Firmament, he concluded, that the Stars muſt have a Motion of their own from Weſt to Eaſt upon the Poles of the Ecliptick and that if the Obſervation of Timocharis was juſt, the Progreſs of the fixed Stars by that particular Motion, was one Degree every Hundred Years. He wrote ſome Treatiſes upon this new Doctrine. (d) Quare & intellexit ſi Timocharis quidem vitæ obſervaſſet, ac ſtella moveri ſic perſeverarent, peragi hoc motu unum gradum intra annos proximè centum. Intellexit præterea debere hunc motum fieri ſecundum Zodiacum, ſeu ſuper Ecliptica Polis, idque prodidit tam in Tractatu, quam inſcripſit de tranſgreſſu Æquinoctialium Solſtitialiumque punctorum, quâm in eo, quem conſcripſit de Anni magnitudine, ut ad Ptolemæum habetur. Note, That Gaſſendus doth not obſerve exactly the Age of Timocharis; for that Aſtronomer flouriſhed about the 121ſt. Olympiad, 130 Years only before the firſt Obſervations of Hipparchus, of which Ptolemy makes mention. That Fault of Gaſſendus is much more tolerable than that of Mr. Gadroys (e).

(c) He reckons but two hundred years between Timocharis and Ptolemy the Aſtronomer, Sect. 7. p. 30. but he ſhould have reckon'd above four hundred. Rohault, who reckons two hundred years between Hipparchus and Ptolemy, is happier; for he ſhould have reckon'd but three hundred. Gadroys, who reckons 265. years between theſe two Aſtronomers.

Hipparchus did ſo carefully obſerve what concerns Eclipſes, that he found out the Proportions of their Intervals (k). He obſerved that the Eclipſes of the Moon might return at five Months end, and the Eclipſes of the Sun at ſeven, and that the Sun might be Eclipſed twice in the ſpace of thirty Days with reſpect to different parts of the Earth. Intra ducentos annos Hipparchi ſagacitate compertum eſt & lunæ defectum aliquando quinto menſe a priore fieri, ſolis vero ſeptimo: eundem bis in triginta diebus ſupra terras occultari, ſed ab aliis atque aliis videri. Theſe Words of Pliny have been miſunderſtood by ſome. There is a very Learned Man, who thought that by intra ducentos annos, was meant that two Ages muſt intervene to the end, that an Eclipſe of a Moon may ſucceed another, at five Months end. This (l) is not Pliny's meaning, but that Hipparchus had diſcover'd that Proportion two hundred years before. Pliny is right in his Chronology, there being two Centuries betwixt Pliny and that famous Aſtronomer.

HIPPOMANES. There is in the Project of this Dictionary a long Article upon Hippomanes. I don't put it here, having chang'd the deſign of giving Promiſcuouſly, Real, and Perſonal Articles; but I'll place this Article at the end of this Work by the way of Diſſertation.

HIPPONAX, a Greek Poet, Born at Epheſus liv'd not in the 23*d* Olympiad as (A) Euſebius has given out, but in the 60th, as we are certify'd by Pliny *. Being Expell'd out of Epheſus †, by the Tyrants Athenagoras and Comas, he went and ſettled at (B) Clazomenæ. He was Ugly, Little, and Slender ‡; But his Uglineſs has by Accident been the cauſe of his Immortality; for he is ſcarce known but by the Satyrical Verſes which he made againſt two Carvers (C), who had ſha p'd him in the moſt Ridiculous Figures imaginable *. He diſcharg'd upon 'em a thundering Legion of Iambick Verſes, which ſo Mortified 'em, that it has been Storied that they Hang'd themſelves for Vexation. Pliny maintains that it is falſe, and proves it by a great number of Statues which they made ſince in the Adjacent Iſlands. Some Authors have written, that they only left Epheſus where Hipponax liv'd. However it be, the Humour and Satyrical Vein of this Poet, diſtinguiſh'd him (D), and do ſo ſtill to this very Day. His ill Tongue † ſpar'd not even thoſe, to whom he owed his Life.

who pretended that the Stars were Gods, ſhould have ſaid, had they Argued Coherently, that the Aſtronomers had diſcovered the weakneſs of the Divine Nature, and its Dependance on a very burdenſom Law, which ſubjected it to a ſort of Death, or Faintneſs, or Slavery. You'll tell me, that the Sun is no leſs Luminous in it ſelf at the time of an Eclipſe, than before, or after; but may not I Anſwer, that a Courier who is ſtopt, loſes nothing of his Vigour, and Health? 'Tis nevertheleſs, a Proof of his ſubmiſſion to a burdenſom Law; 'Tis, in a Word, a ſign of Weakneſs to ſee that he can't continue his Journey. Apply this to the Sun, and you'll find that his Eclipſes are a ſign of imperfection. They hinder him from Enlightening the Earth; he is a Prince, whoſe Couriers are ſtopt, and whoſe Functions are interrupted. If Pliny had purpos'd to Reaſon, he had not drawn the Conſequence, which he has drawn from that Phænomenon: he would not have ſaid that this ought to be a Conſolation to Mortal Men; he would have ſaid, that this proves the Stars to be of no Divine Nature.

(F) We learn from this Paſſage of Pliny.] 'Tis ſo fine, that in giving it intire, I am ſure to pleaſe thoſe, who love not to change Books to ſatisfy fully their Curioſity. (A) As Euſebius has given out.] Scaliger (c) Confutes him by the Paſſage of Pliny; he believed therefore that Pliny was in the right. So far 'tis well: But he adds that Euſebius followed Tatian, and he refers us to his Notes Number 908. in which we find nothing that belongs to Hipponax. In this there is no great exactneſs. Euſebius might alſo be refuted by the Teſtimony of Proclus (d), who ſays that Hipponax Flouriſh'd under the Reign of Darius. He means doubtleſs the Son of Hiſtaſpes, whoſe Reign began in the 64th Olympiad.

(B) Settled at Clazomenæ.] Hence the Poetels Sulpitia deſcribes him in this manner.

Nec (e) trimetro iambo, nec qui pede fractus eodem
Fortiter iraſci diſcit duce Clazomenio.

If what Tanaquillus Faber ſays, be true, namely, that Hipponax liv'd at Epheſus, when he Reveng'd himſelf on thoſe who had inſulted him upon his Uglineſs; he muſt either have returned into his Country, or elſe his Baniſhment did not precede that Adventure. I have ſeen nothing in Pliny, that ſhews that Hipponax was or was not Born at Epheſus, or whether he and the Statuaries whom he Satyriz'd, lived there or not. And yet (f) Mr. Dacier aſſures us, that Pliny is of their Opinion who ſay that Poet's Verſes made his Enemies quit Epheſus. Lloyd and Hofman ſay that Bupalus liv'd at Clazomenæ (g). I believe 'tis a fetch of Reaſoning: they ſaw on one Hand that Hipponax retired into that City, and on the other that Bupalus had Comically repreſented him, and they concluded from theſe two Facts, that Bupalus liv'd at Clazomenæ.

(C) Which he made againſt two Carvers.] They were two Brothers, one called Bupalus and the other Athenis, they were of the Iſle of Chios, the Sons of Anthermus, whoſe Father's Name was Micciades, and the Grandfather's Malas. All theſe were Sculptors from Father to Son in that Iſland; ſo that their Employment (h) might be as Antient there as the Olympiads. Pauſanias (i) ſpeaks of Bupalus with Praiſe, upon occaſion of the Statue of Fortune, and that of the Graces which were at Smyrna of his making. He will have him to have Lived before Pindar. Two Witneſſes ſuch as he and Pliny deſerve the Preference before the Scholiaſt (k) upon Horace, who ſays Bupalus was a Painter, and who has been follow'd in this by Tanaquillus Faber (l) and Mr. Dacier (m), and almoſt all the Dictionaries (n). Suidas attributes to theſe two Brothers, the Profeſſion of Sculpture; and having given the laſt the Name of Athenis, he has occaſioned Father Hardouin to think the Paſſage of Pliny is falſified, where this Carver is called Anthermus. He has therefore put Athenis in the room of that Word. See the Remark E and the Article Bupalus.

(D) His Humour and Satyrical Vein diſtinguiſh'd him.] Hence come thoſe Proverbs we find made uſe of by Cicero. (o) Eum addictum jam tum puto eſſe Calvi Licinii Hipponacteo praconio. Horace (p) Names Hipponax and Archilochus as the two greateſt Satyriſts. The Words of Pliny are theſe: Hipponacti notabilis vultûs fuditas erat: quamobrem imagines ejus laſcivia jocorum ii propoſuere ridentium circulis. Quod Hipponax indignatus amaritudinem carminum diſtrinxit in tantum ut credatur aliquibus ad laqueum eos impuliſſe: quod falſum eſt. There is in the Anthologia (q) three or four Epigrams, which repreſent Hipponax ſtill terrible after his Death. The Paſſengers are adviſ'd to keep far from his Tomb, as being a Place that ſends out dreadful Hail: Φεύγετε τὸν κυνοραίστην τάφον, τὸν ὠμοβρῶτα, fuge grandinantem tumulum horrendum (r).

(f) Ovid. in Ibin, v. 525.

Inviſus pereas, deficiente cibi.

Some Criticks pretend that Ovid did not ſay Athenas, but Athenin, whence it would follow that he ſpeaks here of Hipponax: Qui primus jambum claudicare fecit, & ſcazonta in Bupalum & Athenin compoſuit, ut eſt apud Suidam, ut recte Ovidius, parum ſtabile, id eſt claudum carmen ei tribuat. Theſe are Alciatus's Words in the 18. Chap. of the fifth Book of his Parerga. Turnebus comes pretty near the ſame Thought: Videtur, ſays he, (t) de Hipponacte hoc intelligi qui claudicante & parum ſtabili verſu, id eſt ſcazonte in Bupalum & Athenin invectus eſt Athenienſes: quo in carmine ne Athenis quidem pepercerat. Quid tamen ſi pro Athenas, Athenin ſcribamus, quem ab eo probris onuratum accepimus? Ne hanc quidem lectionem improbarem, etſi alteram delere non auſim. Mr. de Boiſſieu (v) who mentions theſe two Paſſages, obſerves that Sanctius and Vatablus approve them. As for him, he is wholly for that Conjecture, and finds it very probable, that Ovid has mention'd the two Inventers of Iambick Verſes near one another. Now he had been ſpeaking of Archilochus, and we know from Dionyſius Halicarnaſſenſis (a), Clemens Alexandrinus (b), Rufinus (c), and the Poeteſs Sulpitia (d), that Hipponax was the Inventer of the Scazons. Mr. de Boiſſieu might have found fault with Turnebus for ſaying that Hipponax's Enemies were Athenians; for Pliny ſays Expreſly they were of the Iſle of Chios, and that they ſaid ſo in their Works: (e) Quibus ſubjecerunt carmen non vitibus tantum cenſeri Chium, ſed & operibus Anthermi filiorum. There's no ground for what Turnebus ſays that Hipponax did not ſpare the City of Athens in the Verſes he made againſt theſe two Statuaries; 'tis a random Gueſs. A German Miniſter (f) applying the two Verſes of Ovid to Hipponax, goes on thus: Ex Plinio nimirum compertum eſt Athenis vel Athenam ſculptorem in Hipponactis ſcripta incurriſſe, carmina ejus ſuſtuliſſe maledica, authorem verò lethali inedia fuiſſe confectum. Pliny ſays nothing like it.

the Women of the Iſland had not killed the Men out of any (A) Indifference for the Maſculine Sex, but rather out of a Spirit of Revenge, which ſhew'd they were very ſenſible of the ſoft Pleaſures of Love. The Argonautæ Refreſh'd themſelves from the Fatigues of the Sea in the Arms of theſe Widows as long as they pleas'd; neither did Hypſipile forget herſelf: She applied herſelf to their Leader, and was quickly Big with two Boys. If her Fate (B) in that reſpect was not like Dido's, it was in this that Jaſon (C) was as Inconſtant as Æneas. See in the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary what became of Hypſipile, when her Subjects underſtood that ſhe had not kill'd her Father.

HIRPINI, a People of Italy in the Country of the Samnites. They were ſo call'd from a Wolf † that Conducted them when they went to ſettle their Colony. coſt of this Cenſure to ſave them the trouble of gathering together, what I might have ſaid, here and there.

I add a freſh Example to the foregoing. A Poet having preſented to Pope Urban VIII. a Work, whereof the Subject, the Diſpoſition and the Verſes were unbecoming a Chriſtian, he fell upon his Impudence with ſo much Paſſion, as made the poor Wretch Die with Grief and Confuſion. You'll find theſe Words in the third Page of a Book Publiſhed by Father Menestrier at Paris 1681. Intituled des repreſentations en muſique anciennes & modernes.

(A) Out of any indifference for the Maſculine Sex.] They were induced to that Maſſacre, only becauſe the Men had no more to do with them, and diverted themſelves with the Slaves which they had brought from Thrace (y). The Men uſed this Practice becauſe their Wives were grown ſo Stinking that they could not come near them without the greateſt Diſguſt (z). This Stench was an Effect of the Anger of Venus; whether becauſe this Goddeſs was vext at their neglect of Sacrificing to her (aa) for ſome years; or becauſe ſhe conceived an Averſion for the Iſle of Lemnos (bb), for having been caught there in the Fact; for there it was the Gods ſaw her Lying with Mars. Others (cc) ſay, that Medea being Jealous of Hypſipile, threw into that Iſland ſome Drugs, which cauſed them to Stink ſo. 'Tis added, that in proceſs of time they ſmelt ſo ſtrong upon a certain Day every year, that their Husbands and even their own Children could not abide to come near them. 'Tis Diſputed whether this Stink was from their Breath, or in their Arm-Pits. Euſtathius (a) is for the firſt Opinion, and Dion Chryſoſtome (b) for the ſecond. Here are ſome Verſes of Statius in which Hypſipile repreſents the horrible State of the Iſland in the Interregnum of Love:

Protinus (c) à Lemno teneri fugiſtis amores,
Motus Hymen, verſæque faces, & frigida juſti
Cura tori: nulla redeunt in gaudia noctes,
Nullus in amplexu ſopor eſt: odia aſpera ubique
Et furor, & medio recubat diſcordia lecto.

That Interregnum ſeemed ſo intolerable, that it moved them to the Maſſacre before mentioned.

(B) If her Fate in that reſpect was not like Dido's.] For the Amours of poor Dido with Æneas were Barren, and 'twas that which mortified her. I have elſewhere (d) obſerved the difference betwixt her Palate, and that of the Women of theſe laſt Ages. The latter Deſerted by their Gallants at the beginning of the Campaign, are over-joyed that the Pleaſures of the Winter Quarter are paſt over without any Propagation, I make uſe of this Example without excluding thoſe that concern Perſons of other Conditions; I uſe it, I ſay, becauſe the ſtay of the Argonauts in the Iſle of Lemnos may well be compared to a long Winter Quarter. I muſt add that Hypſipile proteſts in the work of a Latin Poet, that ſhe Married the lovely Jaſon againſt her Will.

(e) Cinerem furiaſque nefandi
Teſtor, ut externas non ſponte aut crimine tædas
Attigerim (ſcit cura Deum) etſi blandus Jaſon
Virginibus dare vincla novis.

But a Greek Poet repreſents her ſo much in Love with him at firſt ſight, as to offer him her Kingdom.

(f) Εἰ δέ μιν ἐσιδοῦσα

Sin vero hic
Sedem figere velis, idque allubeſcat tibi, cauſa nihil erit, quin Augearis gramio Thoantis genitoris mei.

Valerius Flaccus in like manner repreſents her touched to the quick with the Charms of this Hero, and fond of Marrying him as ſoon as ſhe ſaw him.

(g) Unius hæret
Alloquio, & blandos paullatim colligit ignes,
Jam non dura thoris, Veneri nec iniqua reverſa.

(C) Jaſon was as inconſtant as Æneas.] He forſook her and his two Children, and purſued his Voyage; ſo that ſhe is one of the Heroines, whoſe ſad Complaints and moving Sighs Ovid has related upon ſeeing themſelves forſaken by the Gallants, to whom they had refus'd nothing. Ariadne, Hypſipile's Grandmother (h), Experienced the ſame Fate. See in Ovid her Complaints againſt Theſeus. I make a Reflection upon this Matter. The Mythological Authors and Modern Writers of Romances have taken two different Methods: The firſt came too near Hiſtory, the latter keep too far from it. I only conſider the deſcription of Manners, or the Character which they give a Hero. In Mythology the Heroins are not only too Amorous, but alſo too Laviſh of their Favours: The Heroes are Inconſtant; they get the Ladies with Child, or do what's neceſſary to it, and then they Laugh at them. This looks too much like Hiſtory, and affords an ill Example (i) to both Sexes. 'Tis better to take the oppoſite Extreme, like our Romancers, and in ſpite of Probability, to feign Heroes and Heroeſſes guiltleſs of any fault.

(A) They trod upon Fire without being Burnt.] Varro who oppugns Superſtition as much as poſſible, having mention'd an Ointment, immediately adds this Reflection; the Hirpini rub the bottoms of their Feet with it, when they are to Walk upon Fire. (k) Varro ubique expugnator religionis, ait, cùm quoddam medicamentum deſcriberet: eo uti ſolent Hirpini ambulaturi per ignem, medicamento plantas ungunt. Theſe Words gives us no Light concerning the Situation of theſe Hirpini; ſo that we can't tell, whether Varro ſpeaks of a People who were part of the Samnites, or whether, as Servius, he gives the Name of Hirpini to the People Inhabiting near Mount Soracte in Tuſcany, and who were properly call'd Hirpi. Many imagine that Varro meant the Samnites called Hirpini, and if ſo, there's a great Probability, that the likeneſs of Names miſled him. They who Walk'd upon Fire were diſtinct from the Samnites, and lived remote enough from them. They were called Hirpi and not Hirpini. The Commentator Servius is miſtaken in the Name, and that firſt falſe ſtep has led him into ſome others concerning the Situation of thoſe who Walked upon Fire, upon the Feſtival of Mount Soracte, as we ſhall ſee in what follows.

(B) What belong'd only to the Hirpi.] Virgil do's not name thoſe that Walked on Fire, he only gives us to underſtand, that they Bordered on Mount Soracte.

HOBBES, (Thomas) one of the greatest Wits of the XVII*th*. Century, was Born (A) at Malmesbury in England the 5th of April 1588. He had (B) made great Progresses in Languages when at 14 years of Age he was sent to Oxford, where he Studied five years Aristotle's Philosophy. Afterwards he went to William Cavendish, who a little after was made Earl of Devonshire, to be Governour to his Eldest Son. He Travelled into France and Italy with his Pupil; and finding that he remember'd not much of his Greek and Latin, and that Aristotle's Philosophy in which he had made a great Progress, was despis'd by the wisest Heads, he apply'd himself wholly to Literature when he return'd into his Country. Thucydides being preferr'd by him before all the Greek Historians, he Translated him into English, and Publish'd his Translation in the year 1628, in order to shew the English, in the History of the Athenians, the Disorders and Confusions (BΔ) of a Democratical Government. In the year

But Servius Names them Hirpini; Soractis, says he, in Commenting on this Passage of Virgil, mons est Hirpinorum in Flaminia collocatus. He adds, that this Mountain is Consecrated to the Infernal Gods, and that one Day whilst they were offering Sacrifices to Pluto, Wolves came upon them which took out of the Fire the Entrails of the Victim: The Shepherds pursu'd 'em, and ingag'd them in a Den, whence proceeded a mortal Vapour. This caus'd a great Pestilence, which the Oracle promis'd a stop to, provided they imitated the Wolves, that is, liv'd by Rapine. They did it, and were thence call'd Hirpini Sorani, that is, Pluto's Wolves; for in the Sabine Language Hirpus signifies a Wolf, and Soranus, Pluto. If we consult Strabo and Pliny, we cannot doubt but Servius has here committed a great Blunder. He has confounded the Names and History of two different People. Strabo (m) relates that this People were called Hirpini, because a Wolf in the Language of the Samnites is called Hirpus, and because a Wolf was a Guide to a Colony that came to settle among the Samnites. As for Pliny, he affirms that in the Country of the Hirpini there was a place that could not be entered without Dying. In Hirpinis Amsancti ad Mephitis eadem, locum quem qui intravere moriuntur. Virgil gives a larger Description of this execrable Place, and observes not only that it sent out a cursed Vapour, but also that it was a breathing Hole of Hell (o). Mount Soracte had nothing of this Nature; the Vapour that came out of it was only Fatal to the Birds, as Pliny expressly assures us: (p) Alibi volucribus tantum ut Soracte vicino urbi tractu. 'Tis plain then that Servius made this Mountain a place Consecrated to Pluto, and placed it in the Neighbourhood of the Cave which kill'd Men, because he confounded what concern'd the Hirpini and the Hirpi. Any one that has a mind to know what Ancient Authors say of the Hirpi may be quickly satisfi'd. The Hirpi were a small number of Families in the Country of the Falisci near Rome, who Walk'd safely upon Fire. This Spectacle was seen every year on Mount Soracte, on Apollo's Solemn Sacrifice Day. The Hirpi Walked upon burning Piles without being Burnt, and obtain'd many Privileges by it. (a) Haud procul urbe Roma in Faliscorum agro Familiæ sunt paucæ quæ vocantur Hirpi: hæ sacrificio annuo quod fit ad montem Soractem Apollini, super ambustam ligni struem ambulantes non aduruntur, & ob id perpetuo Senatus-consulto militiæ onerisque aliorum munerum vacationem habent. Solinus thought he faithfully Copied this, and did not perceive that he changed a notable Circumstance. He Expresses himself in a way that signifies, that the Hirpi Walk'd a cross the Flames; (b) Impunè insultant ardentibus lignorum struibus in honorem divinæ rei flammis parcentibus. And yet Pliny has not said this, but plainly insinuates, that they Walked only upon the Fire-brands; and it can't be doubted but that they confined themselves to this, since Varro said, that they rub'd the Soles of their Feet with an Ointment. Consider also the multa premimus vestigia pruna of Virgil, and the Expressions of the following Authors, and you'll agree that Salmasius blames Solinus justly (c). A Poet later than Virgil (d) tells us, that they who Walked on the Fire were three times put to the Trial, loaded with the Entrails of the Sacrifices, which they afterwards laid on Apollo's Altars.

Exto ter innocuos late portare per ignes;
Sic in Apollinea semper vestigia pruna
Inviolata terax, victorque vaporis ad aras

We have seen that the Feast of Mount Soracte, where the Fire Makers plaid their part so well was Dedicated to Apollo; we now shall see it Consecrated to another Deity. Strabo (e) observes that at the Foot of this Mountain there was a Town called Feronia. 'Twas also the Name of a Goddess, which was mightily Worship'd in that District, and in whose Lucus was Celebrated a wonderful Sacrifice. Some Men who were seized with the Spirit of that Goddess, walked Bare-Foot upon a heap of burning Coals and were not harm'd by it (f). There was every year a Solemn Assembly in that Place, wherein People were diverted with that sight. It is not for the Glory of the Antients to see em so little Consistent one with another upon Matters of Fact, that were of publick Cognizance.

(C) Wherein the same Spectacle was seen.] There was at Castabala in Cappadocia a Temple of Diana called Perasia. The Priestesses of it walk'd Bare-Foot upon burning Coals without being hurt. Strabo speaks of it but by hear-say. [illegible] Ubi aiunt sacrificas mulieres illæsis pedibus per prunas ambulare (g). There have been Quacks in these latter Ages, who (b) have done things much more surprising, than what is told of the Hirpi and these Priestesses. But to put in a greater Conformity the Antient and new abuses of Religion, I will here set down what I have heard related by the late Mr. Fremont d' Ablancourt, who as a Zealous Huguenot, during his stay at Lisbon, was a most exact Observer of the Tricks of the Monks. He told me that there is (i) a certain Convent in Spain that every year furnishes a Monk, who shuts himself up in a hot Oven, and keeps there some Hours, being only Cloathed with Linnen. He comes out in the sight of a Multitude of People who look upon it as a great Miracle. This business brings in a good Income to the Convent, and is worth while to harden a Monk by degrees to bear the Heat. I do not reckon all the Artifices that may be used in it.

In the year 1631, he was admitted into the House of the Countess of Devonshire † as a Tutor to her Son, who was thirteen years of Age, and he was his Governour three years after in his Travels into France and Italy. During his stay at Paris he apply'd himself to the Study of Natural Philosophy, and especially to the inquiring into the Causes of the sensitive Operations of Animals. He daily Discoursed with Father Mersenne, upon that Subject. He was recall'd into England in the year 1637; but having foreseen the Civil War from the time that he had Reflected on what happen'd in the first Session of the Parliament in the year 1640, he sought out an agreeable Retreat at Paris, where he might quietly Philosophize with Father Mersenne, Gassendus, and some other great Men. There he Compos'd (D) his Treatise de Cive, of which he Published but a few Copies in the year 1642. He taught the Prince of Wales Mathe Prince is almost Boundless, the Instructors of Youth are suffered to Read the Antient Greek and Latin Authors, wherein are found so many Examples of the love of Liberty and so many Antimonarchical Maxims. But this is no more surprizing than to see Republican States suffer the Civilians to explain the Code and the Digests, where there are so many Principles which suppose the Supreme and Inviolable Authority of the Emperor. Here are two things that seem equally surprising, and which at the bottom ought to be no matter of surprize; for setting aside many Reasons that might be offered, may we not say that the same Works which contain the Poyson, either with respect to Monarchies or Republicks, contain also the Antidote? If you see on one Hand the great Maxims of Liberty, and the noble Examples of Courage, with which it has been maintained or recover'd; you see on the other, Factions, Seditions, and the Tumultuous Freaks that have troubled and at last ruined innumerable little States, which were so averse to Tyranny in Antient Greece. Do's it not seem that this Picture is a Lesson very capable of undeceiving those, who are so scar'd with the bare Idea of Monarchy? Hobbes believ'd it (m), since he Published with that view the Translation of the Athenian Historian. Turn the Tables, and you'll find that this Picture will give a very different instruction from this, and fortify the Aversion to Monarchy: For it will be asked, whence comes it that the Greeks and Romans chose rather to be expos'd to these Confusions than to Live under a Monarch? Was it not from the servile Condition these Tyrants had reduc'd them to? And must it not be a very severe, intolerable and deplorable Evil, which they would deliver themselves from at so high a Price? 'Tis certain that the Description that History gives us of the Conduct of many Monarchs, Frights us and makes our Hair stand on end. Object not to me that generally speaking, more Confusion has been occasion'd by the Conspiracies which have put an end to Tyranny, than there would have been by patiently enduring 'em. Don't urge what I have said above in the Article of Hiero II. The Syracusans, who had enjoy'd a wonderful Happiness under the long Reign of that Prince, quickly lost Patience under his Successor, who Governed Tyrannically. They kill'd him at the beginning of the second year of his Reign; and a little after they put to Death the two Daughters of Hiero and his three Grand-Daughters. Of these five Ladies, there were three, whom they had no sort of Complaint against, and who took Sanctuary, as we may say, at the Foot of the Altars. Was not this taking away one Tyranny (o) to Establish a greater? Livy has justly observ'd upon this Subject, that the Populace is unable to keep within Bounds; being humble even to Baseness, when they obey, and insolent to the highest Degree when they Command. The Massacre of these five Ladies was not the Rash Action of some private Men; it was commanded by the Senate and the People of Syracusa, even whilst the Memory of Hiero was still fresh in their Minds: a Prince whom they had so tenderly and so justly Loved. The Iniquity of their Barbarous Decree was so visible, that they quickly Revok'd it, but that was to no purpose; it being already Executed. (a) Tandem vulneribus confossa, cum omnia repleffent sanguine, exanimes corruerunt, eademque per se miserabilem, miserabiliorem casus fecit; quod paulo post nuntius venit, mutatis repente ad misericordiam animis, ne interficerentur. Ira deinde ex misericordia orta, quod adeo festinatum ad supplicium, neque locus pœnitendi aut regressus ab ira relictus esset. Itaque fremere multitudo. The Factions were not ended by the intire Extirpation of the Royal Family, they increased every Day, and in a little time subverted the Liberty and Sovereignty of the Country. They unseasonably expos'd Syracusa to the Enmity of the Romans, who Besieged and Subdu'd it. Silius Italicus very well describes the Confusion that City fell into after the Destruction of the Tyrant Hieronymus, and his Relations. 'Twas such a Chaos as the Romans knew how to Build a famous Conquest on. The discord of the City encouraged them to Besiege it.

Represent all this never so earnestly, you will never convince those, that are Prejudic'd against Monarchy: They will Answer you that since its Disorders are not to be Remedied but by so horrible Miseries, you ought to conclude that it is a great Evil.

(C) He took to the Study of the Mathematicks.] 'Tis a Misfortune that he staid so long (c) before he apply'd himself to 'em; he was above 40 years Old when he began that Study, which is the Reason that he could not perfect himself in it so much as was necessary, not to give a handle to his Criticks. His Face resembled Scaliger's. He well knew the Reason why one ought to Study Mathematicks; which was not to know the Properties of Angles, Numbers, Lines, or Superficies; but to accustom ones Mind to a solid Method of Reasoning and Concluding. Triumphed over the Royal Authority. He went into the other Extreme, and Taught that the Authority of Kings ought to have no Limitation, and that in particular the Externals of Religion, as being the most fruitful Cause of Civil Wars, ought to depend upon their Will. There are those who think that, respecting only the Theory, his System is well jointed, and very suitable to the Ideas that may be formed of a State well secured against Commotions. But because the most reasonable Notions are Subject to a thousand Inconveniencies, when they come to be reduc'd into Practice, that is, when they are set in opposition to a horrible multitude of Passions, which prevail amongst Mankind, it was no difficult thing to find many Faults in the Political System of this Author. He might have Answered, that the opposite System, even in the Theory, includes a necessary Principle of Confusion and Rebellion. However it be, 'tis said that the Love of his Country inspired him with the design of that Work, and that he intended to undeceive his Countrymen of the false Principles, which begot an horrible Contempt of the Royal Authority. Grassante interim per Angliam civili bello, Hobbius pro summo in patriam amore, quod bonum & fidelem subditum maximè decuit; populares suos sanioribus quam quæ hactenus obtinuerant principiis imbuere, exacerbatos hominum animos ad pacis & concordiæ rationes revocare, & in summæ potestatis obsequium addictiores præstare annisus est. Quare reliquis posthabitis studiis, quantum ipsi suppetiit temporis Politicæ scientiæ impendens, Librum de Cive (cujus pauca duntaxat Exemplaria Parisiis 1642. evulgaverat) revisit, & notis utilibus adduxit, in quo subditorum contra summum imperatorem conjurationes rebelliones que, & immanes illæ de principe regnis vitaque exuendo opiniones penitus damnavit; potestati Civili Jura ab Ecclesiasticis caliginosorum temporum beneficio præcepta restituit, & diram sectatiorum hydram, effrænem nempe conscientiæ libertatem, heroico ausu perdomuit (g). I am perswaded none will be displeas'd to see here the Judgment of M. Descartes upon this Work of Hobbes. 'I believe, says he (h), that the Author of the Book 'de Cive, is the same (i) who made the third Objections against my Meditations. I find him much 'better skill'd in Morality, than in Metaphysicks 'and Physicks: Tho' I can by no means approve his 'Maxims, and Principles, which are extreamly 'Naught, and Dangerous, in as much as he supposes all Men Wicked, or gives them occasion to 'be so. His whole Design is to exporte the Caste 'of Monarchy: Which might be done to much 'better Advantage, by going upon more Virtuous 'and more solid Maxims. He writes also very 'much to the Prejudice of the Church and the Roman Religion; so that if he is not particularly 'supported by a potent Interest, I don't see how his 'Book can escape being Censur'd. Mr. Descartes had Reason for his disapproving Hobbes's Supposition that all Men are Wicked: Which puts me in Mind that Montagne, who so well understood the Imperfections of Humane Nature, did not approve of Guicciardin (k) attributing to ill Motives, all the Actions he relates in his History. 'Tis certain that there are some Men who Govern themselves by the Ideas of Honesty, and the desire of a Noble Glory, and that the generality of Men are but Moderately Wicked. This I confess, is sufficient to fill the Train of Humane Actions with Inquiries, and to give them a general Impress of Moral Corruption; but it would be much worse (l) if the greatest part of Men were not capable of giving a check to their evil Inclinations, on many occasions, through the fear of Disgrace, or the hopes of Commendation. Now this is a sign that Depravation is not arriv'd to the highest Point: I don't consider here the good Influences of Religion; I consider only Man in General.

As to the Inconveniencies that might arise from the Practice of Hobbes's Suppositions, I say once more, that it is not the part he ought to be attack'd in; for has not the opposite System many great Inconveniencies in the Practice? Let a Man do the best he can, let him build better Systems than Plato's Republick, Moor's Utopia or Campanella's Common-wealth of the Sun, &c. All these fine Idea's will be found short and deficient when they come to be reduc'd to Practice. The Passions of Men, that arise from one another in a prodigious variety, would presently ruin the hopes these fine Systems might give us. See how it is when Mathematicians attempt to apply their Speculations, about Lines and Points, to Matter: They do what they please with their Lines and Superficies, which are only meer Idea's of our Mind; they suffer us to divest them of their Dimensions, whereby we Demonstrate the finest things imaginable concerning the nature of the Circle, and the infinite Divisibility of Matter. But all this is found defective when apply'd to that Matter which exists out of our Minds, that is a hard and impenetrable Body. This may serve for an Image of Humane Passions, compar'd with the Speculations of a Man, that forms a Notion of a perfect Government. You'll find solid Animadversions upon Hobbes's Politick Scheme in the Author that I cite (a).

(E) In Composing his Leviathan.] By that great Beast he means the Body Politick. The Divines of the Church of England, that were in France with Charles II. made great Outcries against this Work, saying it was full of Impieties, and that the Author was not of the Royal Party (b). Their Complaints were heard; Hobbes was order'd to come no more to Court; and as he had extreamly provok'd the Papists, he thought it was not good for him to be in France, when the Protection of the King of England fail'd him, (c) Hoc tanto præsidio orbatus Hobbius, Romanæ Ecclesiæ, Spiritualis Monarchiæ satellitum metu correptus est, quorum odium implacabile sese merito incurrisse senserat, ob detectas in Leviathane Ecclesiasticorum technas, regni tenebrarum dolos, Pontificis Romani potestatem malis artibus occupatam, quâ in civiles Potestatis jura involando, qui simplici ac imperitæ plebeculæ sanctis præstigiis illudendo; quare Parisius se minus tutum judicans, media Hyemis tempestate aufugiens, in patriam se contulit. He Translated his Leviathan into Latin, and Printed it (d) with an Appendix in the year 1668. Ten years after it was Printed in Dutch. The Summary of this Work is this, that without Peace there can be no Security in a State; and that Peace cannot subsist without Command, nor Command without Arms; and that Arms are worth nothing, unless in the Hand of a single Person; and that the fear of Arms cannot induce them to Peace who are carried to War by an Evil more terrible than Death, that is, by Dissentions about things necessary to Salvation. (e) Ejus autem summa hæc fuit, hinc Pace impossibilem esse inculumitatem, sine Imperii Vi, sine Armis Imperium, sine opibus in unum summum collatis nihil valere arma, neque metu damnorum quicquam ad pacem posse in illis, quæ ad pugnandum concitat malum morte majus formidatum; nempe dum consensum non sit de rebus, quæ ad salutem æternam necessaria credunto, pacem inter cives non posse esse diuturnam. The Leviathan has been much written against, especially in England (f).

(F) Proof of his Faith.] Being very Sick near Paris, he was visited by Father Mersenne, who had been advis'd not to let him Die out of the Pale of the Church. The honest Father sitting near the Sick Man, after the common Preambles of Consolation, fell to Discoursing about the Power of the Roman Church to pardon Sins; Father, reply'd Hobbes, I have long since examined all these things, and I should be sorry to Dispute about them at present; you can entertain me in a more agreeable manner. When did you see Mr. Gassendus? The good Monk easily understood what he meant by it, and trembl'd his

He receiv'd great Marks of Eſteem (I) from Charles II. at the Reſtoration in 1660. From that time to his Death, he applied himſelf to his Studies, and to defend himſelf againſt his Adverſaries, who were numerous. He preſerv'd the uſe of his Underſtanding till (K) his laſt Sickneſs, tho' he had lived 91 years. His long Life was conſtantly that of a perfect honeſt Man; he lov'd his Country, was faithful to his Prince, a good Friend, Charitable, Officious: And yet for all this he has paſſed for an Atheiſt; but thoſe who have written his Life, maintain (L) that he had very Orthodox Opinions about the Nature of God. Diſcourſe to another Subject (g). Dr. Coſins (b) a few Days after offered to pray for Hobbes, which he agreed to, provided he made uſe of the Prayers of the Church of England (i). After Prayers he receiv'd the Sacrament. The Author of his Life makes this a Characteriſtick of his Adherence to the Epiſcopal Party, and of the ſincerity of his Chriſtianity, ſince no Man was then obliged to joyn with any particular Communion. (m) Alterum hoc ſignum erat non modo hominis partium Epiſcopalium, ſed etiam Chriſtiani ſinceri; nam illo tempore ad Eccleſiam quancumque legibus aut metu cogebatur nemo.

(G) In an obſcure manner.] Not but that he had potent Friends; but as he had great Enemies, all that could be done for him was to hinder his being ruin'd. So his Condition was the effect of an æquilibrium (n) betwixt his Friends and Enemies. He lived the reſt of his Days with the Earl of Devonſhire.

(H) His Book de Corpore and ſome others.] This Book came out at London in 1655. Intituled Elementorum Philoſophiæ ſectio prima de corpore. The year following Hobbes Publiſhed Prælectiones ſex ad Profeſſores Saxlianos. His Book de Homine, ſive elementorum Philoſophiæ ſectio ſecunda, was Printed at London in the year 1658, and his Queſtions de libertate, neceſſitate & caſu contra Doctorem Bramhallum Epiſcopum Derenſem, in 1656. He had a Diſpute upon the ſame Subject with Benjamin Laney Biſhop of Ely, which he did not Publiſh till (o) 1676. Dr. Wallis Profeſſor of Geometry at Oxford, having Publiſhed his Elenchus Geometriæ Hobbianæ in the year 1655. raiſed a War which laſted till Hobbes's Death, in which were ſcatter'd abundance of injurious Words. (I) Great Marks of Eſteem from Charles II.] Hobbes (r) left the Country to come to London upon the arrival of the King. This Prince paſſing in his Coach by the Houſe where Hobbes liv'd, perceiv'd him, and bad him come to him. He gave him his Hand to Kiſs, and inquired about his Condition and Health. Some time after he gave him a particular Audience, aſſur'd him of his Affection, and promiſ'd him an eaſy Acceſs to him. He (ſ) caus'd his Picture to be drawn by an excellent Painter, and plac'd it in his Cloſet, and which was a more ſubſtantial Mark of his Affection, he gave him an Annual Penſion of (t) a hundred Jacobus's (v).

(K) The uſe of his Underſtanding till his laſt Sickneſs.] He was not only capable of Studying Mathematicks, when above 86 years old, but alſo of writing very long Poems. (a) Quod autem inter rara felicitatis exempla numerandum eſt, ſummo ingenii vigore & ſenſibus integris ad obitum uſque in Philoſophia & Matheſi ſe aſſidue exercitavit, & quod magis mirum, Poëſin exercuit, quâ propriis animi conceptibus exprimendis, quâ aliorum tranſferendis. He Tranſlated into Engliſh Verſe, ſome Books of the Odyſſes in the year 1674, and becauſe that Eſſay had the Approbation of the Learned, he Publiſhed a like Verſion of the Iliads, and the whole Odyſſes a little after, with a Diſſertation upon the Excellencies of an Heroick Poem (b).

(L) Maintain that he had very Orthodox Opinions about the Nature of God.] Of all the Moral Virtues there was hardly any but Religion, that could be a Matter of Diſpute in the Perſon of Hobbes. He was Frank (c), Civil, and Communicative of what he knew (d), a good Friend, a good Relation, Charitable to the Poor (e), a great Obſerver of Equity (f), and had no deſire of gathering Wealth (g). This laſt Quality is a favourable Prejudice for the goodneſs of his Life. For there is not a more Copious ſource of ill Actions than Avarice. So that he that knew Hobbes, had no occaſion to ask him whether he eſteemed and loved Virtue; but one might have been tempted to put this queſtion to him:

Heus age, reſponde, minimum eſt quod ſcire laboro,
De Jove quid ſentis (h)?

The Anſwer he could have ſincerely made, if we believe thoſe who wrote his Life, had been this; that there is a God (i) the Origin of all things, but who ought not to be Circumſcrib'd in the Sphere of our narrow Reaſon. He would have added, that he embrac'd Chriſtianity (k) as it was by Law Eſtabliſhed in England; but that he had an Averſion for Theological Diſputes; that he chiefly eſteem'd what tends to the practice of Piety and good Manners, and that he was uſed to blame the Prieſts, who Corrupted the ſimplicity of Religion, by the mixture of a ſuperſtitious Worſhip, or of many Vain and Profane Speculations. (l) Quicquid, autem ad pietatis exercitia, aut bonos mores conferret, plurimi fecit. Sanctius illi, & reverentius viſum, de Deo credere quam ſcire. Sacerdotes interim inculpare ſolitus eſt, qui Chriſtianam Religionem abſolutam ac ſimpliciem, vel ſuperſtitione maculârent, vel inanibus interdum profanis ſpeculationibus implicarent. They conclude, that thoſe who accuſe him of Atheiſm, are horrible Slanderers, who could Alledge no other pretence than this, which was, that he had rejected many Scholaſtick Doctrines, by which they had aſcribed to God certain Attributes upon the Model of our little Genius. (m) Quare fortiter calumniati ſunt, qui ipſum Atheiſmi reum detulerunt; quod inde fortaſſe factum quia Scholaſticorum aliorumque illo de grege morem rejecerat, qui otioſi in Muſæis ſuis ſedentes, juxta imbecillem ingenioli ſui captum, Naturæ Divinæ incomperta affingunt attributa. 'Tis certain there is no Acculation, that is fallen into greater abuſe than that of Atheiſm. A Lundance of narrow Souls, or ill-natur'd People fix it upon all thoſe, who affirm only the great and ſublime Truths of ſolid Metaphyſicks, and the general Doctrines of Scripture. They would fain oblige 'em moreover to adopt all the particular Articles which they are uſed to recommend over and over to the People. All that dare deviate from that Road, are Infidels and Libertines, if you'll believe ſome Doctors. Thus it was that Monconys incurred this evil Imputation. He Diſputed ſometimes very freely againſt thoſe who abuſed the Greatneſs of God by the Conduct which they aſcrib'd to him, and by the weak Reaſons they Al-said also, that he was afraid of Apparitions (M) and Spirits; but they maintain that it is a Fable. They honestly confess, that in his Youth he lov'd a little Wine and Women †; but that nevertheless, he liv'd a Batchellor, that he might not be disturb'd in his Study of Philosophy. HOCHSTRATUS (James) took his Name from the Village where he was born. He studied Philosophy at Louvain, and took his Master of Arts Degree there in 1485. He became a Dominican Friar, and was made Prior of the Monastery of Cologne, Doctor and Professor of Divinity, and Inquisitor in the Three Ecclesiastical Electorates *. Never was a Man more fit for this last Employment, for he was amply provided with all the ill Qualities that are necessary to Inquisitors and Informers. He was violent: he accus'd under the least Pretences; he would be both Judge (A) and Party; he produced very false Abstracts ‡, and would never own himself a Slanderer; he alledg'd; and he was unjustly call'd a Libertine, tho' he had the sublimest Idea of God that can be imagin'd. Read what follows (n): 'That agreeable way which he took sometimes to contradict those narrow Minds, which by their Arguments weaken the Truths they would confirm, occasioned these prejudiced Persons to take this effect of his Openness and Candour for an ill Liberty. But his solid Vertue, and sincere Piety, were every where conspicuous, and he gave some Testimonies of it, which you may see in these Travels. In his last Sickness he confess'd to one of his Friends, that he had always preserved in his Heart a profound Submission, and an infinite Reverence for the Deity, of whom he had a more exalted Idea, than all that Men have conceived of him. When he was at Alexandria, at a time when he seem'd to deny nothing to his Curiosity, being alone one Night, upon one of the Terrasses, which serve as a Covert to the Buildings of the Levant, he found himself immediately so possest with a sensible Knowledge of the Deity, that he spent part of that Night with unspeakable Consolation, in a continual Adoration of the Principle of all Beings.

(n) Preface to the Voyages of Monconys, pag. 7.

(M) Of Apparitions and Spirits.] His Friends call this a Fable. (o) Nec minus falso à nonnullis insimulatus est, tanquam solitudinem fugeret, spectra metuens & phantasmata, vana stultorum terriculamenta, quæ Philosophiæ suæ lumine dissipaverat. But it seems they do not deny, that he durst not be alone, they only insinuate, that the Reason of it was his fear of being assassinated. If his Philosophy exempted him from the other Fear, and not from this, it did not hinder him from being miserable, and Horace's Thought might be applied to him (p). To say this by the by, his Principles of Philosophy were not proper to rid him from the fear of the Apparitions of Spirits; for to reason consequently, there are no Philosophers who have less right to reject Magick, and Devil's-Craft, than those who deny the Existence of a God. But you will say Hobbes denied the Existence of Spirits; say rather, that he believed there are no Substances distinct from Matter. Now, as that did not hinder him from believing, that there are many Substances, which design, and do good or ill to others, he might and ought to believe, that there are Beings in the Air, or elsewhere, as capable of Mischief as the Corpuscles which form, said he, all our Thoughts in our Brain. How come these Corpuscles to be better acquainted with the Means of doing Mischief than those other Beings? And what Reason is there to prove, that these other Beings are ignorant of the manner of acting upon our Brain to give us the Sight of an Apparition?

(o) Vita Hobb. pag. 106.

(p) Somnia, terrores magicos, miracula, sagas, Nocturnos lemures, portentaque Thessala rides? . . . . Quid te exempta juvat spinis de pluribus una. Horat. Epist. 2. lib. 2. sub fin.

Let us consider the matter another way. One should not only be very rash, but also very extravagant, to go about maintaining there never was a Man, that imagin'd he saw a Spectre; and I do not think that the most opinionated and excessive Unbelievers have maintain'd this. All that they say comes to this, that the Persons who have thought themselves witnesses of the Apparition of Spirits, had a disturb'd Imagination. They confess then, that there are certain Places in our Brain, that being affected in such or such a manner, excite the Image of an Object which has no real Existence out of our selves, and make the Man, whose Brain is thus modify'd, believe he sees at two Paces distance, a frightful Spectre and Hobgobling, a meanacing Phantome. The like things happen in the Head of the most incredulous, either in their Sleep, or in the Paroxisms of a violent Fever. Will they maintain after this, that 'tis impossible for a Man awake, and not in a Delirium, to receive in certain Places of his Brain, an Impression almost like that, which by the Laws of Nature is connected with the Appearance of an Apparition? If they are forced to acknowledge this possibility, they cannot be able to promise, that a Spectre will never appear before 'em, that is, that they shall never, when awake, believe they see either a Man, or a Beast, when they are alone in a Chamber. Hobbes then might believe, that a certain Combination of Atoms, agitated in his Brain, might expose him to such a Vision, tho' he was persuaded, that neither an Angel, nor the Soul of a dead Man would have a Hand in't. He was timorous to the last degree, and consequently he had reason to mistrust his Imagination, when he was alone in his Chamber in the Night; for in spite of him, the Memory of what he had read, and heard concerning Apparitions would revive, tho' he was not persuaded of the Reality of these Things. These Images join'd with the timorousness of his Temper, might play him an unlucky Trick. And 'tis certain, that a Man as incredulous as he was, but of greater Courage, would be astonished to think he saw one whom he knew to be dead, enter into his Chamber. These Apparitions in Dreams are very frequent, whether a Man believes the Immortality of the Soul or not. Supposing they should once happen to an incredulous Man awake, as they do in his Sleep, we should find him afraid, tho' he had never so much Courage. And therefore we ought the more to believe, that Hobbes would have been terribly affrighted.

(N) He had meditated much more than he had read.] 'Tis ingenuously confess'd in his Life, that for a Man who liv'd so long, his reading was inconsiderable. He said (a) himself, that if he had bestowed as much time on reading, as other Men of Letters, he should have been as ignorant as they. He considered another thing, which induced him to make no great Account of vast Libraries; which is, that most Books are Abridgments, and Copies of others. (b) Lectio ejus pro tanto ætatis decursu non magna; Authores versabat paucos, sed tamen optimos. Homerus, Virgilius, Thucydides, Euclides, *ubi in deliciis erant. (A) He would be both Judge and Party.] This manifestly appeared in the Business of Reuchlin. A Jew (c) converted to the Christian Religion, had defam'd him in a Book, intituled Manuale Speculum. Reuchlin justified himself by a Book, intituled, Speculum Oculare, in which he shewed, that his Enemies had vented against him above Thirty four Slanders (d). Hochstratus, the principal Supporter of the Converted Jew, interested the Divines of Cologne in that Affair, and made them draw some Extracts of the Speculum Oculare, which were published with Artificial Notes, to cry down Reuchlin, as a favourer of Judaism. There was nothing more unfaithful than these Extracts. Has propositiones—— ubi vidit Reuchlinus pessimè ac non sine crimine falsi ex Oculari speculo excerptas——rogat theologos illos &c.—— Erupit totâ Theologorum concio suppetias Christi sacris recens initiato Judæo latura dicæ Evangelio, qui articulos seu propositiones de Judaico favore minus suspectas ex Speculo Oculari exemuit, adjectis annotationibus & animadversionibus? atque hoc he advanced Heresies (B) with Impunity in the Writings, where he pretended to confute Hereticks. He once was obliged to make Satisfaction to a worthy Man that he had abus'd; but to bring him to't, they were forced to make use of a remarkable Expedient, which was to take from his Convent (C) the Benefit of Begging. He had not all the Advantage he promised himself in the trouble he gave Reuchlin; He Hereupon a Process was entred against him before the Elector of Mentz. His Age not permitting him to appear in Person, he sent thither a Proxy, who offered very just Causes of Exception against our James Hochstratus; but they were not heard. (f) Cum propter senium & imbecillitatem corporis tantum iter tam brevi temporis spacio confiecre non posset, mittebat in curatorem Petrum Staffelium Nurtingensem, qui adversum Hochstratum tanquam inimicum sibi infensissimum & merito suspectum recusabat, ob eas causas, quas publice allegabat——Tametsi vero nil obtineret Reuchlinus. Hochstratus would not be accused (g). Hereupon Reuchlin's Proxy sued him by an Appeal to the Court of Rome. Hochstratus however caus'd the Sentence to be passed; and without waiting till the Fifteen Days, before which it ought not to be promulged, were expired, he ordered all the Curates of Mentz to give notice to the People, that all those who had Reuchlin's Book, should bring it immediately to the Commissioners, on pain of Excommunication. The Bishop of Spire (i) commissioned by the Pope to judge of that Cause, named the Judges, who cited the Parties. Hochstratus did not appear, and was sentenc'd for Contumacy to pay all the Charges; he was forbid, under great Penalties, to continue his Proceedings, and the Accusation of the Divines of Cologne was declar'd null. (k) Hochstratus licet more consueto per intervalla citatus, tamen non comparuit. Causa nihilo secius discutitur & secundum Reuchlinum pronunciatur: nullum errorem ab Ecclesia damnatum in libro supius commemorato reperiri, nec plus eum favere Judæis, quam religio & jura sinant, injuste ergo ac præter veritatem eum delatum à Colonienſibus esse. Hochstratus autem contumaciæ criminis reus, &c. However, the latter burned John Reuchlin's Book. (l) Hæc dum aguntur Spiræ, Colonienſes nefario ausu librum Reuchlini damnant, citra tamen contumeliam, ut ajebant, & Februario deinde mense anno supra millesimum quingentesimum decimo quarto exurunt, approbantibus factum Lovanienſi, Erphordenſi, Moguntina & Parisiensi Universitatibus. But I lay this only occasionally; the main thing I am to prove is, that this Monk would be judge and Party. 'Tis this he is accused of more than once in a Poem (m) intitled, Triumphus Doctoris Reuchlini.

(B) He advanced Heresies with Impunity.] We might see the Catalogue of them, if we had the Book, with which Agrippa (p) threatned the Jacobins: For see what he represents to the Magistrates of Cologne: (q) Unum tamen illorum excipio, Jacobum Hostratum, tunc Fradicatorum ordinis hæreticorum Magistrum, vulgo & veraciter dictum, qui taliter scripsit contra Lutheranas hæreses, ut ipse se proderet hæreticorum omnium pestilentissimum. Sed ne quis vestrum, illius olim amicus, aut illius hypocrisi seductus, vel aliter deceptus, me non favore veritatis, sed aut invidiæ, aut alia offensa ista dicere putet rem ipsam digito monstrabo. Nam in libro suo contra Lutheranos, quem Reverendissimo Cardinali ac Illustri Principi & Episcopo Leodiensi dedicavit, in illius lib. 2. disp. 3. paulo ante finem 1. cap. sic ait: Sciunt enim consecrationem super debitam materiam ritè factam, Christum esse in Sacramento, non autem quid sub hac vel illa determinata hostia Christus contineatur. Neque tamen putetis, hunc solum artificium apud illum reperiri hæreticum, sed alii multi: quos cum hic nimis longum, vobisque tadiosum foret referre, enumerabo alibi, in 20 fol. libro, quem de Fratrum Prædicatorum sceleribus. See the Sequel of these Words in the Remark Q of the Article Agrippa.

(C) To take from his Convent the Benefit of Begging.] 'Tis in Erasmus's Letters that we read this curious Particular. The Count of Nevenar, a Lord of extraordinary Merit, a Learned Man, and Patron of the Learned, was very much touched with the Calumnies which James Hochstratus had published against him. He omitted nothing to oblige him to make him Reparation; he made use of the most solid Reasons, he had Recourse to Advice, hard Words and Menaces; all this was to no purpose; but at last he and his Relations forbad all their Servants to give any Eggs or Cheese to the Jacobins. These believed they were only vain Threatnings, and continued their Trade of begging in the Territories of these Gentlemen; but they were repulsed in a terrible manner, so that for a Year together they were deprived of the Subsistence they used to have. They then obliged Hochstratus to give the Count Satisfaction, by a solemn Recantation, some Copies whereof were dispersed abroad. Erasmus, who had one of 'em, found something comical in it; for the Monk declaring in express Words, the Slanders he had made of Count de Nevenar, protested at the same time, he had always had a very good Opinion of him. It will be a Pleasure to see this in Erasmus's Latin. (a) Hermannus Comes à Nova Aquila indigne tulerat se notatum ab Jacobo Hochstraro Dominicano. Is erat Rabinus, Prior Monasterii quod Coloniæ sanè quàm magnificum est & opulentum. Non potuit hominem compescere, donec illius cognati denunciarint Dominicanis, ne posthac colligerent caseos in ulla ditione vel Comitis vel cognatorum illius. Illi rati minas esse inanes, clam tentarunt solito more venire ad ova & caseos. Factus est in illos impetus terribilis. Hoc damno totum annum multati sunt; itaque factum est, ut Jacobus à suis coactus pacis leges acceperit. Habeo illius palinodiam, in qua cum recitet verba plena contumeliæ quæ scripserat in Comitem, tamen affirmat ac propemodum dejerat, se semper de Comite (b) honoraciare sensisse. Bella palinodia, scurrâ quam Theologo dignior. He says in another place, that 'tis in vain to dispute against the Persecutors of Learning. He principally meant the Monks and their Favourers; these sort of People, adds he, have inexhaustible Subterfuges in their Factions, Outcries, and Tricks: nothing but the Bastinado and Hunger (c) can conquer 'em, and he brings as an Instance, Count de Nevenar's Conduct towards James Hochstratus. (d) Isti numero, phalangibus, syncretismo, improbitate, clamoribus, adde si libet, fucis ac malis artibus, prorsus invicti sunt: Nec alia re quàm fustibus ac fame domari queunt. Sic vir clarissimus Hermannus à Nevaquila Comes, adegit Jacobum Hogestratum ad abjectam & scurrilem palinodiam, cujus exemplar apud me est. Quibus, inquies, præsidiis? Non argumentis, non æquis rationibus, non monitis, non minis, non comitiis; nihil enim horum non frustra tentatum fuit: Sed quibus præsidiis? Caseis & ovis quorum in ditione Comitis colligendorum jus illis ademptum fuerat. Erasmus has reason to say, that Count Nevenar tried what hard Words would do; for what can be more severe than this? (e) Unica, crede mihi, pestis est in Germania Jacobus Hochstratus, quam si restrinxeris [illegible]. Homo præter ingentem suam audaciam insigniter impudens atque temerarius. Omnes interroga, si libet, per Germaniam doctos viros. Omnes lassi, omnibus æque infestus est. Thus it is, that the Count de Nevenar represents to Charles V. in an Oration

He had been exhorting him to give Order that the Monks ſhould concern themſelves only with the Rules of their Statutes. (f) Fraterculos quoſdam magnis titulis inſanientes, jube ſuorum Cœnobiorum curam gerere, jube domi Fratribus ſuis regendis operam impendere, ſacris faciendis invigilare.

(D) To go to Rome for that Trial, and notwithſtanding the Money.] I have ſaid above (g) that the Commiſſioners of the Pope's Subdelegate paſſed a Sentence very diſadvantageous to our Dominican. The Commiſſioners, which the Pope appointed to the Parties in Rome itſelf, where Hochſtratus was in Perſon, would not have given a leſs favourable Sentence for Reuchlin, had they had time to pronounce a deciſive Decree; but when they were met (h) to put an end to the Affair, they received an Order from the Pope to ſuſpend the Judgment. Each of the Judges gave in Writing their Suffrage; 'tis known, that they gave it to the Diſadvantage of the Dominican, who to ward off that Scurvy Blow, extorted an Order from the Pope for a Demurrer, and to leave the Suffrages in the Secretary's Hands (i). Which is an Autheotick Example of the immenſe Power of theſe ſort of Men: If they can't gain their Cauſe, if it is too apparently naught to obtain a favourable Sentence, they have at leaſt Intereſt enough to avoid Condemnation; they obtain all the neceſſary Delays, and they make the World believe, that this is an Advantage; for they will never confeſs, that they have the worſt of it. But yet every Body knows, that they are in the wrong. In this Affair John Reuchlin's Friends thought they had triumph'd, and they compoſed many inſulting Poems (k).

Hochſtratus made a Journey to Rome with a ſumptuous Equipage, and provided with large Summs of Money. Huic igitur edicto morem gerens Jacobus Romam contendit, multis magniſque ſuarum aliarumque Univerſitatum, Principum item & aliorum ſummorum virorum commendationibus, pulchro equitatu, & qui rerum gerendarum, ut & olim fuerunt, & nunc quam maxime ſunt corrupti hominum mores, nervus eſt, ingenti pecuniæ vi inſtructus, qua Capnionis juſtam cauſſam, famam fortunaſque omnes facile ſe ſubverſurum, jactitavit (l). He who ſuſpected that this Money was deſign'd for the purchaſe of ſome Voices, knew well enough how Matters went (m). His Words are theſe: (n) Item Theologiſta, ut etiam compere, Jacobo Hochſtraten proximis diebus mille quingentos aureos per Trapezitas Romam miſerunt, non ad victum, qui Monachis tenuis eſſe debet, nec ad neceſſarias impenſas litis, nam minore ſummula, ut reor, hæc adminiſtraretur. Sed quod vehementer ſuſpicor & illis male vertat, ad faciendas largitiones, pro (o) obtinendis auro ſuffragiis quæ jure non ſperat. What he adds, is more ſurprizing. Theſe ſame Divines threatned to make a Schiſm, if Reuchlin was not condemned, and ſpoke with the utmoſt Contempt of Leo X. Nam modo reverendiſſimum Cardinalem Grimanum (p) *ut indoctum cavillantur, modo ut ſemper ſuſpectum infamant. Præterea audent aperte jactare perverſiſſimi homines, niſi ſecundum ſe pronunciatum in urbe fuerit, ab Eccleſia & ſummo ejus Pontifice ſe defecturos, & ſciſma novum ſuſcitaturos. his Adversaries. He was one of the first (G) that wrote against Luther, and one of the Persecutors (H) of Erasmus. In a Word, whoever was an Enemy to the Scholastick Barbarity, could not fail to be exposed to his Anger. He died † at Cologne, in the Year 1527. We have many Books of his, which for the most part relate to his Disputes against Reuchlin and Luther. There was a cutting Epitaph made upon (I) him.

He did not do much Honour to the Divines at Paris, in publishing (K) at Cologne, the Judgment they past upon Luther in 1521. upon the Subject of the Pretended Dionysius the Areopagite.

HOE (Matthias) a famous Lutheran Minister, was born at Vienna, in the Year 1580. He was sent so soon to the Protestant Colleges *, that he found himself a Lutheran before he had made Reflection that he was born in the Romish Communion. He studied Divinity at Wittemberg; and in the Year 1602, he was invited to the Court of Saxony, to preach before the Elector. In the Year following he was made Director of some Churches in Voightland; and after having discharg'd that employ eight Years, he was sent to Prague in the Year 1611. to be Superintendant of the German Churches. Two Years after he was recalled to the Court of Saxony, where he was promoted to the Degree of Ecclesiastical Counsellor, and first Preacher to his Highness. He kept those Employs all the rest of his Life, and he died the 4th. of March, 1645. He was admitted Doctor of Divinity at Wittemberg, in the Year 1604. His Marriage, which lasted Forty Three Years, and which procured him Six Sons and Four Daughters, made amends for all the Troubles that could happen to him. He was born a Gentleman †, and he had so Warlike a Pen, as proved he did not degenerate. He published a great Number of Books *, some in Latin, and others in High-Dutch. He was a Man who would not hear of the Re-Union (B) of the Protestant Churches.

tusque interierit (e). He afterwards relates that Reuchlin brought the Cause before the Pope, and that James Hochstratus made a Voyage to Rome upon it, and had like to have fallen into an Ambush of his Enemies, as he returned to Cologne.

(G) One of the first that wrote against Luther.] He went the wrong way to work, if we believe Father Maimbourg, who says, (f) 'That what made 'Luther's Cause still more plausible was this, that 'James Hochstratus, a Dominican Inquisitor, writ'ing against him, exhorted the Pope to treat such a 'wicked Fellow only with Fire and Sword, to rid 'the World of him as soon as possible. I will now set down a Passage of Valerius Andreas, which affords me at once a Proof of my Text, and an Occasion for a Critical Reflection. (g). Primos inter in Lutherum calamum strinxit: ob id tum ab haereticis quos in primis oderat, tum etiam ab aliis vitæ atque ingenii liberioris, ut tunc tempora ferebant, scriptis lacessitus, & nominatim à Joan. Reuchlino sive Capnione epistolis quas obscurorum virorum titulo vulgavit. The War of the Monks against Reuchlin, began before Luther attacked the Indulgencies, and dropt of it self when Luther raised his Standard. Reuchlin closed with the uppermost side all his Life, and never concern'd himself with the Lutheran Disputes. It is therefore very false, that he pestered Hochstratus with many Satyrical Pieces, to punish him for being one of the first that wrote against Luther. The Epistolæ obscurorum virorum, preceded the Birth of the Protestant Reformation. Valerius Andreas is thereby fully convicted of an Anachronism. For the rest, the Counsel James Hochstratus gave the Pope against Luther, plainly shews the violent Temper of the Man. Erasmus wrote a Letter to him (h) in the Year 1519, full of good Advice, upon the inexcusable Bitterness he had shewn in his Writings against Reuchlin. See Erasmus's Letters (i) concerning Hochstratus's Proceedings with respect to Martin Luther.

(H) One of the Persecutors of Erasmus.] Which we learn from these Words: (k) Aliquot ex hostium numero perierunt: Lovanii Ecmondanus Carmelita vomitu præfocatus——Colonia periit Jacobus Hochstratus coryphæus hujus tragœdiæ, qui tamen in morte dicitur nonnullis verbis prodidisse parum sinceram conscientiam. In the Letter of Erasmus, wherein he gives good Advice to the Inquisitor, he complains of his being ill us'd by him, for his Opinion upon the Dissolubility of Marriage (l).

(I) There was a cutting Epitaph made upon him.] We find it in Paul Jovius: Hostrati autem tumulo, says he (m), hoc mobile carmen, Capnionis puer affixit.

Hic jacet Hostratus, viventem ferre paratus
Quem potuere mali, non potuere boni.

Crescite ab hoc taxi, crescant aconita sepulcro: Ausus erat sub eo, qui jacet, omne nefas.

(K) In publishing at Cologne.] 'Twas in the Year 1521. You will find this Judgment in the 2d. Tome of Luther's Latin Works, in the Jena Edition. You'll find also other Editions of it, and therefore Father Nourri had no reason to believe, that he first brought it to light by publishing it in his Apparatus ad Bibliothecam maximam veterum Patrum in 1694 (n).

(A) His Marriage——made amends.] I have given to the Latin Words of the Sieur Witte the most favourable Construction; for as they are somewhat obscure, one might think, that he meant, that Hoe's Marriage was so happy, as to have less Evil than Good in it (o). This would be lessening the Advantages of that Marriage; wherefore I chuse the other Interpretation, which is, that those Advantages being put in the Scale with all the Evil the Husband was expos'd to, weighed them down. Thus his dear Spouse agreeably comforted him for all the Troubles and Fatigues he was to go through. He would have had reason to complain then, if he had lived a Batchelor.

(B) Of the Reunion of the Protestant Churches.] Gustavus, a little before he died, called a Convention at Leipsick, of Lutherans and Calvinists, in order to work an Accommodation. His Authority caused 'em to separate like good Friends, and with mighty hopes of Peace; but they vanished away by his Death. Nevertheless, Duraus did not desist from the Undertaking, and he came to Francfort, where the Protestants were assembled. A most severe Letter of Hoe came hereupon against the Calvinists, and did a great deal of Mischief. We have all this from Grotius. (a) Rex Suecia magnus Gustavus ——non multum ante mortem Lipsiæ conventum instituerat utrinsque sententiæ protestantium—— Effecit sua auctoritate ut amice discederetur cum magna spe restituendæ unitatis. Sed tristis exitus tanti Regis salubre hoc cœptum interscidit. Neque tamen defuit ejusdem negotii commendator ex Anglia Duraus, multorum Angliæ antistitum instructus literis, qui francofurtum ad Mœnum venerat eo ipso tempore, cum ibi conventus Ordinum Protestantium haberetur. Sed rem per se difficilem implicatiorem etiam reddidit doctoris Hoii ex Aula Saxonica responsum immite in eos quos Calvinianos vocat. The Doctors of the Augsburg Confession, extol to the Skies, the Vigilance with which he opposed the least Innovations. They further say, that to this end he exposed himself to great Danger. (b) In solis radiis pridem scriptum arbitror quos ille tuendæ fidei gratia pertulerit labores, quibusnam difficultatibus sit constictatus, quæ subierit pericula, dum quidvis satius censebat, quam ut quicquam in Germania de Evangelica Religionis integritate

Churches: But he was accus'd of having been brib'd to endeavour (C) a Re-union of some Princes of the Empire with the Emperor, to the great Prejudice of the Protestants. What he has published upon the Revelation, (D) looks like a Work of a Man of a turbulent Humour.

I fancy he was more troubled to see the Elector Palatine in Possession of the Crown of Bohemia, than to see him a Fugitive after the Battle of Prague; for the Letter which (E) he wrote to a Nobleman of that Country, shews that he did not approve the Design of giving that Kingdom to that Elector, and that he looke upon Calvinism as an Antichrist, that was not much better than the Popish Antichrist.

HOELZLIN † (Jeremiah) Professor of Greek in the University of Leyden, was born at Nuremberg. He made so great a Progress in his School-Learning, at Augsburg, that he excell'd all his Fellow-Scholars, both in the Greek and Latin Tongues. After which he betook himself to the Study of Philosophy in the University of Altorf. His Method of studying it, was not like that of others; he little regarded what was dictated in an Auditory; as he was a good Grecian, he would read the Originals and the ancient Interpreters of Aristotle, Themistius, Alexander Aphrodisiensis, Simplicius and Ammonius. He was not contented with Aristotle; he studied Plato likewise, and was a great Admirer of the Stoicks. After having spent Eight Years in this sort of Study, he was admitted Doctor of Philosophy, and applied himself to the Scriptures, and to Hebrew. He was afterwards Rector of the College at Amberg, in the Upper Palatinate. The War drove him thence, and obliged him to retire to Bremen, having lost the best part of his Effects. The Count of Bentheim designed to give him the Headship of his College of Rhede; but he died presently after, and then the Town of Ham offered him a like Employment. The Soldiers of the Emperor plundered that Country so horribly, that he would not be expos'd to their Violences. He therefore sought a safe Sanctuary, which he found in Holland; he retir'd to Leyden, and there published a Translation of the Psalms, which appear'd to be exact. The University did him the Honour to retain him, when he was invited to Middleburg, and to the Brill (Y). He was thought worthy to appear on a greater Stage, and had the Greek Professorship given him, which Vossius had just left. He undertook the Translation (Z) of

(C) Brib'd to endeavour a Re-union.] In the Year 1635. the Elector of Saxony and the Landgrave of Hesse, made a Treaty at Prague, with the Emperor, and engaged themselves in his Interests against the Crown of Sweden, which was the way to destroy whatever Gustavus had done in Germany for the Benefit of the Protestant Religion. 'Tis believed that the Emperor, by a good Sum of Money, engaged Doctor Hoe to remove all the Scruples which might have perplexed the Elector of Saxony. Mr. Puffendorf, whose Words I quote, is my Warrant for it. (c) Arguebatur quoque Saxonicus Theologus Matthias Hoeus decem uncialium millia à Cæsare accepisse, eximendis Principis sui animo scrupulis, quos alias facile ista pro generare poterat.

(D) What he has published upon the Revelation.] According to the Humour that he was of, it can't be doubted but his Commentaries upon the Revelation, tended to raise a general War against the Church of Rome, that is, to fill Europe with the most dreadful Miseries that it could fall under. However it be, the Bishop of Meaux reckons him amongst the Interpreters of the Revelation, who blow a Trumpet for War. 'The Lutherans, says he, were not 'more moderate than the Calvinists; and the prin-'cipal Minister of the Court of Saxony, Matthias 'Hoe by Name, dispersed a Book at Francfort, in-'titled, The Judgment and entire Extermination of 'the Whore of the Roman Babylon, or the VIth. Book 'of Commentaries upon the Revelation. 'The 'Book is no less extravagant than the Title, and 'this is what was written in Germany and in the 'North. The Bishop of Meaux has this from a Letter of an Arminian Minister whose Passage I'll set down, as containing some other Matters, that suit with this Article. (d) 'I have seen the Cata-'logue of this last Fair of Francfort, which con-'tains abundance of Polemical Books against Pope-'ry, amongst others, one with this Inscription. Ju-'dicium & excidium meretricis Babylonis Romanæ, 'sive Commentariorum in Apocalypsin S. Johannis li-'ber sextus, authore Matthia Hoëo Doctore Theologo. 'Lipsiæ in 4. This Hoe is the principal Minister 'of the Court of Saxony, of noble Extraction in 'Austria, and who for a long time has been suspect-'ed to be a Secret Papist. I wonder that in such a 'Conjuncture of Time and Affairs, he thinks fit to 'write against Popery in so Satyrical and odious a 'Style, especially since the Elector of Saxony has 'always sought to preserve the Emperor's good-'will towards his Family. Hoe began his Work upon the Revelation in the Year (f) 1610, and fi-nished it in the Year 1640. It contains VIII Books, which have been reprinted in Folio at Leipsick, in 1671. Factious and turbulent Men will never be hindered from making use of the Obscurity of the Revelation, in order to create War. Peace doth not please them; 'tis War which they wish for, in which they run no Hazards, and find a way to make themselves necessary. 'Tis probable, that Sovereigns are not displeased with such Pragmatical People; they look upon 'em as fit Persons to sow Confidence among the People, by turning the Prophecies, some-times one way, sometimes another, according to the current of Affairs. Such sort of People make themselves feared; and for that reason their Masters keep Fair with them.

Concionator Aulicus Dresdensis, Epistolam sub* 23. aug. scripsit ad Joachimum Andream Slikium, qua (postmodum typis excusa) vir celeberrimus sibi-ipsi monuit, ut quid, præsertim intuitu religionis, Ordines isti facerent, facere saltem deberent, probe perpendant? Inter alia spiritum Calvinisticum appellans Anti-Christum Orientalem, atque componens cum Occidentali, ut non multo meliorem, allegante Hornbekio in summa Controversiarum religionis; libro no-no de Lutheranis p. m. 699. Probably the Author I quote had not seen this Letter; for he only speaks of it upon the Credit of Hornbeeck.

(Y) And to the Brill.] He was actually Rector of the College of the Brill, if we may believe Vossius, whose Words I set down the less unwillingly, because they have need of Correction, since the proper Name of this Man is there miserably mangled, not without a gross Solecism. Vossius had been saying, that Antony Æmilius had refus'd the Greek Professorship, which the Curators of the University of Leyden had offered him, and then he says: (a) Ad hanc professionem cum deinceps offerendam Magistratus Hoëcelius quondam correctori Ambergensis Gymnasii Electoralis Collegæ Beckmani; nunc Brillano ejusdem scholæ Rectori.

(Z) of Apollonius Rhodius; and notwithstanding his Distempers, he accomplished it and put his last Hand to it, Six Days before he died. He was Dropsical, and so weak that at last he could not hold his Pen in his Hand, and yet he had set his Heart so much upon his Work, that he dictated what he thought necessary to be added to it. He died the 25th. of January, 1641. He had been married a long time †, but had no Children. He was congratulated for it in his Funeral Sermon, because of the Confusion he was in when the Rage of War drove him into Exile ‡.

HOESCHELIUS (David) born at Augsburg the 14th. of April, 1556, was a very Learned Man. The publick is indebted to him for the Edition (A) of many Greek Authors. He spent all his Life in the Instruction of Youth in St. Anne's College, of which he was made Rector by the Magistrates of Augsburg in the Year 1593. They also made him Library-Keeper, and he can't be sufficiently praised for the Pains (B) he took to enrich their Library. He was very well acquainted with good Manuscripts, and good Editions; and he took care that the Manuscripts which were bought for the Ornament of that Library, should not lie buried like a Treasure hid under Ground, but he published the most curious of them, with Notes of his own. He made good Scholars (C), and many resorted to Augsburg ‖ upon his Account. He died there in 1617. I'll mention (D) what Scaliger said of him. Mr. Huet * has not only spoke honourably of his Diligence in rescuing old Manuscripts, but also of his Skill in Translating.

HOFFMAN (Daniel) Super-intendant and Professor at Helmstad †, was the Head of a Theological Faction (A), which raised some Disturbances towards the end of the XVIth. Century. He raised some Difficulties upon the Formulary of Concord which was to be subscribed; and instead of concurring with Doctor John Andreas, for the Defence of that Formulary, he made use of captious Distinctions. He would not admit the Ubiquity, but only the Presence of Jesus Christ in many Places. That

(Z) The Translation of Apollonius Rhodius.] The Edition of this Poet, with the Version and Commentary of Hoelzin, came out in the Year 1641, at Leyden ex officina Elzeviriana. Mr. Menage speaks very disadvantageously of it (b). First, he relates these Words of Mr. Baillet: 'We have some ancient 'Scholia upon Apollonius——The new Edition 'which Jeremiah Hoelzlin hath given of it, is es'teemed by some, but others value it no more than 'those which are called Variorum: And then having answered to what concerns the Scholia, he thus goes on. 'As for Jeremiah Hoelzlin, he is a wretched Wri'ter, he is wholly wrapped up in Hebraisms, he af'fects old Words that are out of Date, and invents 'new ones. I will here observe by the by, that he 'speaks of Conradus Rittershusius as of his Patron. Con'radus Rittershusius sanctissimus ille juris interpres & 'vindex, idemque patronus olim meus, insigniter pius '& constans (c) animus. 'Tis at the 115th Page. 'There are at the end of his Edition of Apollonius, 'some Notes of Holstenius, which are very judicious. The Funeral Oration tells us, that while Hoelzlin was at Altorf, he had an intimate Friendship with Scipio Gentilis, Michael Picart, Conrad Rittershusius, and Daniel Swensirus, and that they mutually wrote Greek and Latin Verses for one another, and that part of 'em have been published: Cum quibus Græcis Latinisque carminibus certabat, quorum non pauca in lucem venerunt.

(A) Edition of many Greek Authors.] He published the Eight Books of Origen against Celsus, in Greek and Latin, at Augsburg 1605. in Quarto. The Wisdom of Jesus, the Son of Sirach, or the Ecclesiasticus, in Greek and Latin, with Notes, at Antwerp, in the Year 1604. The Bibliotheque of Photius in Greek, with Notes, at Augsburg in the Year 1601, in Folio. The History of Procopius, in Greek, in the same City, in the Year 1607. in Folio. These two last Books had never been printed. Geographica aliquot excellentissimorum authorum Marciani, Scylacis, Artemidori, Dicæarchi, at Augsburg, in the Year 1600. in Quarto. Menandri cum excerptorum corollis è libris Diodori Siculi amissis*, at Augsburg. 1603. in 8. Some Treatises of the ancient Fathers, &c.

(B) The Pains he took to enrich their Library.] Spizelius acquaints us with it: His Words shew, that Antony Ivachius, Bishop of Corfu, had collected most excellent Manuscripts, which fell into Hoeschelius's Hands. (d) Cum insuper celebratissima Bibliotheca Augustanæ administratio ipsi esset demandata, omnem curam, ut ejus procuratori incumbentem, nec ullis parcens labori, libros excusos pariter ac manuscriptos, maximè Græcos, meliorisque notæ authores, ac librorum editiones conquisivit, sicque Bibliothecam Augustanam veluti publicum aliquod Ærarium instruxit ad omnium promiscuè indigentiam sublevandam. Et cum rarissimorum Codicum MSS. Græcorum, magno ære ab Antonio Eparcho Episcopo Corcyrensi coemptorum copiam esset consecutus, maximam curam adhibuit, ne thesaurus iste librarius in arcanis Bibliothecæ hujus recessibus veluti in perpetuo quodam custodiretur carcere, sed in publicam etiam lucem magno cum totius Reipublicæ literariæ bono & commodo prodiret. The Catalogue of Greek Manuscripts of that Library, composed by Hoeschelius, and published in the Year 1595, is a Master-piece (e).

(C) He made good Scholars.] I will make use again of Spizelius's Expressions. Quam præclare, says he (f), *quamque feliciter demandata sibi functioni satisfecerit, plurimi testari possunt viri eruditi qui è variis Germaniæ, Italiæ, Belgiique civitatibus Hoeschelii gratia Augustam se contulerunt, quibus viri hujus institutione uti, nunquelingua Græca proficere cura & corde fuit. He is a great Pedant, but a good 'Man. Scaliger sent him his Procopius, but he had 'a larger one from the Library of Ravaxis. Hoef'chelius, in his Procopius, has printed some Frag'ments of my Letters, and of those of Casaubon. 'He is now printing Origen——Hoeschelius non 'est magnus Græcus, sed diligentissimus (h).

(A) Was Head of a Theological Faction.] This is the Thirteenth Schism that happen'd in the Lutheran Church. The Jesuit Adam Contzen observes (a) under the Year 1583. that Hoffman's Antagonist was Preacher to Henry Julius, Duke of Brunswick, and that this Prince in the Quality of Administrator of the Bishoprick of Halberstad, impos'd Silence on the Parties. (B) Pro-

That Quarrel, which lasted not long, left People's Minds (B) disposed to Division; so that other Matters were disputed afterwards with great Heat, and Hoffman was always the Head of a Party. The Question was, amongst other Things, what use ought to be made of Philosophical Principles in Divinity; and 'tis to be observed, that the Professors in Philosophy (C) took that part which was most favourable to the Orthodox. Daniel Hoffman and Theodorus Beza wrote one against another, upon the Controversie of the Eucharist. See the Remark, where I give the Titles (D) of some of Hoffman's Works.

'Twas not only upon the Ubiquity that our Doctor quarrelled with the other Ministers, but also about Predestination; for he censured Hunnius for explaining it contrary to the intent of the Book of the Concord. Nay, he accused him of having vented in Lusher's Chair, a more pernicious Doctrine than that of the Papists. The Book of the Concord, said he, teaches, that the Cause of Election is wholly out of our selves; But Hunnius and Mylius teach, that Election is Founded on the Foresight of Faith. Hunnius and Mylius caused Hoffman to be condemn'd in an Assembly of Divines in the Year 1593, and threatned him with an Anathema, if he did not subscribe to their Opinion. He published an Apology against 'em in the Year following [a]. Hospinian relates this more exactly. He says, [b] that some Divines of Leipsick, Jena, and Wittemberg, having assisted at the Second Marriage of Samuel Huber, in 1593, met at Polycarp Lyserus's House; and that some of them were of Opinion, that it ought to be declared in a publick and authentick Form, that Daniel Hoffman was a Calvinist, and of the Number of those Hereticks, who ought to be avoided: But the greater Number of them were for writing to him to advise him to conform to their Doctrine, without which he should be excommunicated. Hunnius, in the Name of the rest, wrote a long Letter to him to that purpose. 'Twas against that Letter that Hoffman published an Apology in the Year following [c], in which he declar'd the Reasons that hindered him from conforming to the Divines of Wittemberg. He declar'd [d] that he had found in their Books above a Hundred gross Errors, contrary to the Articles of the Christian Faith.

TO say that what is true in Philosophy, is false in Divinity, is a pernicious Error.

(B) Peoples Minds dispos'd to Division.] The first Author that I quote in the preceding Remark, goes on thus. (b) Sed in cineribus suffocata est controversia, cui utinam fomes novus postea non esset quæsitus! Sopita jaceat cum altera illa, qua de resurrectione impiorum quærebatur, an virtute meriti Christi futura sit, necne? ut & cum illa, qua quærebatur, an semper in forma syllogistica disputari debeat: & cum aliis quæstionibus vexatis, de philosophiæ usu & abusu.

(C) The Professors in Philosophy took that part.] This is the Testimony James Thomasius gives them in one of his Prefaces. Celebris est, says he (c), quæ parentum nostrorum memoriâ Juliam concussit Academiam, Hofmanniana controversia, finiente sæculo proximè præterito cœpta, ineunte hoc nostro sæculo non sine Philosophorum, qui tum ab hoc negotio partibus stabant, laude sopita. De quâ nihil addam, tum quid ob recentiorem memoriam nemini res est ignota——— tum maximè, quod in personâ Theologi unius alterius-ve inconsiderati, sanctissimæ scientiæ parcendum esse omninò existimo. He examines in that Discourse, whether a thing can be true in Philosophy, and false in Divinity, as some have pretended; and he observes, that amongst those who have ventured upon such a Paradox, some have been induced to it by an excessive Respect, and others by an inordinate Hatred for Aristotle. These were the Divines. Ad Theologos venio, è diverso planè affectu idem dogma defensantes. Non enim amore, sed odio Aristotelis; non veneratione, sed dedignatione Philosophorum, in istam temeritatem, ne quid gravius dicam, præcipitati sunt (d). That the Readers may the better understand what was Daniel Hoffman's Opinion, I will add further a Passage of Thomasius. It contains a thing which deserves of it self to be related. (e) Nisi enim fallor, infelix illud & scandalo plenum certamen, quod nostrâ memoriâ super Quæstione, sitne DEUS peccati causa peracciens? certatum fuit, è sepulta Hofmanniana controversia cineribus aut propullulavit, aut videri saltem voluit propullulasse. Non planè abludere à vero quæ dixi, facile (opinor) perspiciet, qui CL. Viri, Pauli Slevogti Pervigilium de dissidio Theologi & Philosophi in utriusque principiis fundato, (hoc enim libello nomen est) pervolutaverit (1). Enimverò hic inter primos fuit, qui quæstionem modo dictam in isthoc scripto, quod vigesimus tertius hujus sæculi annus produxit in scenam, excitaret, hujusque negativam in Scholis Theologorum, affirmativam inter Philosophos veram esse (2) defenderet. Cui anno statim sequente Vir non minori eruditionis laude clarus Andreas Keslerus discursuum Theologicorum quadrigam (3) opposuit. Thomasius had reason for saying, it was a very scandalous thing to maintain, that it is a Truth in Philosophy, that God is the Author of Sin by Accident, but that it is not true in Divinity. And he is in the right to approve Casman (f), who told that such a Division of Truth is an occasion of maintaining the most impious Errors; for indeed nothing is more proper to introduce Scepticism, than such sort of reasoning, as reduces Truth to the Condition of Corporal Qualities. From the same Body appearing little or big, according as we see it with Glasses, or without, we may rightly conclude, that we are ignorant whether it be great or small in it self, and that the absolute Littleness or Greatness of Bodies, is unknown to us. If therefore the same Proposition was true and false, according as it is consider'd either in Divinity or Philosophy, it would necessarily follow, that we don't know Truth in it self, and that it consists only in a mutable Relation to the Dispositions of our Mind; as the Pleasantness of Foods consists only in a certain Relation to the Dispositions of the Tongue; which when they happen to change, take away the Pleasantness of the Aliments. I am going to cite an Author, who will tell us, that our Hoffman and his Party, maintain'd, that Philosophy ought to be banished the Universities, as a most pernicious Discipline, by which many Theological Truths are false. The Opposers of this Faction were excluded from the Ministry. At last, by the Authority of the Prince, those Disputes were ended, and Hoffman was obliged to submit. (g) Contendebant Hoffmannus & ipsius asseclæ Philosophiam pugnare cum Theologia: multa esse vera in Theologia quæ sint falsa in Philosophia, & contra; exterminandam Christianis Academiis ut noxiam, ut toties etiam graviter ab antiqua Ecclesia damnatam. His se initiis statim opposuerunt ejus Academiæ Philosophi, Duncanus Liddelius Scotus Med. D. Corn. Martini, Joh. Caselius & alii, rati ad se pertinere ejus defensionem, cujus professores essent. Res contentionibus diu acta est, ita ut Hoffmannus eo tandem à Ministerio excluderetur qui contrarium sentirent. Habita sapius disputationes & magni fluctus in illo simpulo excitati. Extant ejus tamen aliquammulta acta. Tandem lis sopita est authoritate Principis: restitutus bonos suos Philosophiæ ejusque Doctoribus est. Hoffmanniani cesserunt.

HENRY Julius, Duke of Brunswick, ordered that Daniel Hoffman should make an Acknowledgment of his Error, and a publick Recantation. That Order was executed the 7th. of March, 1601. HOFMAN (Melchior) from a ſimple [a] Mechanick, ſet up for a Preacher, and fell to dogmatiſing in Livonia, and elſewhere, without any ſort of Call from any Perſon whatever. He left Saxony in great Diſcontent, and went from thence into Holſtein, in the Year 1527. He was made Miniſter at Kiel, by the King of Denmark, and he kept that Poſt near two Years, notwithſtanding Luther's (A) Oppoſition. He preached up I know not what Medley of Zuinglianiſm and Fanaticiſm; and hardly explain'd any thing to his Auditors, beſides the Conſtruction of the Moſaick Tabernacle, the Viſions of the Apocalypſe, and ſuch like Things. He pretended the Day of Judgment would be in the Year 1534. They who anſwered him upon that or other Points, met with their Match; for, as he had a very ill Tongue, he anſwered them (B) with the greateſt Fury. He loaded Marquardus Schuldorpius with Affronts, and reproached (C) him with the Crime of Inceſt. To prevent the Diſorders, that might ariſe from theſe Diſputes, the King of Denmark appointed a Conference [b] in the Year 1529, in which Hofman was confounded: And whereas he perſiſted in his Opinions, he was baniſhed out of Holſtein. From thence he went to Strasburg, where he publiſhed (D) a falſe Relation of the Conference. He was impriſon'd in the Year 1532, after a publick Diſpute, wherein he engaged with the Miniſters. This loſt his Reputation with his Followers. He died in the Year 1533, or thereabouts *. He was not of Holſtein (E) as ſome have given out.

A nobis enim receſſit indignabundus, dum non voluimus ejus ſomnia probare. Ad docendum neque valet, neque vocatus eſt. Hæc dicito nomine meo omnibus veſtris, ut ipſum vitent ac tacere cogant. Luther* would have no Body to hear this Man, who thruſt himſelf into the Miniſtry, without any Call or Capacity. And Francis Burchard, Counſellor of the Dukes of Saxony, cautioned alſo the World againſt him (b).

(B) He anſwered them with the greateſt Fury.] All his Books were written in the vulgar Language: His Apology againſt Nicolas Amsdorf, firſt Miniſter at Magdeburg, was printed in the Year 1528. This Miniſter had confuted him, concerning the Time of the World's end. Oppoſuit ei Hofmannus apologiam amarulentiſſimam——in iſta convitiorum plauſtra in Adverſarium evomit (c).

(C) Reproach'd him with the Crime of Inceſt.] The Accuſation was founded upon Schuldorpius's marrying his Niece. (d) *Marq. Schuldorpio, Kilonienſi, Parocho Steſvic. qui ſuam de S. (D) He publiſhed a falſe Relation.] He maintained, that he had ſtopt Pomeranus's Mouth (f), and that the Secretaries of the Conference were Forgers (g). Pomeranus, to refute theſe Vaunts, publiſhed the Acts of the Conference, with the moſt Authentick Formalities. He added to them the Refutation of Hofman's Writing, and the Converſion of Heggius (h), which was one of the Fruits of that Diſpute; Heggius had been one of Hofman's Seconds, and he gain'd ſo much Knowledge by it, as induc'd him to renounce his Sect (i). The other of Hofman's Seconds did the ſame thing. Pomeranus did not appear at the Conference as a Diſputant, but (k) as one of the Directors under the eldeſt Son of his Daniſh Majeſty. He ended the Conference with an Oration, in which he confuted Hofman's Arguments. Finem Colloquio orationi Bugenhagii adverſus argumenta ipſius [illegible] impoſitum (l).

(F) And that removing to Embden in the Year 1528.] After Mr. Mollerus's Proofs, it can't be doubted, but that Hofman was at Kiel in the Year 1528, and 1529, and that he had retired thither upon his leaving Saxony (n) in Diſcontent; and therefore we may believe they are miſtaken, who make him remove from Strasburg to Embden in 1528. Mr. Ottius obſerves, that many ſay this; and he doth not cenſure 'em. (o) Embdam Argentorato abiiſſe Melchiorem Hoffmannum plures ajunt. Ergo non demum anno 1531. eò conceſſit niſi forte rèdierit, vel diutius ibi commoratus ſit. Theſe Words inform us, that ſome ſay, Hofman went to Embden, in 1531. This ſeems the to be true Epoch of his Miniſtry at Embden: for ſince he publiſhed in Strasburg a Relation of the Conference (p) of Flensburg in the Year 1529; 'tis a Proof that he went to Strasburg, when he was expell'd from Holſtein. 'Tis very probable that from Strasburg he went to Embden, and that he returned again to Strasburg: he was there in the Year 1532. Note, That Mr. Mollerus promiſes a Relation of the Tumults he raiſed (q) in Strasburg and Embden, after he left Holſtein. Is not this to tell us, that he went to Embden, after he had divulg'd his Dreams in Strasburg, in the Year 1529? Mr. Hoornbeek (r) has reaſon for ſaying, that he return'd from Embden to Strasburg, but not for ſaying, that he went from Strasburg to Embden in 1528. This Author obſerves, that at his going from Embden, he left there one Trypmaacker, who quarrelling with his Collegues, retired into Holland, and became the firſt Apoſtle of the Anabaptiſts. Caſſander is leſs miſtaken about the Date of this Fanatick's Miniſtry. he there vented his Viſions with ſo aſtoniſhing a Succeſs, as to paſs for (G) the firſt Patriarch of the Anabaptiſts of the Netherlands and the Lower Germany. He ſo infatuated his Followers, that they took him for that Elias, which God is to ſend upon the Earth before the Day of Judgment. He returned to Strasburg with hopes to ſee the Succeſs of a Prophecy, that concern'd him (H), and which had been given out by a good old Man of Frieſland. He there preached up Anabaptiſm openly. The Diſturbances he raiſed, occaſioned the calling of a Synod in June, 1532. where he was permitted to diſpute with the Miniſters, and was ſolidly confuted. But he continued to dogmatize, and it was thought neceſſary to (I) impriſon him, the People thinking themſelves upon the Brink of great Troubles, becauſe his Followers ſaid the Town of Strasburg was to be the New Jeruſalem, where the new Kingdom of Chriſt ſhould be eſtabliſhed, and that as Hofman was the Elias that was to come, Polserman was the Enoch who was to Second him. When they ſaw Hofman in Priſon, they gave out, that he ſhould come out with One hundred forty four Thouſand Marked People, who ſhould anathematize the Earth, and break through all the Obſtacles that might be oppos'd. Our Elias, and our Enoch, ſaid they, are the two Olives, and the two Candleſticks in the Revelation †, which no Body can hurt, and if any one attempt it, Fire ſhall come out of their Mouth, and devour their Enemies. When they ſaw Hofman did not come out of Priſon at the Time appointed by ſome of the Prophets, they were in a great Conſternation; but to amuſe them, he ſent 'em Word, they muſt reſt for two Years, like Eſdras and Haggai, who were forced for a like Space of time to interrupt the Building of the Temple. He died in Priſon, and fruſtrated the Hopes of his Diſciples *. I will relate ſome of (K) his Hereſies. Some ſay ‡ that he began to preach near the Rhine, after the Defeat of the Peaſants in 1525.

(H) To ſee the Succeſs of a Prophecy that concerned him.] Whilſt he was planting his Goſpel at Embden with great Heat, and ſtoutly re-baptizing People, there was a good old Man, who poſſeſt him with a deſire to return to Strasburg. This old Man was of that Gang. He prophecied, that the Magiſtrates of Strasburg ſhould impriſon Hofman, but that at ſix Months end the Priſoner ſhould be delivered, and ſhould go and preach the Goſpel over all the Earth, as another Elias, having with him a great Train of Prophets, and the One hundred and forty four thouſand Marked Perſons, mentioned in the Revelation (d). Hofman having publickly diſputed with the Miniſters the 11th. of June, 1532, and not ceaſing to ſpread his Enthuſiaſms, after he had been confounded in that Diſpute, was clapt into Priſon. When he ſaw that part of the Prophecy was accompliſhed, he became more inſolent. He ſhook off the Duſt from his Feet, he threw his Hat upon the Ground, and proteſted before God, that he would feed upon nothing but Bread and Water, till he ſhould point out with his Finger him that ſent him. His hopes were confounded, for he died in Priſon (e). A hundred Inſtances ſhew, that the moſt Chimerical Predictions have had ſome Parts of them confirmed by the Event: which has given Strength to the Error; nothing contributing more to the Ruin of theſe Viſioniſts and their Adherents. 'Tis eſpecially with Relation to theſe Matters, that it may be ſaid, The End Crowns the Work. Men ſhould be very cautious of judging of the whole by a part, ex ungue leonem. The Concluſion is to be waited for, and the firſt Succeſs ought to be diſtruſted; for this is a Snare, and a dangerous Allurement.

He relates a Paſſage of Henry Urſin (h), where we learn, that Hofman prophecied that Year, that Strasburg ſhould be the New Jeruſalem, as Rome was Babylon; that Strasburg ſhould be beſieged the ſame Year, and that there ſhould be a great Slaughter in't; and that this Man preferred his Predictions before thoſe of Iſaiah and Jeremiah; and that Matthias and his Favourers applied to Munſter all theſe fine Prerogatives of Strasburg, which diſpleaſed Hofman when he knew it.

(A) That ſhe was not a Looſe Woman till ſhe ſaw her Deſign miſcarry.] A Modern Author, who quotes Sigonius and Marcellinus, ſays that Honoria, devour'd with a Luſtful Flame ſent an Eunuch to Attila to offer her ſelf in Marriage to him with the Empire; that Attila ſent ſome Embaſſadors to the Emperor Valentinian to ask Honoria of him; but before their return, he fell ſo much in Love with a young Lady of his Nation, that he Married her and Died on his Wedding-day with too much Drinking and Careſſing his Spouſe. Upon which Honoria, diſappointed of her hopes, gave up her ſelf to ſome Gallants, who got her with Child, after which ſhe was ſent to Conſtantinople. *Hac libidine inflammata Eunuchum legatum ad Attilam Hunnorum regem miſit, conjugium & regnum ei offerens. HONORIUS a Roman Emperor, Son of Theodosius. Not to repeat what is found in Moreri, I shall only speak of his Marriage. He Married successively (C) Stilico's two Daughters, who both Died, as is said, with their Virginity. Zosimus (D) Relates hereupon some very singular Circumstances, not to be found in other Historians; but he is Guilty of a great (E) Contradiction, which plainly appears to every Reader.

HOORNBEEK (John) a Professor of Divinity in the Universities of Utrecht and Leyden, was one of the most famous Divines, that appeared in Holland in the XVII*th*. Century. He was Born at Haerlem † in the Year 1617, where he perform'd his Studies till he was fifteen or sixteen years of Age; after which he was sent to Leyden, where he made a great Improvement under the Learned Professors of that University. Having staid two years there, he went to Study at Utrecht in the Year 1635, from whence he returned to Leyden the Year following. He was admitted Minister in the Year 1639, and went to exercise his Office secretly at Cologne. He discharged all his Duties with abundance of Piety and Prudence, and was not Discouraged with the Dangers he was expos'd to in such a Popish Town. He return'd to Holland in the Year 1643, and was made * Doctor of Divinity with great Applauses the 21*st* of December of the same Year. He gave such Proofs of his great Capacity, that he was look'd upon as a Man sufficiently qualified for the Professorship of Divinity, which was vacant at Utrecht since the Death of Schotanus. He accepted that Imploy preferably to all others, which (A) were offered him in other Towns. He was Install'd Professor of Divinity at Utrecht in July 1644. He was made Ordinary Pastor of the same Town the year following, and notwithstanding the Difficulty of discharging the Duties of those two Places, he acquitted (B) himself of them with great Exactness, whereby his nit: inde gravida facta, Constantinopolim mittitur (h).

(B) That before she had that Intention, she led but a disorderly Life.] 'Honoria, (i) Sister of the 'Emperor Valentinian, giving her self up to the 'Comptroller of his Household, was disgracefully 'driven out of her Brother's Palace, and afterwards 'forc'd to retire into the East to Theodosius. Which 'inspired her with so Furious a Passion for Revenge, 'that finding no other way to satisfy it, she secretly 'sent to Attila, to perswade him to undertake the 'Conquest of Italy, which the weakness of Valentinian, and the Confusion of the Empire would 'make very easy for him. According to Bonfinius's Account (k), she was in a Convent when she sent to found Attila, who perceiving that the Affair did not go on, thought himself played upon: which induced him to Marry the Daughter of the King of the Bastrians. If Honoria was in a Cloyster, 'tis a sign she had behaved her self ill.

(C) Stilico's two Daughters.] The first was called Mary and the other Thermantia. Their Mother Serena, fired with Ambition, did not stay till Mary was Marriageable, to give her to the Emperor; and after Mary's Death, she was in as great haste to Marry Thermantia to the same Prince. The Words I am going to quote, testify that they Died Maids. (l) Stilico Comes, cujus filiæ duæ Maria & Thermantia, singulæ uxores Honorii principis fuerant, utraque tamen virgo defuncta. And yet the Poet Claudian tells us that Honorius and Mary lay together (m). See the next Remark.

(D) Zosimus relates hereupon some singular Circumstances.] Serena not being able to resolve upon deferring the Marriage of her Daughter Mary with the Emperor, nor to Consent that Nature should be forced by the Consummation of the Marriage, because Mary was not yet ripe for it, imagined a Medium, which was to debilitate Honorius. She found out a Woman experienced in this sort of Charms, who contrived the matter so, that Honorius when he went to Bed to his young Spouse, had neither Inclination nor Power to pay the Conjugal Duty. Mary Died soon after with her Virginity. Honorius (n) sometime after Courted Thermantia, Mary's Sister: the Father was not inclined to the Marriage; but Serena Passionately desired it, that she might maintain her Authority. The Marriage was performed, but it lasted but a little while; Thermantia soon Dying with the same Fate as her Sister. That is to say, she lay with a Man that neither would nor could know her: The Sorceress, whom Serena had made use of, renewed the Operation of her Charms. Zosimus doth not expressly say this: 'Tis only a Consequence I draw from his Words. I set them down somewhat at length; they deserve it, as containing a very singular thing, Τὸ γάμα πρὸς τὸν Μαρίαν Ὁνωρίῳ ἐκτελεῖται, γάμων ὄφιν ἔνα τὸν κόρην ἄγουσα ἡ μήτηρ ἐπῳδὸς, ἢ ἐπὶ ἀπαλλαγῇ τοῦ γάμου ἀνέχεται, ἢ τῇ παρ' ἐλπίδα εἰς μέσον ἐκφέρει. γάμους δὲ ἀνάλυσε μὴ δὲν ἐπὶ πολὺ ἔσεσθαι, χρόνῳ τε τελευτᾷ θυγατρὸς ἐπιγαμίαν τυγχάνει, κατὰ τὰ ἴσα τῇ πρώτῃ. μὴν τὸν θυγατέρα τῷ βασιλεῖ ἢ ὁμιλεῖσθαι εἶναι. Τὴν δὲ μὲν ἰδίαν μίαν ἐνιαυτὸν τὰ τοῦ γάμου προεκπλῆσαι κρείττων. Ἐν τούτῳ τῆς νύμφης ἀνήρ γάμον ἀποδύεται, ἀπάτης ἐπὶ βασιλεῖ γαμεῖ ὑποβαλόμενος ἀπὸ τῆς μὴ τὴν φυσικὴν κρίσιν ἐνεργεῖν ἐκ φαρμάκων, τῆς ἀνδρὸς συνεύδειν τὸν Ὁνώριον ἐποιοῦντο. ἢ δὲ γυνὴ φίλτρα μὲν ἀπὸ μιᾶς κατ' ἐνιαυτὸν τῆς γαμετῆς ἐκβάλλει.

(n) Quum Honorius matrimonium cum Maria contraheret, mater ejus Serena quæ puellam nondum nubilem ætatem attigisse cerneret, ne neque sibi posset imperare ut nuptiæ differentur, & immaturam maritali consuetudini tradere nihil esse arbitraretur aliud quam injuriam naturæ facere; nacta mulierem quæ rebus hujusmodi remedium adferre sciret, ejus opera perfecit, ut filia cum principe quidem viveret, ac tori consors ejusdem esset, verum ille nec vellet nec posset, ea quæ matrimonium requireret, implere. Interim puella virgine mortua, non abs re Serena quæ sobolis imperatoriæ consequendæ percupida esset, ob metum ne quid sibi de tanta potentia decederet, id operam dabat ut Honorium alteri filiæ copularet. Quo facto, puella non multo post vitam cum morte commutat, quum idem ei quod priori accidisset.

(E) But he is guilty of a great Contradiction.] We have seen, that he says, Thermantia Died a little after her Marriage; yet he assures us in the same Book, that Honorius (b) having put Stilico to Death, sent back Thermantia to her Mother. Stilico was killed the same year, that Honorius Married Thermantia, that is, in the Consulship of Bassus and Philip in the year 408. As to the other Daughter of Stilico, she Married the Emperor in the year 398. in which year was the War against Gildo. See Claudian's Passage (c).

(A) Which were offer'd him in other Towns.] In February 1644. the Church of Maestricht would have had him for their Minister. That of Graft in North Holland invited him in March in the same year, and he was offered a Professorship of Divinity in the Illustrious School of Harderwick (d) in May following (e). 'Tis a very glorious thing to be thus Courted at 27 years of Age.

(B) He acquitted himself of them with great Exactness.] I have reserved the Particulars of it for this Remark, in which I make use of the Words of him who wrote our Hoornbeek's Life. In utroque (f) autem Statione per decennium fere perseveravit, tanta eruditionis, eloquentiæ, pietatis & diligentiæ fama, omnibus quo ordinibus adeo gratus, ut nullus in majori fuerit existimatione, non Ultrajecti solum, sed in toto Belgio. Nempe assiduus erat in docendo, precando, concionando, legendo, disputando, regendo, præsidendo, catechisationibus habendis, numbris Ecclesiæ, imprimis ægris visitandis. Quibus artibus optimis certe, Magistratus Trajectini gratiam adeo his excellent Talents became so useful to the Publick, that he got the Love and Esteem of every Body. But that he might not sink under so many Labours, the Magistrates dispensed him with part of his Ministerial Function. He was invited to Leyden, to the same Imployments that he had at Utrecht; and he accepted of them in the Year 1654. He was a great Ornament to that famous University, till his Death, which happen'd the first of September 1666. He deserved a much longer Life; but it's more to be wondred that a Man so Laborious (C) as he was, should Live 49 Years, than that he lived no longer. The many (D) Books he Published, are a speaking Proof of his Application and vast Extent of Knowledge. He understood many (E) Languages, and had the Friendship of the most excellent * Divines of his Age. He never Deviated from the most rigid Orthodoxy, and was no less recommendable for the Qualities of a Moral and Virtuous Man, than for the Talents of his Mind, and of a Learned Professor. This we may see in the Particulars of his Life †. He left Children worthy of him (F), and one needs say no more for their Commendation.

HORATIUS (Publius) Sirnamed Coeles did a glorious Action, whilst the City of Rome, his Native Country, was Besieged by King Porsenna. His Article being very good, and large enough in Moreri's Dictionary ‡, mine shall be very short, and I shall insist only on the difference that is to be found among the Antient Historians, (A) with respect to a Circumstance, that should have been related without any Variation.

HORTENSIA, Sister of the Orator Hortensius. Thus it is a Modern Author names her *; but as he himself Acknowledges in another Place †, the name that Plutarch gives Hortensius's Sister is Valeria. Turn therefore to VALERIA, for we are no ways oblig'd to give Hortensius two Sisters of different Names.

HORTENSIA, Daughter of the Orator Hortenſius, ſhewed her ſelf worthy of ſuch a Father, by her Eloquence, when ſhe pleaded the Cauſe of the Roman Ladies before the Triumviri, who had decreed that fourteen hundred of them ſhould declare what Eſtates they Poſſeſt, intending after that to Tax them according to their Fancy for the Expences of the War. Thoſe Triumviri were Mark Antony, Octavius, and Lepidus. They had at firſt ſignified that thoſe who ſhould not give in a true Valuation of their Eſtates, ſhould be fin ed; and that a Reward ſhould be given to thoſe who ſhould diſcover their Deceit. The Ladies recurr'd to the Interceſſion of thoſe amongſt 'em, who might have an Intereſt in the Triumviri, and were civilly received by the Siſter of Octavius, and the Mother of Mark Antony: but Fulvia Mark Antony's Wife, ſhut the Door againſt them; inſomuch that they reſolved to preſent themſelves before the Triumviri. Hortenſia was their Speaker, and made a moſt excellent Speech. Quintilian * has mentioned it with Praiſe. The Triumviri were ſo harſh, as to Cenſure the boldneſs which the Ladies had expreſſed, and they commanded their Servants (A) to turn them out. That Order ſet all the Company a crying; the Murmurs hinder'd the Uſhers from executing the Order: Whereupon the Triumviri put off the Buſineſs to the next Day. The Iſſue was, that only four hundred Women were oblig'd to give an Eſtimate of their Poſſeſſions ‡. By this we may make a better judgment of that Event than by (B) Moreri's Account of it, and even by Valerius Maximus's Words, which may be ſeen in one of the Remarks.

HORTENSIUS, The name of a Plebeian Family of Rome, taken probably from their Application to Gardening, as that of Fabius and Lentulus, &c. came from a BUS TELIS INCOLUMIS ad ſuos tranſiit, rem auſus plus fama habituram ad poſteros quam fidei. We may be ſure that all thoſe, who don't Expreſly obſerve his receiving of a Wound, are of Livy's Opinion; for their Deſign was to commend the great Courage of this Roman. Now that Action is more Admirable and Glorious, if he was Wounded, than if he was not. We muſt ſay then, that if Florus (g) and Seneca (b) make no mention of a Wound, 'tis becauſe they were perſwaded he received none. Valerius Maximus has ſo poſitively denied that he receiv'd any, that this ought to induce us to believe, there was a Tradition for the Negative. (i) Ut patriam periculo imminenti liberatam vidit, armatus ſe in Tiberim miſit: cujus fortitudinem Dii immortales admirati, INCOLUMITATEM SINCERAM ei præſtiterunt. Nam neque altitudine dejectus, quaſſatuſve, neque pondere armorum preſſus, nec ullo vorticis circuitu actus: nec telis quidem, quæ undique congerebantur, LÆSUS, TUTUM natandi eventum habuit. But there are three famous Hiſtorians, who go upon another Tradition. Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus (k) gives a long Account of this Fight, and aſſures us in expreſs Words, that Horatius received a Wound with a Lance that pierced his Thigh, and put him to ſuch Torture that he could ſcarce ſtand, when he underſtood the Bridge was broken. This Hiſtorian adds 1. that 'twas believ'd, he would ſoon Die of his Wounds: 2. That when it was known he would recover, he had noble Recompences given him; but that he could not come to the Conſulſhip, nor to any Military Office, becauſe he halted ever after the Fight. Plutarch ſays (l) that a Statue of Braſs was Erected to him in the Temple of Vulcan, to comfort him upon the misfortune of his being Cripple: by that Wound. He had ſaid before that he had recover'd the Town by Swimming, being Wounded in his Hip: (m) ὑπὸ τὴν βουβωνίαν τὸν μηρὸν. Jaculo Hetruſco in natibus ictus. Dion Caſſius affirms, that Cicero Declaiming againſt Mark Antony before the Senate, Swore (n) by Horatius's Thigh, and Mutius's Hand. I am not ignorant that that direct Oration which he ſpeaks of, is not like any of Cicero's Philippicks: But Dion who forg'd it, would not have uſed ſuch an Oath, had not there been a Tradition that Horatius was Wounded in the Thigh in defending his Country againſt Tarquin's Friends. We'll produce a fourth Witneſs viz. Servius. (p) Solus Coeles hoſtilem impetum ſuſtinuit, donec à tergo pons ſolveretur à ſociis, quo ſoluto ſe cum armis præcipitavit in Tyberim, & licet LÆSUS eſſet in coxa, tamen ejus fuenta ſuperavit. Unde eſt illud ab eo dictum, cum ei in comitiis coxa vitium objiceretur, per ſingulos gradus admoneor triumphi mei. You ſee that the Tradition about Horatius's Wound was ſupported with the Circumſtances of a Witty Saying he made uſe of, when he was reproached with his Lameneſs: Every Step, ſaid he, that I make, puts me in mind of my Triumph. 'Tis ſaid that Alexander (q) made uſe of that thought to comfort the King his Father, who was afflicted with a Lameneſs he received from a Wound in a Battle.

If we have reaſon to wonder that in an Event ſo Remarkable as this of Horatius, the Traditions for and againſt his being Wounded, ſhould have had each their Partiſans and Followers, even among the moſt famous Writers, what ſhall we ſay of Polybius (r) who ſuppoſes that this brave and undaunted Roman loſt his Life in the Tiber? Shall we ſay that he had another Tradition for it? Shall we conclude from hence, that Antient Hiſtory is ſo Dark, that we know not generally what ſide to take amongſt thoſe who deny, and thoſe who affirm the ſame things? And that the Yea and the No being equally Authoriz'd in Matters, wherein it was the eaſieſt thing in the World to know the truth, we may well doubt of the leſs notable Events which the Hiſtorians have mentioned? I ſay, ſhall we infer ſuch Concluſions? I ſhould rather adviſe the Reader to make uſe of theſe Obſervations to fortify his Judgment againſt the Cuſtom of reading without Attention, and of believing without Examination. Note, that the difference of Opinions about Horatius's Face, is not ſo much to be wonder'd at; 'tis however a ſign of Hiſtorical Uncertainty. Some affirm that (f) Horatius was a very handſome Man, others ſay (t) 'that he was Sir-'named Coeles——becauſe he was extreamly 'Flat-Nos'd, and that the upper part of his Noſe 'was ſo ſunk into his Head, that there was no Di-'viſion betwixt his two Eyes, and that his Eye-'brows join'd; ſo that the People deſigning to call 'him Cyclops, miſtook and call'd him Coeles.

He has committed two other Faults; 1. that Hortenſia writ many things, 2. That the Roman Ladies were taxed, becauſe the Publick Neceſſities required it. 'Twas rather from the Tyrannical Avarice of the Triumviri. How many faults do's the deſire of praiſing People, occaſion!

The Triumviri and not the Senate laid this ſevere Tax, as he calls it. 2. They did not lay it on all the Women of Rome, but only on the Rich: 'twas a Tax on thoſe that could well bear it. 3. Hortenſia was indeed the only Speaker, but not the only Actor or Interceſſor for her Sex; for all that were concerned, went in a Body to Sollicite the Mothers, Siſters, and Wives of the Triumviri; and af-era like Original. Antonius Auguſtinus had no reaſon to Rank this Family (A) among the Patricians, ſince we find in the Faſti one Lucius HORTENSIUS, Tribune of the People in the 331. year of Rome. He accuſed Sempronius Atratinus the Conſul of the foregoing Year, of having raſhly Attack'd the Volſci: But his four Collegues, who were preſent at the Battle, ſo earneſtly deſired him to drop the Accuſation, that after having done all that was poſſible to bring them over to his ſide, at laſt he granted them that Favour, when he ſaw them reſolved to quit the Enſigns of their Dignity all the time that the Tryal ſhould laſt. He would not † ſuffer the People to ſee their Tribunes in ſuch an Apparel, nor bring a Conſul to ſuch an Extremity, who had at leaſt gained the Friendſhip of his Soldiers. Above a hundred Years (B) after we find one Quintus HORTENSIUS Dictator. He brought back the People, who had retired to the Janiculum, and made (C) a Law, that thenceforth all the Romans ſhould be oblig'd to obey the Ordinances of the People. He Died in his Dignity ‖, which was never † ſeen before. Moreri (D) is ſtrangely out concerning this Dictator. afterwards they came to a hearing; where, as in all ſorts of Deputations, one ſpoke for the reſt. I ſay nothing of Moreri's Omiſſions, nor of his wrong Citation of Appian, which has been Transfer'd into the Dutch Edition with a little change, that may deceive the Reader. That Fault proceeds from the Preſs: Moreri doubtleſs writ, li. 4. belli. civil. Inſtead of which the Printers of Lyons put in li. 4. b. li civil. and thoſe of Holland li. 4. b. li. civil. Such a thing has been ſufficient upon many Occaſions, to make one believe that an Author had made ſome Books which he never thought of. Who would not believe, ſeeing Ovid quoted in elog. at the end of the Article Hortenſius, the Orator both in the Dutch and the preceding Editions, that Ovid made a Poem Intitul'd Elogies? Every Body doth not Conjecture that inſtead of in elog. it ſhould be in eleg: A Citation ſomewhat too general, by Voſſius's leave (b) who has uſed it, but yet true at the bottom. There are many other wrong Citations in this Article of Moreri's Dictionary; Pliny is there cited twice; the firſt time falſly. The 5*th.* Chapter of the 3*d.* Book of Varro de re ruſtica and the 13*th.* of the 3*d.* Book of Macrobius's Saturnalia, are quoted wrong, and ſhew that Moreri did not verify whether Voſſius's Printers had put one Figure for another.

(A) Among the Patricians.] The Tract of Antonius Auguſtinus de Romanorum gentibus & familiis, which I make uſe of, was Printed at Lyons in 1592. in 4*to.* We there find word for word upon the Familia Hortenſia, what Richard Streinnius ſaid of it in a Book he Publiſhed upon the ſame Subject in 1559. They both go upon a wrong Reaſon, to place this Family among the Patricians; namely, that Cicero gives the Title of Nobilis to Hortenſius, in his Orations againſt Verres. Who knows not that Nobilis and Plebeius were not Inconſiſtent Words in Antient Rome?

(B) Above a hundred years after.] 'Tis hard to fix the preciſe year of our Quintus Hortenſius's Dictatorſhip. I believe Sigonius was right in placing it in the year 467. Father Hardouin (d) doubtleſs approved that Opinion; but his Printers by omitting a Letter, make him ſay, that the Sedition of the People, which was ſuppreſt by the Dictator Hortenſius, happened in the year CCCLXVII. St. Auſtin will have it, that Hortenſius was Created Dictator by reaſon of the Seceſſion of the People to the Janiculum, which is very probable. (e) Poſt graves & longas Rom. ſeditiones quibus ad ultimum plebs in Janiculum hoſtili diremptione ſeceſſerat, cujus mali tam dira calamitas erat, ut ejus rei cauſa quod in extremis periculis fieri ſolebat, & Dictator crearetur Hortenſius, qui plebe revocata in eodem Magiſtratu expiravit, quod nulli Dictatori ante contigerat.

(C) And made a Law that thenceforth.] An Author cited by Aulus Gellius, Teaches us, that the Ordinances made by the Report, or at the Requeſt of the Tribunes of the People, were not properly called Laws, but Plebiſcita, and that before Hortenſius's Dictatorſhip, the Patricians were not ſubmitted to this ſort of Ordinances. (a) Ne leges quidem proprie ſed Plebiſcita appellantur quæ Tribunis plebis ferentibus accepta ſunt, quibus rogationibus ante Patricii non tenebantur, donec Q. Hortenſius Dictator eam legem tulit ut eo jure quod plebs ſtatuiſſet, omnes Quirites tenerentur. Livy tells us the quite contrary; for he ſays, that Lucius Valerius, and Marcus Horatius, who were made Conſuls in the year of Rome 305, began to ſhew their Complaiſance to the People by making a Law, which left it not in Suſpence, whether the Laws Eſtabliſhed by the People obliged the Senate. That Law decided the thing to the Advantage of the People. (b) Omnium primum cum veluti in controverſo jure eſſet tenerenturne Patres Plebiſcitis, legem centuriatis comitiis tulere ut quod tributim plebes juſſiſſet populum teneret, qua lege Tribunitiis rogationibus telum acerrimum datum eſt. They had been diſſolving the Decemviri, and recalling the Mutinous Populace that was withdrawn to Mount Aventinus. The new Conſuls omitted nothing to make themſelves Popular. The Conſul Quintus Capitolinus acknowledged the force of this new Law three years after; when repreſenting to the People the Advantages that the Senate had given them, he brings into the Account (c) Scita plebis injuncta patribus. The Law was renewed in the 415*th.* year of Rome; the Dictator (d) Publius Philo having ordained that the Plebiſcita ſhould oblige all the Romans. The Author alledged by Aulus Gellius, was not therefore well informed. If he had ſaid that the Senators had the Art of Evading the Deciſion, ſo that it was neceſſary to renew it Authentically in Quintus Hortenſius's Dictatorſhip, he would have been above our Criticiſms: but this he has not done. Pliny (e) ſpeaks of what was Enacted by this Dictator to the People's Advantage, without ſaying, whether there was any ſuch Law before or not. Sigonius did not know what was done under the Conſuls Valerius and Horatius; for he ſays (f), that the Law of Hortenſius had been already made by the Dictator Publius Philo in the year of Rome 414.

(D) Moreri is ſtrangely out.] Two groſs Blunders in a few Words: One in ſaying, that he was a famous Civilian and Lawmaker; the other in ſaying, that the Orator Hortenſius was his Grandſon. Did ever any one call the Magiſtrates of the Roman Common-wealth Legiſlators, becauſe they procured the Inacting of ſome Laws? In that Caſe the number of the Roman Legiſlators would be very great. Nor are they to be called Civilians. But 'tis very probable, that Moreri had no other Knowledge of Q. Hortenſius the Dictator, but his paſſing a Law which ſubmitted the Senate to the Plebiſcita. Beſides, ſince Moreri obſerves that the Dictatorſhip of this Hortenſius fell in the year of Rome 468. how could he take him for the Grandfather of the Orator Hortenſius, a Military Tribune, according to him, in the year bation of the Auditory, but alſo that (B) of the two Conſuls, who were the beſt Judges of that time. This Cauſe was that which he Pleaded for Africa before the Senate under thoſe two Conſuls. Some time after he Pleaded for the King of Bithynia, and had ſtill better ſucceſs. The Social War ariſing in the 663d. year of Rome, the Proceedings of Juſtice were ſo interrupted in the City, that Hortenſius betook himſelf to Arms †. The ſecond Campagne he was made Tribune of the Soldiers; but I believe that he ſtopped there, and that thoſe who give him the Quality of (C) Lieutenant-General, under Sylla, in the War with Mithridates, take him for another. He went ſucceſſively through all the Honours of the Republick; he was Queſtor, Ædile, Prætor, and then Conſul, with Q. Cecilius Metellus, in the Year of Rome 684. The Lot fell upon him to go into Crete, to reduce the Inhabitants of that Iſland; but * as he triumphed at Rome by his Eloquence, he choſe rather to ſhine at the Bar, than in the Field. He therefore yielded up that Poſt to his Collegue, who gained thereby the Honour of a Triumph, and the Sirname of Creticus. Hortenſius had the happieſt Memory (D) in the World. He uſed many Geſtures (E) in Pleading, which occaſioned a very blunt Raillery againſt him before the Judges; for L. Torquatus called him Dionyſia, who was a famous Dancer. You may ſee in Aulus Gellius, what Hortenſius anſwered him. It cannot be denied that he had a great deal of Affectation in his Way; or at leaſt, that he was too nice in his Cloaths (F). He carefully conſulted his Glaſs, as he dreſt himſelf; and 'tis ſaid † that he brought a Suit againſt his Collegue, who paſſing through a narrow Place, had ruffled the Symmetry of his Gown. He had heaped up great Riches, and uſed them plentifully to live an eaſie Life in the City and year of Rome 664? What want of Attention! what Negligence is this!

(B) Of the two Conſuls, who were the beſt Judges of that time.] Theſe were Lucius Caſſius and Quintus Scævola, the firſt (g) whereof was one of the greateſt Orators, and the latter one of the greateſt Civilians, that ever appeared in Rome. This Conſulſhip fell in the year 658: ſo that Hortenſius being then but 19 years Old, 'tis a neceſſary Conſequence that he was Born in the year 639: which we farther Collect from Cicero's being (h) 8 years younger than he: Cicero I ſay, who was Born in the year 647. Here is the Proof of what I have ſaid concerning Hortenſius's firſt Plea. (i) Q. Hortenſii admodum adoleſcentis ingenium, ut Phidiæ ſignum, ſimul aſpectum & probatum eſt. Is L. Craſſo, Q. Scævolæ Coſſ. primum in foro dixit, & apud hos ipſos quidem Conſules, & cum eorum qui affuerunt, tum ipſorum Conſulum qui omnes intelligentia anteibant, judicio diſceſſit probatus; undeviginti annos natus erat eo tempore. Cicero (k) makes this L. Craſſus ſpeak thus: Ego eſſe jam judico (omnibus iſtis laudibus quas oratione complexus ſum, excellentem Hortenſium) & tum judicavi cum me Conſule in Senatu cauſam defendit Africæ, nuperque etiam magis eum pro Bithynia rege dixit.

(C) Of Lieutenant-General under Sylla.] That which makes me believe that our Orator is not the Hortenſius, who had that Poſt in Sylla's Armies, is on one Hand Cicero's ſilence, and on the other the Character which Plutarch gives that Lieutenant-General. Plutarch repreſents him as a Man (l) who perfectly underſtood War, and who never yielded; and relates ſome Actions of him, which Savour of an old experienced Officer, and which concern the 667th. year of Rome. Where ſhould the Orator Hortenſius have got that Experience; he, who began to bear Arms but in the year 663? And if he had acquired it, and Signaliz'd himſelf under Sylla, how comes it that it was not mentioned in thoſe Places where his Praiſes are Inlarg'd upon, and where it is obſerv'd that he was Tribune of the Soldiers, in his ſecond Campagne? (m) Judicia intermiſſa bello——Erat Hortenſius in bello primo anno miles, altero Tribunus militum. Doubtleſs Glandorpius (n) was miſtaken in taking him for Sylla's Lieutenant-General. But what need is there to take Advantage of Cicero's Silence? What he ſays, is much more to my purpoſe. Don't the three years (o) in which Hortenſius was the Chief Man of the Bar, by reaſon of the Death or Abſence of the moſt famous Orators, coincide with the time that Sylla had the other Hortenſius in his Army?

(D) The happieſt Memory in the World.] He repeated a Plea juſt as he had Meditated it, without writing one Word of it, and forgot nothing that was ſaid by his Adverſaries. (p) Primum memoria tanta quantam in viro cognoviſſe me arbitror, ut quæ ſecum ſummentatus eſſet, ea ſine ſcripto verbis iiſdem redderet quibus cogitaviſſet. Hoc adjumento illo tanto ſic utebatur, ut ſua & commentata & ſcripta, & nullo referente omnia adverſariorum dicta meminiſſet. What Seneca ſays of him, is much more Remarkable. Upon a Defiance that was given Hortenſius, he ſtaid a whole Day at a Publick Auction, and repeated in order what had been Sold, to whom, and at what Price. His Recital was Confronted with the Comptrollers Regiſter, and his Memory was found to be moſt Exact. (E) He uſed many Geſtures in Pleading.] Though his Geſtures were fine enough to make the two beſt Actors of that Time ambitious of initiating them (a) on the Stage; 'tis certain they exceeded the juſt Bounds of the Art of Oratory. Vox canora & ſuavis, ſays Cicero in his Brutus, motus & geſtus etiam plus artis habebat quam erat Oratori ſatis. Moreri tells but ill the Jeſt of Torquatus: 'He uſed ſo many Motions in declaiming, that they gave him the 'Name of Graſhopper, Dionyſia Saltatricula. Who would not believe from theſe Words, that Hortenſius had this Nick-Name given him all over the Town? And yet there was but one Man, who upon one ſingle Occaſion, gave him not the Name of Graſhopper, but of Dionyſia, a Woman who was a celebrated Dancer. The Word Saltatricula is very ill rendered Graſhopper. Here is the Paſſage of Aulus Gellius, in the 5th. Chapter of the firſt Book: Cum L. Torquatus, ſubagreſti homo ingenio & infeſtivo, gravius acerbiuſque apud conſilium judicum, cum de cauſa Sullæ quæreretur, non jam hiſtrionem eum eſſe diceret, ſed geſticulariam Dionyſiamque eum notiſſima Saltatriculæ nomine appellaret; tum voce molli atque demiſſa Hortenſius, Dionyſia, inquit, Dionyſia malo equidem eſſe quam quod tu Torquate, ἀμουσος, ἀγροικατος, καὶ ἀπαιδευτος.

(F) Too nice in his Cloaths.] This Paſſage of Aulus Gellius, that I am going to quote, and which goes before the Words, you have juſt now read, will ſerve both to prove Hortenſius's Geſticulations, and his great Niceneſs in his Cloaths. Hortenſius omnibus fermè Oratoribus ætatis ſuæ niſi M. Tullio clarior, quod multa munditia & circumſpecte compoſitèque indutus & amictus eſſet, manuſque ejus inter agendum forent argutæ admodum & geſtuoſæ, maledictis compellationibuſque probroſis jactatus eſt, multaque in eum quaſi in hiſtrionem in ipſis cauſis atque judiciis dicta ſunt. As for the ſuit he entered for diſordering the Folds of his Gown, here is a Proof or a Teſtimony for it. *Hortenſius vir alioquin ex profeſſo mollis & in præcinctu ponens omnem decorem; fuit enim veſtitu ad munditiem curioſo, & ut bene amictus iret, faciem in ſpeculo ponebat: ubi ſe intuens togam corpori ſic applicabat, ut rugas non forte ſed induſtria locatas artifex nodus conſtringeret, & ſinus ex compoſito defluens nodum lateris ambiret. and in the Country. He had several (G) Country-Houses; and as he was very sumptuous, he opposed † the Sumptuary Laws, which the Consuls had a Mind to enact in the 699th Year of Rome. He praised them so cunningly for their Magnificence in their Houses, that they durst not insist upon a thing which did not agree with their own Conduct. He was the first that dress Peacocks ‡; 'twas to make a Dish in an Entertainment he gave to the College of the Augurs. He was very curious and magnificent * in Parks and Fish-Ponds, and was as careful of the Health (H) of his Fish, as of that of his Servants. He must needs have been a great Lover of Plane-Trees, since he watered them with Wine; which he made so little a Secret of, that he one Day desired Cicero to change with him his Hour of Pleading; for, said he, I must go and pour some Wine upon a Plane-Tree I have at one of my Country-Houses *. Whoever knows the Heart of Man never so little, will much more (I) wonder that those two great Orators should have given one another many Marks of Affection upon several Occasions, than that they should not always have been perfect Friends; for after all, Cicero was the cause that Hortensius lost the Glory which he had long enjoy'd, of being the first Orator in Rome; and Hortensius was the cause of Cicero's having a dangerous Rival, who stood close upon his Heels. Hortensius published not only some

(G) Several Country-Houses.] Pliny (c) makes mention of Hortensius's Tusculanum, in which he placed the Argonauta of the Painter Cydias, which cost him 14400 Livres, according to Hardouin's Computation. He had a House at Rauli (d); one near Laurentum (e), and another (f) near the Porta Flumentana. Judge of his Expences by the Number of Hogsheads of Wine which he left to his Heir, which was above Ten Thousand. Hortensius super decem millia cadûm hæredi reliquit (g). Here is the Proof of the care he took (h) to pour Wine upon his Plane-Trees. Is Hortensius platanos suas vino irrigare consuevit, adeò ut in actione quadam quam habuit cum Cicerone susceptam, precario à Tullio postulasset ut locum dicendi permutaret secum, abire enim in villam necessario se velle, ut vinum Platano quam in Tusculano fuderat ipse suffunderet (i).

(H) Of the Health of his Fish.] Varro (k) relates upon this some remarkable Things. Hortensius used this Fish, as Misers do their Money; he durst not make use of them, he chose rather to buy Fish in any Neighbouring Town, than to take them out of his Ponds: nor was he contented not to feed upon his own Fish, but he also fed them nicely and plentifully. Neque satis erat eum non pasci piscinis, nisi eos ipse pasceret ultro——Celerius voluntate Hortensii ex equili educeres vhedarias ut tibi haberes mulas, quàm è piscina barbatum mullum——Non minor cura ejus erat de ægrotis piscibus, quàm de minus valentibus servis: itaque minus laborabat ne servus æger, quàm aquam frigidam biberent sui pisces. 'Tis said he was so passionately fond of a Lamprey (l) that he shed Tears for the Death of her, which Porphyry (m), Macrobius (n), and Tzetzes (o) have ascribed to the Orator Crassus.

(I) Will much more wonder.] Perhaps there is nothing upon which Jealousie can cause a greater Alienation in Mens Minds than Eloquence. I know not whether Beauty or Poetry ought to be excepted. Two famous Preachers seldom love one another, and frequently quarrel to the utmost Rupture. 'Tis much if they can conceal their Jealousie, and keep fair with the Teeth outwards. So that what Hortensius did in Cicero's behalf, may well be admired; but the ill Offices he might have done him privately, ought not to surprize us. He got him (p) admitted into the College of the Augurs: He praised him nobly (q) on an Occasion, wherein his Praises might serve him; he had like (r) to have been killed for his sake; and Cicero himself confesses, that there had always been between them a reciprocal Commerce of Good-Offices. (f) Cum præsertim non modo nunquam fit aut illius à me cursus impeditus, aut ab illo meus, sed contra semper alter ab altero adjutus, & communicando, & monendo, & juvando. Cicero's Good-Offices towards Hortensius, are not so much to be wondred at, as those of Hortensius towards him; because, though naturally speaking, Cicero must have had for many Years, the Heart filled with the Rancour of Jealousie, 'tis likely he did not keep half of it, when he saw himself Superior. There was a Time when he did not equal Hortensius, another when he equalled him, a third, when he exceeded him. This last Reason is an excellent Remedy against Jealousie. But on the contrary, what a Heart-breaking to Hortensius to see him, who only came after him at the beginning, overtake him some time after, and at last get the Start of him? Hortensius——qui diu princeps Oratorum, aliquando æmulus Ciceronis existimatus est, novissimè quoad vixit, secundus. Quintilian speaks thus in the Third Chapter of the Eleventh Book: I know, that it was not a Disadvantage to Hortensius to have such a Rival as Cicero. The Honours (t) of his Consulship had so blacken'd that ardent and indefatigable Application, with which he had cultivated his Mind from his Youth, that he was perceived every Day more and more to decline. He took Heart again when he saw the great Progress of Cicero's Glory. But in truth, he would have easily dispensed with such a Spur, which cost him the first Place. There were hardly any great Causes, wherein these two famous Orators were not retained, sometimes for the same (u), and sometimes for the contrary Parties. The famous Extortioner Verres was to have Hortensius for his Advocate, which was one of the strongest Reasons Cicero alledged to hinder Cæcilius from being an Accuser. It appears (w) by that Plea, how fit Hortensius was to make the best of the Causes he undertook. Cicero had all sorts of Advantages: he was the Accuser; and 'tis said that he quickly disheartned Hortensius (a) from the Thoughts of pleading for the accused; there were so many Charges and Proofs against Verres. (b) Multis diebus prima actio celebrata est, dum testes Verris producuntur criminum diversorum, dum recitantur publica privataque litera. Quibus rebus adeò stupefactus Hortensius dicitur, ut rationem defensionis omitteret. We have seen how Cicero declared that Hortensius had never done him any ill Office. And we may see in the same Place, that he confutes those, who thought that Hortensius was not favourable to him. (c) Doleham quod, non ut pluribus putabant, adversarium aut obtrectatorem laudum mearum, sed socium potius & consortem gloriosi laboris amiseram. But he wrote quite otherwise to his Brother Quintus, when he told him, Quantum Hortensio credendum sit nescio: me summa simulatione amoris, summaque assiduitate quotidianâ sceleratissimè insidiosissimèque tractavit, adjuncto quoque Arrio: quorum ego consiliis, promissis, præceptis destitutus in hanc calamitatem incidi (d). There are few Persons, even amongst those who are accounted honest Men, but have two sorts of Language, one for publick Books, and another for the Letters which they write to their Friends. See the Remark of the Article Grotius. As long as they are not Publick, this amphibious Language doth not appear; but I wait for the Publication of their Letters. We should give a great deal of Trouble to some Authors, should we oblige them to repeat in Conversation, or to hear ſome Orations, and ſome Annals, but alſo (K) ſome Laſcivious Poems. There's nothing left of all this; and it muſt be confeſſed, that his Tongue (L) was better than his Pen. Tho' he had carried the cauſe of Meſſala his Siſter's Son, having pleaded his beſt for him (M), ſeeing him involved in an Accuſation of Faction; yet he did himſelf a great Injury by it, and expoſed † himſelf in his old Age, to thoſe Hiſſings and Clamours, which he alone had eſcaped before. He died in the 703d. Year of Rome, in the 64th. Year of his Age †, 44 or 45 of which he had ſpent with a mighty Reputation at the Bar. It has been ſaid (MΔ) that he had ſo worn out his Voice, that he loſt it before his Life. Others have ſo ill underſtood that Thought, that they have taken it, as if he died in Pleading, having killed himſelf by the Violence of Speaking. We muſt look upon this as fabulous, ſince he pleaded a Cauſe of Importance a few Days before his Death; and ſince Cicero is ſo far from touching upon ſuch a ſort of Death, as he would doubtleſs have done, if it had been ſo, that he affords us Reaſons to think otherwiſe. Conſult upon all this, the Remark MΔ. Hortenſius married in his Youth a Daughter of * C. Catullus. repeated, the ſame Elogies they have given in a Book. How is the World cheated with Prefaces, Citations, and the agreeable Neceſſity of making a Funeral Oration! However it be, we have reaſon to look upon it as a wonderful Management in Pomponius Atticus, to have been able to preſerve the Intimate Friendſhip of Cicero and Hortenſius, and to hinder them from falling out. (e) *Utebatur intimè Q. I know not whether the Poem which Varro (g) aſcribes to him, be another Work. As to the Annals, they have been cited by Velleius Paterculus. I believe Hortenſius was a Learned Man, Cicero having given him that Commendation. But I don't ſee that his Poems, his Annals, and the Profeſſion of Lucullus, are ſo good Proofs of his Learning, as Corradus would fain have us believe. Sane, ſays he (h), videtur bene doctus fuiſſe, ſiquidem poema ſcripſit, ut Autor eſt Varro libro primo de Analogia, & Annales, ut Paterculus affirmat, & certè cum Siſenna & Lucullo de Græce Latineque ſcribendo venit in eam contentionem quam Plutarchus in Lucullo refert. Methinks Corradus has not taken Plutarch's meaning; for he does not ſpeak there of a Challenge betwixt Hortenſius, Siſenna, and Lucullus, but of a little Preſumption of the latter, who took upon him before the other two, to write the ſocial War, either in Latin or Greek, in Proſe or in Verſe, if it ſhould be his Lot. Plutarch Conjectures, that the Greek Proſe fell to him by Lot, ſince the Hiſtory of that War written by Lucullus in Greek Proſe, was extant in his Time: but once more, this doth not at all ſignifie, that Hortenſius and Siſenna undertook to go about the ſame Work, if the Lot fell to them. Catanæus (i) who tells it thus, is miſtaken.

(L) His Tongue was better than his Pen.] This we learn from Quintilian's Third Chapter, the Eleventh Book, where he obſerves that Action has a mighty Force in an Orator; and that as it was Hortenſius's great Talent, when his Pleadings came to be read, they were not found to come up to the Reputation of their Author. M. Cicero, ſays he, *unam in dicendo actionem dominari putat, hac——Antonium & Craſſum multum valuiſſe, plurimum vero Q. Mr. Morus is an Inſtance of it.

(M) Having pleaded his beſt for him.] This Cauſe was pleaded in the Year of Rome 702. Hortenſius was then Sixty three Years old, which Age did not hinder him from making an excellent Plea. Brutus (k), who always thought him a great Orator, never admired him ſo much as he did on that Day; others paſſed the ſame Judgment; and Cicero having read the Piece, publiſhed Word for Word, as it was pronounc'd, was of the ſame Opinion. And if Hortenſius was hiſs'd the next Day, it was not becauſe he had pleaded leſs eloquently than he uſed to do, but becauſe People were vexed to ſee that he had brought his Client off. That Reſentment had already ſhewn it ſelf againſt the Judges. (l) Clamoribus ſcilicet maximis judices corripuerunt, & oſtenderunt planè eſſe quod ferri non poſſet——Acceſſit huc, quod poſtridie ejus abſolutionem in Theatrum Curionis Hortenſius introiit, puto ut ſuum gaudium gauderemus. Hic tibi ſtrepitus, fremitus, clamor, ronitruum & rudentum ſibilus. Hoc magis animadverſum eſt quod intactus ab ſibilo pervenerat Hortenſius ad ſenectutem. Sed tum ita bene ut in totam vitam cuivis ſatis eſſet, & paniteret eum jam viciſſe. He pleaded a few Days before his Death, as Cicero obſerves; he was undoubtedly one of thoſe great Wits, who have a laſting Strength of Mind. 'Tis true, he ſhin'd more in his Youth, than when he grew in Years, for which two Reaſons are aſſigned: One is that he made Choice of the Aſiatick Eloquence, which was more ſuitable to a young than an old Man: The other was, that he laboured with greater Application when he was young. (m) Si quærimus, cur adoleſcens magis floruerit dicendo, quàm ſenior Hortenſius, cauſas reperiemus veriſimas duas: primum, quod genus erat orationis Aſiaticum, adoleſcentiæ magis conceſſum, quàm ſenectuti. Genera autem Aſiaticæ dictionis duo ſunt——Hæc——genera dicendi aptiora ſunt adoleſcentibus, in ſenibus gravitatem non habent. Itaque Hortenſius utroque genere florens, clamores faciebat adoleſcens——Sed cum jam honores, & illa ſenior autoritas gravius quiddam requireret, remanebat idem, nec decebat idem; quodque exercitationem ſtudiumque dimiſerat, quod in eo fuerat acerrimum, concinnitas illa crebritaſque ſententiarum priſtina manebat, ſed ea veſtitu illo orationis, quo conſueverat, ornata non erat. He was happy even in the Circumſtances of his Death; for he died juſt before the deplorable Confuſions into which the Commonwealth was plunged (n).

at the time of Verres's Trial. But nothing can be more ſingular than his Marriage (N) with Martia, the Wife of Cato Uticenſis, and Martius Philippus's Daughter. He askt her by way of Loan, and obtained her without much Difficulty, though her Big Belly declared ſhe had a good Underſtanding with her Husband Cato. He had one Son, which gave him much Trouble; ſo that when he pleaded for his Nephew, he declared, that he had made choice of him for his Heir, to the Prejudice of his Son. And yet it was to this unworthy Son that he left his Eſtate, if we may believe Valerius Maximus. See the following Article.

HOR-

(N) His Marriage with Martia.] Plutarch (c) tells the Story thus: Hortenſius deſired Cato to give him Porcia his Daughter, who was married to Bibulus, and had already lain in twice. Give her me alſo, ſaid he, as a fertile Soil, in which I may ſow ſome Children: I am ſenſible, added he, that according to the Opinion of the World, this is ſomewhat abſurd; but in reality, is there any thing finer and more beneficial to the Societies, than not to leave the fruitful Field of a young Woman uncultivated; and on the other Hand, not to ſuffer a Family to be oppreſt with too many Children, which has enough already? Beſides, the mutual lending of Wives amongſt worthy People, diſperſes Virtue amongſt a great many Families, and occaſions a great many Alliances in the State; and if Bibulus is not willing to quit his Title to Porcia, I promiſe to reſtore her, after ſhe has brought me ſome Children, which may be a ſtricter Bond betwixt you and him, and my ſelf. Cato did not think it to the purpoſe to treat of this Affair; but when Hortenſius declared to him, that he had a Mind to Martia, his Wife, conſidering ſhe was ſtill very young, and Cato had Children enough, he readily promiſed her, provided Martius the Lady's Father would agree to it. Martius conſented to it, and preſently Martia was tranſferred to Hortenſius. When ſhe was a Widow and an Heireſs at once, ſhe came again to be the Wife of her firſt Husband. Which Cæſar did not forget in his Anti-Cato, 'If he had need of a Wife, ſaid he (d,) 'why did he give her to another? And if he had no 'need of her, why did he take her again? Does 'not this ſhew, that he made uſe of this Lure, that 'by lending a young Wife to Hortenſius, he 'might recover her with great Wealth? Strabo (e) relating that the Tapyri had a Law, by which the Husbands gave their Wives to others, when they had two or three Children by them, adds, that Cato Practiſed the ſame thing to gratify Hortenſius's Requeſt; and obſerves, that Cato did but follow the antient Cuſtom of the Romans. There's Reaſon to doubt whether this was their ancient Cuſtom; for beſides that, there are ſo few Inſtances of it, that Tertullian (g) cites only Cato; it appears that Hortenſius (h) owned ſome Singularity or Novelty in his Deſign, according to humane Opinion. He does not oppoſe the antient Laws or Cuſtoms of the Romans againſt this Opinion, (which ſo great a Civilian would not have omitted on that Occaſion) but only Nature. Bodin (i) impertinently cenſures Plutarch, imputing to him, that he ſaid in the Life of Cato Uticenſis, that it was lawful for the Romans to lend their Wives; for that Hiſtorian does not ſpeak of it, as of a Cuſtom founded upon the Laws or Practice: On the contrary, he introduces Hortenſius, confeſſing, that his Propoſal ſeemed ſtrange or new. 'Tis a great Raſhneſs in the ſame Bodin, not to credit this lending of Cato's Wife; for 'tis a Story, that Thraſeas (k) took from the Writings of Munatius, Cato's Friend, and Cæſar would not have ventured to have reproached him for it, if it had not been true. The Reaſon upon which Bodin grounds his Incredulity, is a new Fault; 'tis becauſe, ſays he, by the Law of Romulus, and the antient Practice reſtored by Tiberius, the Relations puniſhed at their Diſcretion the Wives that committed Adultery. But what does this make againſt Cato's Wife, who was given to another by her Father and her Husband? I ſay nothing againſt theſe Words) (l) Plutarchus & Strabo Parthos æque ac Lacedæmonios mutuas uxores amicis dare conſueviſſe ajunt, tho' they are very likely to miſ-lead us; for who in reading them would not think, that Plutarch attributed this Conduct to the Parthians, and Strabo to the Lacedæmonians? And yet Bodin means, that Strabo aſcribes this (m) to the Parthians, and Plutarch to the Lacedæmonians. This way of quoting is but too frequent, and leads one into Miſtakes; it ſeems to bring many Witneſſes for the ſame thing, when in reality there is but one. Bodin ſeems to ſay, that Plutarch and Strabo teſtify both, that the lending of Wives was as well practiſed amongſt the Parthians, as amongſt the Lacedæmonians. I have read in Mr. Menage, that Caſaubon has imputed to Plutarch the Relation of this Marriage of Hortenſius and Martia, as a thing he doubted of. Ad quem Strabonis locum notat Caſaubonus, Plutarchum de Catone rem ita narrare ut de ea dubitaſſe ſignificet (n). Mr. Menage had reaſon to ſay this is falſe: 'tis not about the Fact it ſelf that Plutarch expreſſes his Doubts; he only ſays, that that part of Cato's Life is like a piece of a Play, in which the Plot is not well opened, that is, in my Opinion, that People paſs'd different Judgments upon it.

Note, that when I cenſure Bodin for this Imputation to Plutarch, I conſider that he cites the Life of Cato Uticenſis; for if he had cited the Parallel between Lycurgus and Numa Pompilius, he would not have erred. Plutarch there affirms, that this King of Rome permitted Huſbands to lend their Wives; but I think he is miſtaken in it, and ſo does Mr. Dacier. 'This is true, ſays he (o), of Lycur- 'gus, but it does not appear that Numa ever had 'any ſuch Deſign; it would be alſo eaſie to prove, 'that that Community of Wives did not begin at 'Rome, under Numa, but much later, and 'was not general. Lucan ſuppoſes, that Martia, after Hortenſius's Death, went to Cato, and moſt humbly intreated him to take her again. She declared to him, that being paſt Child-bearing, ſhe only deſired the Name of Wife, that ſhe would live in Continence, and had no other end than to take a Share with him in thoſe Troubles and Fatigues, that the ill Poſture of publick Affairs had brought upon him. Lucan adds, that Cato was moved with this Diſcourſe of Martia, and that tho' it was not a proper time for Marriage, he granted her Requeſt; 'Tis true, the Nuptial Ceremonies were omitted, without excepting that which is looked upon as the Principal, and the Conſummation of the Work. Martia did not quit her Mourning Cloaths (p), ſhe embraced her Husband, as a Mother her Child. Cato was ſo concerned for the publick Calamities, that ever ſince the Civil War, he deprived himſelf of all Diverſions; he let his Beard grow, and lived as a Man in Mourning. Martia's Offers were accepted in the Literal Senſe. See what Lucan makes her ſay:

Dum (q) ſanguis meat, dum vis maſcula, peregi
Juſſa Cato, & geminos excepi ſæta maritus.
Viſceribus laſſis, partuque exhauſta revertor
Jam nulli tradenda viro: da fœdera priſci
Illibata tori: de tantum nomen inane
Connubii liceat tumulo ſcripſiſſe, Catonis
Martia: nec dubium longo quæratur in ævo,
Mutarim primas expulſa, an tradita, tædæ.
Non me latorum ſociam, rebuſque ſecundis
Da mihi caſtra ſequi.

If he had been throughout his Work as much given to Fiction, as in this Place, I am apt to think he would not have been accuſed of following too cloſely the Thread of Hiſtory, and not giving his Work a Form Poetical enough. However it be, let us ſee what he ſays of the extreme Rigidneſs of Cato.

Ille (a) nec horrificam ſanctò dimovit ab ore
Cæſariem, duroque admiſit gaudia vultu.
(Ut primum tolli feralia viderat arma,
Intonſus rigidam in frontem deſcendere canos

HORTENSIUS (Quintus) Son to the former, behav'd himſelf ſo unworthily of ſuch a Father, that he had like (A) to have been diſinherited. But if it be the ſame that was Proconſul of Macedonia, after Julius Cæſar's Death, 'tis to be preſumed he reformed his Life. He warmly declared for Liberty, and ſtrenuouſly engaged * with Brutus, to raiſe an Army which might maintain the Cauſe. He was taken at the Battle of Philippi, and Murdered (B) by way of Reprizal, by Mark Antony's Order, upon Caius Antonius's Tomb. Some believe our Hortenſius was the ſame with him, who (C) had been in Julius Cæſar's Party againſt Pompey. Now as thoſe, who ſpeak of him, ſufficiently intimate, that he was the only Son of Hortenſius, we may look upon him as the Father of Q. HORTENSIUS Corbio and Marcus HORTENSIUS Hortalus; the firſt whereof (D) was a Monſter of Impurity and Debauchery, and the latter fell into Poverty, and had the Diſcretion not to Marry †, till Auguſtus gave him the Means to maintain a Family. But that Emperor's Liberality not Anſwering the Occaſions of all the Children that came from that Marriage, Hortalus beg'd (E) the Aſſiſtance of the Senate. Tiberius at firſt rejected this Petition very harſhly; but afterwards perceiving that his Severity was diſliked, he ſaid that if the Senate

(A) That he had like to have been Diſinherited.] Cicero intimates plainly enough in his Letters (a), that Hortenſius's Son was good for nothing, and (b) that his ill Temper and a Freed-Man called Salvius (c), had ſpoiled him. He ſeems to ſay (d) that his Father did not love him; but let us here Valerius Maximus, who is extreamly perſpicuous in this Matter. Q. Hortenſii, qui ſuis temporibus ornamentum Romanæ eloquentiæ fuit, admirabilis in filio patientia extitit. Cum enim eo uſque impietatem ejus ſuſpectam & nequitiam inviſam haberet, ut Meſſalam ſuæ ſororis filium hæredem habiturus ambitus reum defendens judicibus diceret, ſi illum damnaſſent nihil ſibi præter oſculum nepotum in quibus acquieſceret ſuperfuturum: Hæc ſcilicet ſententia quam etiam edita oratione inſeruit, filium potius in tormento animi quam in voluptatibus reponens: tamen ne naturæ ordinem confunderet, non nepotes ſed filium hæredem reliquit (e). 'Tis ſomewhat ſtrange that Hortenſius ſhould have given out, that he had made Choice of his Nephew for his Heir; for if he thought his own Son deſerved to be Diſinherited, could not he Transfer his Eſtate to his Grandchildren, as he ſaid he ſhould be obliged to do, if they Condemned his Nephew? A ſtrange Grandfather ſure, not to think of his Grandſons, but in Caſe of failure of his Siſter's Son! Valerius Maximus has perhaps Curtailed the Matter by the ſuppreſſion of ſome Eſſential Clauſes. It may be too, that we muſt take Hortenſius's Declaration only as a Figure of Rhetorick: there are Stratagems in this Profeſſion, which our Orator knew well how to make uſe of. Probably he had a mind to move the Judges in appearing ſo much concerned for the diſcharge of his Client, as a Perſon that was to be to him inſtead of a Son. Others ſay (f) that Hortenſius's Wife Inherited his Eſtate; ſhe whom Cato had lent him, and whom he took again after Hortenſius's Death.

(B) Murdered by way of Reprizal.] To underſtand what this Reprizal was, we muſt remember that Caius Antonius Brother to Mark, fell into Hortenſius's Hands during the Confuſions that followed Julius Cæſar's Death; and that Brutus underſtanding that the Rage of the Triumvirate had put to Death amongſt others, the Illuſtrious D. Brutus and Cicero, wrote to Hortenſius to Sacrifice his Priſoner to their Ghoſts (g): which was done. Thus you ſee what was the end of Caius Antonius, and how his Death was Revenged.

(C) Who had been in Julius Cæſar's Party.] That which cauſes ſome difficulty here, is, that Hortenſius's Son was at Laodicea in the year of Rome 702. (h), and led a very ſcandalous Life there. How then is it probable, will ſome ſay, that two years after he ſhould have raiſed himſelf ſo much as to Command Cæſar's Army, the Day that he deſigned to paſs the Rubicon, and Poſſeſs himſelf of Ariminum, which was the leading Stroke of that great Affair, that was to determine the Fate of the Empire? Yet this is true of Hortenſius (i) who was in Cæſar's Party. Some time after he gave him (k) the Command of a Fleet upon the Coaſts of Italy. We muſt not Determine upon Appearances.

I have not found in Eutropius what Glandorpius (l) pretends to have taken from his 6*th*. Book, that Octavius and Libo, Pompey's Lieutenants defeated this Fleet of Hortenſius. 'Tis Oroſius who ſays it (m). However, Glandorpius will have Hortenſius, the Orator's Son, of whom Valerius ſpeaks ſo ill, to be the Commander of that Fleet. He goes upon good Grounds in this; for Cicero does not (n) permit us to doubt, that this Son of Hortenſius went over to Cæſar's Party. I have not been able to find when he left it, nor how he obtained the Proconſulſhip of Macedonia, a Poſt, wherein he Merited (o) the Applauſes of Cicero. Catanæus (p) confounding the Father and the Son, aſcribes to the Orator the being in Pompey's Party, and the putting to Death Caius Antonius, and ſays, that he was Murdered by Mark Antony.

(D) Was a Monſter of Impurity.] Valerius Maximus giving a Liſt (q) of Children that have verified the Proverb, Heroum filii noxæ, forgets the Son (r), but not the Grand-Son of Hortenſius. Q. Hortenſii——nepos Hortenſius Corbio omnibus ſcortis abjectiorem & obſceniorem vitam exegit, ad ultimumque lingua ejus tam libidini cunctorum inter lupanaria proſtitit, quam avi pro ſalute civium in foro excubuerat. If Lipſius had remembered that this Author ſpoke in the plural Number of Hortenſius's Grand-Sons, in the 9*th*. Chapter of the 5*th*. Book, he would not have believed that (ſ) Hortenſius Hortalus, and Hortenſius Corbio were one and the ſame Perſons. The Character Tacitus gives the former, plainly diſtinguiſhes him from the latter. Moreri and Hofman commit the ſame Fault as Lipſius, ſince they cite Valerius Maximus Chap. 5. Book 3, Tacitus in the 2*d*. Book of his Annals, and Suetonius in the Life of Tiberius, with reſpect to Hortenſius's Grand-Son, who was extreamly Debauched. Voſſius has miſled them (t), becauſe he refers thoſe three Citations to a Grandſon of Hortenſius, as if they had concerned the ſame Perſon.

(E) Hortalus beg'd the Aſſiſtance of the Senate.] His Speech is in Tacitus (v): He brought with him his four little Boys, and ſhewing 'em to the Senate, intreated them to have ſome regard for the Poſterity of ſo many Conſuls, and ſo many Dictators, En ſtirpis & progeniei tot Conſulum, tot Dictatorum. Lipſius (w) thinks the Hyperbole ſomewhat too ſtrong, ſince the Family of Hortenſius gave but one Conſul, and one Dictator. He endeavours to excuſe Hortalus, by ſaying that probably he had his Mother's Anceſtors in view. Rychius (x) ſpeaks with more aſſurance, and gives it as an undeniable thing, and is of Opinion that Hortenſius had chiefly in View the Martius Philippus's, from whoſe Family, ſays he, Martia, Hortalus's Grandmother, deſcended. This laſt Fact has no Probability; for on one ſide, we find but one Son of Hortenſius the Orator, who was a grown Man when Cicero paſſed through Laodicea in the year 702. On the other ſide, Cato could not be very Young, when he parted with Martia to Hortenſius, ſince his Daughter Portia (y) had then two Children. But Cato Died at 48 years (z) of Age in the year 707 of Rome: If then we ſuppoſe, as it is very probable, that he was at leaſt 35 years Old when he obliged Hortenſius with his Wife, we muſt ſay that this Marriage was made in the 694*th*. year of Rome. 'Tis not therefore poſſible that Senate desired it, he would give a certain Sum * to each (F) of Hortalus's Male Children. They thanked him for it, but Hortalus either out of Fear † or out of Courage, said not a Word; from which time Tiberius shewing him no Liberality, gave him Time and Opportunity to fall into the most shameful Misery.

HORTENSIUS (John) in French Des-Jardins, Physician of Francis I. was Born near Laon in Picardy of John Des-Jardins, Governour of the Castle of Hamelle in the Diocese of Laon. He taught Classical Learning at Paris, in the College of Cardinal le Moine, and afterwards applying himself to the Study of Physick, he was made Batchelor in that Science in the year 1514, a Licentiate in the year 1517. and Doctor in 1519. It appears by the Registers of the University of Paris, that he was Regent Doctor in the year 1521. and Dean of the Faculty in 1524. As he understood Greek to Perfection, he mightily Incouraged his Scholars to the Study of that Language; and that every Body might be in a Capacity of Consulting Galen in the Original, he made a Present of a Greek Edition of that Antient Physician to the Library of that Faculty; for at that time ‖ the Physicians at Paris had a Publick Library in their Schools. He got such a Reputation that he was thought able to Cure all sorts of Diseases, provided ‡ the fatal Hour was not come: That was the only (A) Exception; so that this Proverb was commonly applied to him, Contra vim mortis non est Medicamen in hortis †. We find him (B) commended in many Books; but as for himself, he Printed nothing; nor have we any Posthumous Work of his. He Married Joan Bourdin in 1520, and Mary le Tillier in 1541. He left seven Children by the first, and four by the latter. Their Settlements (C), and the real Estate he left, are a Proof that he got a great deal of Money. He Died suddenly of an Apoplexy, as he was Entertaining his Relations and Friends on his Birth-Day in 1547. This gave occasion to that Hortensius's Son whom Cicero saw in Laodicea in the 702*d.* year of Rome, should be Martia's Son. But we need not go upon a Conjecture: There is a Fact in Plutarch which decides the Question; Martia was still (a) Cato's Wife during the Expedition of Cyprus, that is, in the 696*th* year of Rome. It must not be dissembled that Hortalus is called a young Man by Tacitus in the 769*th.* year of Rome, which would not very well agree with the Supposition, that the only Son of Hortensius was that Debauchee mentioned by Cicero, and Valerius Maximus, who Died a little after the Battle of Philippi in 712. But it's much more reasonable to think that Tacitus has not been so exact as to the Age of Hortalus, than to Dispute about the Speech which Valerius Maximus Read, and Hortensius spoke a little before his Death. Now that Speech plainly supposes he had but one Son; for if besides this Rake, who Saluted Cicero in Laodicea, he had had any Son by Martia, there had been no need of his making his Grand-Children his Heirs, in default of his Debauched Son, and of Messalla his Nephew.

(F) To each of Hortalus's Male-Children.] This leaves room to believe that Hortalus only brought his four Sons with him, but that he left his Daughters behind; so that to speak exactly, we must not say (a) with Suetonius, that he had four Children by his Marriage; for if he had no more, Tacitus makes Tiberius guilty of an Absurdity. Neither do I think that it can be said that (b) Tiberius gave nothing to Hortalus. Did not he offer to give him a Sum, if the Senate approved of it? Was not he thanked for it? Could he doubt of the favourable intention of the Senate for that poor Member? 'Tis therefore most Apparent that this Sum was given; but as it was the only Liberality of that Prince, it did not prevent Hortalus's Ruin. Let not Suetonius be urged (c), who pretends that the Charities of Tiberius towards the poor Senators, were Annexed to some Conditions, which excluded him from them. These Conditions, said he, were (d), that he should make his Indigence appear to the Senate: Quo pacto plerosque modestia & pudore deterruit, in quibus Hortalum Q. Hortensii oratoris nepotem. But 'tis not true that Shame or Modesty hinder'd Hortensius's Grandson from performing that Condition: Did not he confess his Misery? Did not he carry his four Sons to desire the Senate to Commiserate them? Did not he intreat the Emperor to preserve 'em from Starving? Nec ad invidiam ista, sed conciliandæ misericordiæ refero: adsequuntur florente te, Cæsar, quos deseris honores, interim Q. Hortensii pronepotes, divi Augusti alumnos ab inopia defende (e). Achilles Statius, (f) who says, that our Hortalus is probably that who is mention'd in the 67*th.* Epigram of Catullus, did not consider that what he relates out of Tacitus, and we have just now seen, belongs to the year of Rome 769. 'Tis true Catullus did not Die in 667. Scaliger has solidly Confuted that Falsity of St. Jerome; but there's no likelyhood that he Lived till 703. I have Refuted Joseph Scaliger upon this, in the Article of Catullus. Certainly, Hortalus mention'd by that Antient Poet, was rather Hortensius than his Grandson; and I can't but be amaz'd that Isaac Vossius in the same Book, (g) wherein he maintains against Scaliger, that Catullus Died, in the 704*th.* or 705*th* year of Rome, should make Hortalus mention'd by that Poet, (h) the same with him mention'd by Tacitus.

(A) That was the only Exception.] Vulgarly speaking, this was a great Encomium; but at the bottom it was a great Exception; for if Death do's not come in, there's no Distemper but a Physician may cure; Nature it self is then sufficient for the Work. However according to our way of Judging of things, representing to our selves abundance of very possible Conditions, which may change the Chain and Course of Events, 'tis to give a great Idea of a Physician, to say, that if a greater Force do's not interpose, he'll restore a Sick Man's Health.

(B) We find him commended in many Books.] Mr. Menage (i) cites Arnaud d' Offat in his Expostion against James Charpentier; Renatus Moreau in the Life of James Sylvius; du Boulay in the History of the University of Paris; Lewis d' Orleans in the Plaute humaine; Peter Ayrault in his Books de Ordine judiciario; John Vasse in an Epistle Dedicatory (k).

(C) The Settlements, &c.] Mr. Menage has these Words. (l) Prædivitem fuisse, ut tum erant tempora, testantur & ejus ædes plurimæ, & prædia multa & liberi undecim, qui nido majores pennas, ut Flacci verbis utar, extenderunt. From the particular Account of these eleven Children, it appears that the Daughters were Married to Persons of considerable Quality; one to William Versoris Councellor in the Chatelet, the Son of John Versoris a famous Advocate in the Parliament of Paris; another to John Meusnyer Councellor of the Exchequer; a third to Peter Ayrault, Lieutenant Criminal at Angers. One of the Sons was a Councellor in the Chatelet; another was Canon of Senlis; a third was Councellor of the Exchequer. He that was Councellor in the Chatelet, left a Son who had the same Office, was Echevin at Paris in 1620, and left a Son, who had amongst other Children, the Wife of Denys Godefroy Historiographer of France. There remained amongst John Des-Jardins's Descendants but one Person (m) who bore his Name, when Mr. Menage wrote his Book.

to a fine Sonnet (D) of Des-Portes, which I'll give intire in the Remarks. Mr. Menage, who Deſcended (E) from John Des-Jardins by the Mother's ſide, has wrote his Life †. We have taken this Piece from thence.

HORTENSIUS (Lambert) Born at Montfort in the Province of Utrecht, the firſt day (F) of April 1518. has been Ranked among the Learned of his Age. He Studied at Louvain the Learned Languages with an extream Application, under very excellent Maſters, and heard alſo Vives's Lectures upon Logick. He Publiſh'd in Latin Verſe a Tranſlation of Ariſtophanes's Plutus, with Notes, where he ſhewed the Progreſs he had made in the Greek Tongue. We have many Books of his (G) making. He Taught School a long time at Naerden in Holland, and very nearly eſcaped with his Life, when that Town was Sack'd by the Spaniards in 1572, under the Conduct of Frederick de Tolede, Son to the Duke of Alba. His Houſe was Plunder'd, and his Natural Son * killed before his Eyes, and he himſelf was going to be kill'd, notwithſtanding his being a Prieſt; but by good luck a Gentleman ‡ who had been his Scholar, and bore Arms in the Spaniſh Service, came in very ſeaſonably to ſave his Life. 'Tis obſerved that his only care was to ſave from the common Wreck, his Comment upon Lucan's Pharſalia. He made a Deſcription of the Plunder and Slaughter of Naerden, the Manuſcript whereof is at Utrecht. He ſcarce Survived that Deſolation, for he Died ϒ in 1573. near Naerden, in ϛ a Country Houſe ζ.

HORTENSIUS (Martin) a Native of Delft in Holland, and Profeſſor of Mathematicks at Amſterdam, would have made a greater Progreſs in that Science, if he had not Died in the Flower of his Age, (A) in the year 1639. The Preface that he put to a Book of Philip Lansbergius, which he Tranſlated into Latin, and in which he makes ſtrong Objections againſt Tycho Brahe's Syſtem, ſhews how he Cultivated the Study of Aſtronomy; in which he was aſſiſted by Lansbergius's Converſation, to whom Beekman, Rector of the School of Dordrecht, a Man very much ſpoken of in des Cartes's Hiſtory, Recommended him. That Book of Lansbergius is Intituled Commentationes in motum terræ diurnum, & in verum aſpectabilis cæli typum, and was Printed at Middleburg in the year 1630, in 4to. Hortenſius has alſo Tranſlated the Aſtronomical Inſtitution of William Blaeuw, and writ a Diſſertation de Mercurio ſub Sole viſo & Venere inviſa, Dedicated to Gaſſendus, and an Anſwer to what Kepler had prefixed to his Almanack in 1624. ϑ. Gaſſendus's Letters to him ſhew the particular Eſteem he had for him. Hortenſius's Letters to Gaſſendus are Printed among thoſe of that famous Philoſopher. From thence I learned that he was Born in 1605 λ, and that he was admitted Profeſſor at Amſterdam μ in the year 1634. He did not ſeem to be contented with his Condition; and he ſpeaks ‡ of the Spirit that Reigned in that famous Town, like a Man Vexed and Inraged that they did not come to his Lectures, nor encouraged the making of thoſe Machines he had contriv'd, from which he expected a Succeſs * above all that Tycho Brahe had done. (F) The firſt Day of April 1518.] In this I diſagree with my Author Valerius Andreas, who ſays he was Born in the year 1500. He was deceiv'd doubtleſs by theſe Words of Swertius (b), Naſcitur anno CIↃ. IↃ. XVIII. Kal. Aprilis: He thought the Numeral Letters XVIII. referred to the Word Kalends, for want of remembring that there is not in the Roman Calender, any 18*th.* Day before the Calends of April. But this is not the only Reaſon that determined me to joyn XVIII. to the Preceding Letters; I have been moved to that by another Conſideration: Valerius Andreas ſays, that Hortenſius was (c) very young when he went to Study at Louvain under Rutgerus Reſcius, Profeſſor of the Greek Tongue: Now he ſays in another Place, (d) that Reſcius Died in 1545. which was the 17*th.* year of his Profeſſorſhip; ſo that he began it only in 1528. How then could Hortenſius Study under this Profeſſor when he was very young, if he was Born in the year 1500? But if he was Born in the year 1518, all is eaſily reconciled. Paul (e) Freherus is miſtaken, both in the year of his Birth and of his Death; for he ſays that Lambert Hortenſius was born in the year 1501. and Died in 1577.

(G) We have many Books of his making.] Theſe are the Titles of them: Enarrationes in Virgilii Æneïda, in fol. Explanationes in Lucani Pharſaliam, Printed at Baſil in the year 1578. in fol. *Satyrarum in avi ſui vitia & mores libri II. (A) In the year 1639.] I have not followed Valerius Andreas, who ſays he Died in the year 1640. That which induced me to it, is a Paſſage of Deſcartes, which deſerves to be Copied: I take it from one of his Letters (h) to Father Merſenne, which tho' it be not Dated, yet it ſolidly fixes the Date, which I have occaſion for, ſince in the firſt Lines the Author acquaints us, that he Wrote in Anſwer to a Letter of the laſt of December 1639. This is

tate Mathefeos, and another de oculo ejuſque præſtantia. He ſays in one of his Letters † to Gaſſendus, that the Impreſſion of his Anſwer to Peter Bartholinus's Book, Publiſhed againſt him in defence of Tycho Brahe, was only put off for want of Paper. Probably that Work kept Company with the Pleiadographia *, which remain'd in Manuſcript among the Papers of the ſame Author when he Died. Deſcartes does not ſpeak Advantageouſly of his Ability. As for the Schools-Profeſſors, ſays he †, not one of them underſtands my Geometry; no, not Golius; much leſs Hortenſius, who has not made a ſufficient Progreſs for that.

HOSIUS (Staniſlaus) Cardinal and Biſhop of Warmia, was one of the moſt Ingenious Men that Poland has produced: he was Born at Cracow in the year 1504. You'll find in Moreri an Account ‡ of his Actions, and of the Honours he arrived to: It was not found, when he was one of the Preſidents of the Council, that he had all the (A) Politick Addreſs, that ſuch an Employment Required. His Books of Controverſy are ſcarce inferiour to the beſt that were Written in that Age. Caſaubon has juſtly Accus'd him (B) of having made an Apology for a Controverſiſt, who ſaid, that bating the Authority of the Church, the Holy Scripture has no more weight than Æſop's Fables. The Jeſuit who has Cenſur'd Caſaubon upon this, has only ſhewn his own Ignorance: He-what I thought proper to Copy of it: Hortenſius ‘ being ſome years ago in Italy ſet about making ‘ the Scheme of his Nativity, and told two young ‘ Men of this Country who were with him, that ‘ he ſhould Die in the year 1639, and as for them ‘ they ſhould not Live long after. Now he Dying ‘ this Summer as you know, theſe two young Men ‘ fall into ſuch Fears that one of them is already ‘ Dead, and the other who is the Son of Heinſius (i), ‘ is in ſo Languiſhing and Melancholy a Condition, ‘ that he ſeems to do all that's poſſible to verify the ‘ Aſtrologer's Prediction. Here's a pretty Science ‘ which ſerves to kill People, who perhaps would ‘ not have been Sick without it. It would be wrong to object to me that Deſcartes might have written this Letter after the Summer of the year 1640, and conſequently that he does not contradict Valerius Andreas; for his Correſpondence by Letters with Father Merſenne was ſo frequent, that this Objection muſt needs be falſe. But beſides, I find in a Letter of Boxhornius, Dated the 13*th.* of September 1639, that he Laments the loſs of Hortenſius, who was lately Dead.

(A) That he had all the Politick Addreſs that ſuch an Employment requir'd.] The Cardinal of Mantua Dying the ſecond of March 1563, his Collegues who Preſided in the Council, wrote immediately to the Pope. He who was the firſt Preſident (a), deſir'd that a Legate might be ſent that ſhould be above him. Hoſius deſir'd that he might have leave to go into Poland: But Simoneta adviſ'd the Pope not to ſend a new Legate to Trent, hoping to obtain the Direction, both becauſe Cardinal Seripande was weary of the Council, and had no inclination to Direct it any longer, and becauſe Cardinal Hoſius was a Plain Man, who was eaſily Govern'd. (b) Simoneta, deſideroſo che la ſomma di guidare il Concilio reſtaſſe a lui, & havendo ſperanza di condurlo bene, con ſodisfattione del Pontefice, & honor proprio; conſiderando che Seripando era ſtatato di quel negotio, & poco inclinato a volerlo guidare, & che l'Varmienſe era ſemplice perſona, diſpoſta a laſciarſi reggere; miſe in conſideratione al Pontefice, che, ritrovandoſi le coſe del Concilio, &c. Mr. Amelot has not well Tranſlated theſe Words, as any one may eaſily perceive. Here is what he ſays: (c) ‘ Simoneta earneſtly deſiring the Direction, and hoping ‘ to obtain it to his Honour, and the Pope's ſatisfaction; repreſented to him that the Poſture of ‘ Affairs being but Ill, the leaſt Novelty would make ‘ them go worſe, ſo that he ſaw no occaſion for ‘ ſending another Legate: That Seripande loving ‘ his Repoſe, and being not inclinable to direct the ‘ Council; and Warmia being a Man of no Addreſs ‘ and wholly Govern'd by others, he offer'd himſelf ‘ in their Place, undertaking to ſteer the Veſſel like ‘ a skilful Pilot. 1. the Original does not import that Hoſius was wholly Govern'd by others. 2. 'Tis not true that Simoneta wrote to the Pope that Hoſius was a Plain Man. He thought ſo indeed, and Built upon it: But he did not Communicate that Thought to the Pope. Father Paul clearly diſtinguiſhes what was Thought from what was Written by him. The Tranſlator ſhould have followed that Diſtinction.

(B) Caſaubon has juſtly Accus'd him.] Let us follow the Progreſs of this Diſpute, and begin with the Words of this great Critick: (e) Verbo Dei viventis ſcripto minus etiam tribuit (Sciopius in Eccleſiaſtico cap. 135.) quam five Pighius, ſive alius qui dixit Patrum memoria: Scripturam, ſi auctoritate Eccleſiæ deſtituatur, non plus per ſe valere quàm fabulas Æſopi. Quod blaſphemum dictum poſtea defendere auſus eſt Cardinalis Hoſius. The Jeſuit Eudæmon-Johannes maintain'd, that it was a Calumny Forg'd by Brentius, and pretended to prove it thus. (f) Jam verò quando non memorat, neque quis Æſopica hujus fabulæ auctor ſit, neque quo loco eam Hoſius defenderit, vel ne convinci impoſturæ poſſet, vel quod in aliquo alio rem eam legerat, & auctorem, & calumniam ex Hoſio detegam; videant deinde lectores, quàm bona fide infideles iſti fidei patroni diſputent. Is igitur lib. 3. in prolegomena Brentii, ipſo fere initio; Magna pars, inquit, libelli [prolegomenorum Brentii] non aliunde conſtant, quàm è ſannis, dicteriis, conviciis; in quo ſic etiam ludit Scripturis, ſic eas tractat jocularitèr; ut verè de ipſo dici poſſit, quod venerabili viro Petro à Soto falſo impingat, eum haud aliter Scripturis, quàm Æſopi fabulis uti. Non eſt igitur ea Catholici cujuſquam Scriptoris vox; ſed calumnia Brentii: quam vir illuſtriſſimus falſo in virum doctiſſimum excogitatam, in auctorem ipſum verè convenire defendit. Here we find four Things. 1. A Complaint that Caſaubon did not ſay in what part of Hoſius's Works he found this. 2. That Brentius Accuſes Soto of uſing the Scripture as Æſop's Fables. 3. That Hoſius maintains, that this Acculation is a Slander with Reſpect to Soto, but moſt true with Reſpect to Brentius. 4. That theſe Words of Hoſius occaſion'd the Scandalous Reflection mention'd by Caſaubon. The firſt of theſe four things is juſt. The Careleſneſs of thoſe, who do not quote the Chapter in a conſiderable Accuſation, cannot be too much blamed; Great Authors are moſt liable to that fault: They think they ſhall be believed on their own Word, and ſo diſpenſe with the Citation; they are contented to ſay, Plutarch, Cicero, St. Auguſtin, ſay this. Abundance of Readers had rather take it upon Truſt, or remain Dubious, than take the Pains to Verify it. Tho' Caſaubon had no real Deſign to hinder any one from Diſcovering the Falſity of his Acculation, yet he left Room for that Suſpicion: Why did he uſe ſo looſe a Quotation? The ſecond and third Things are undeniable Facts (g), but they ſignify nothing to this Diſpute. The fourth is a notable Blunder of the Jeſuit, as I ſhall make it appear.

The confidence with which he Accuſes Caſaubon of Calumniating Cardinal Hoſius, Prejudices one againſt this Critick; but when we ſee Caſaubon's Apologiſt ſtop ſhort, and Coldly confeſs he has no Book of Hoſius (h), we are inclinable to believe that Eudæmon-Johannes goes upon ſure Grounds. Can that Eudæmon-Johannes eaſily believe that a Miniſter who undertakes the Confutation of Caſaubon's Cenſurer, ſhould not ſeek for Hoſius's Books till he finds them? Are they ſo hard to come by? One may therefore ſuſpect that this Confeſſion of his want of them is a Subterfuge, invented on purpoſe, not to own the Cardinal's Innocence. HOSPINIAN (Rodolphus) is one of the greatest Authors of Switzerland. He was born at Altorf, a Village of the County of Kiburg, in the Canton of Zurich, the 7th. of November 1547, and at Seven Years of Age he was sent to Zurich to begin his Studies. He made a great Progress in them, under the Direction of John Wolphius †, his Uncle by his Mother; and losing his Father ‡ in the Year 1563, he found a most kind Patron in Rodolphus Gualterus * his Godfather. He left Zurich to visit the other Universities in March 1565, and staid two Years at Marpurg, where he distinguisht himself by his great Application to Study, and his good Conduct. He did the same at Heidelberg, the Six Months he spent there; after which his Superiors recall'd him, and put him into the Ministry in 1568. He was obliged to go and preach Twice a Week in a Country Church Four or Five Leagues from Zurich. He punctually discharged these Duties for Eight Years together, though he had a great deal of other Business upon his Hands in that Town. For he was made a Teacher of the Third Class, in 1569, and Provisor of the Abbatial School, in 1571. He was made Provisor of the Caroline School Five Years after. He roll'd this Sisyphean-Stone (A) with wonderful Patience for Nineteen Years together. He was made † Burgher in the Year 1569, and married (B) successfully the same Year. His Pastoral-Labours were somewhat lessened in the Year 1576; for they gave him a Church but a League from Zurich.

He charges Hosius with nothing but what is most true. Fingamus autem nunc verum esse, (they are Hosius's Words (i) in the same Book that Jonnes-Eudæmon cites) quod tu scripsisse nescio quem narras, nam nomen non exprimis, ac fieri potest ut sit commentum tuum, Scripturas valere quantum falulas Æsopi, si destituantur autoritate Ecclesiæ. Credo Brenti, num hic minùs reverenter de Scripturis loquutus est, quam qui vocat eam librum (k) Hæreticorum, cùm tamen nullorum sit minùs quàm Hæreticorum: est enim Catholicorum propria, qui tot seculis in ejus possessione præscripserunt. Et potuit illud tamen pio sensu dici, quem homo pius, qui charitatem habet, quæ non cogitat malum, ex iis verbis eliceret. Nam revera, nisi nos Ecclesia doceret autoritas hanc scripturam esse canonicam, perexiguum apud nos pondus haberet.

(k) Hosius had been saying, that Luther calls the Holy Scripture the Book of Heretick. Gretserus observes it likewise Proleg. exam. Mysterii Plessæani pag. 90. and quotes Luther's Words ex Postil. Eccles. Domin. 8. post Trin.

(C) Mr. Moreri has committed some Mistakes.] I. It was not at Pavia, but at Padua, that Hosius's Relations sent him to Study. Moreri might have discover'd his Fault, if he had known that Lazarus Bonamici, whom he makes Hosius's Master, was Professor at Padua. Du Saussai (l) supposes, that Hosius being sent into Italy by the Advice of Peter Thowiecki, Bishop of Cracow, staid at Bologna. He should have said that Hosius having studied at Padua some time, went to Bologna, where he was admitted Doctor of Law. Patavii, dein Bononiæ——Jurisprudentiæ industriam primo addiceras, & lauream sub ipso Hugone Boncompagno qui S. S. Gregorii XIII. nomine dein præfuit, postremo adeptus est (m). This shews the II. Falsity of Moreri; who says, that he received his Doctor's Degree at Padua. III. He was made Bishop of Culm, at the Instance of King Sigismund the First. These Words of Moreri imply another Falsity; for it was Sigismund Augustus who procured him that Bishoprick. IV. How could Sigismund I. send him to Rome to Pope Julius III. He died in 1548, whereas this Pope was not created till 1550. V. He should not have said, that retiring into Poland after the Conclusion of the Council, he writ those admirable Works that remain of him: For this signifies, that he made no Books before; whereas 'tis certain, that his Answer to Brentius was printed at Cologne, in 1558. 'Tis a Work of Four Hundred Pages in Folio. His Book, intituled, Confessio Catholicæ fidei Christianæ (a) was before that published at Mentz. His Books de Communione sub utraque specie, de Sacerdotum conjugio, and de missa vulgari lingua celebranda, were printed at Paris (b) in 1561. Du Saussai (c) deserves here a little Censure; for he reckons most of these Works among the Books which Hosius published after the Council of Trent. VI. Moreri should not have said in general, that Hosius's Books were printed Thirty Two Times before he died. He should, as Mr. Bullart did, have made some Exceptions. 'Many of his 'Writings, says he, (d) were printed Two and Thirty Times in his Life-time, in the Principal Towns 'of Christendom, and translated into French, Italian, German, Flemish, Polish, English, Scotch, 'and Armenian. M. de la Rochepozai (e) has committed the Fault of making no Exception. I have not taken notice of what Moreri says about the Reasons that obliged Cardinal Hosius not to be Present at the 24th. Session. He pretends it was because he disapproved the Decisions, made concerning Clandestine Marriages: 'Tis very true, that he did not like those Decisions, and (f) that he indeavoured Two or Three Times to get them revok'd, for which Reason he was taxed with Obstinacy; but it is no Ways certain, that his Absence was grounded upon the Reason which Moreri assigns. For he assisted at the Session before, tho' he disapprov'd some Things which were determin'd there about the Sacrifice of the Mass: He made no Scruple to oppose them. Why then durst he not do as much as to Clandestine Marriages? Would he not have been seconded by his Colleague Cardinal Simonetta, and some others? Did he not send in Writing, his Opinion, which was contrary to the Decree? Did he not declare in Writing, that he referred all that to the Judgment of the Holy Father? In a Word, his Sickness was not counterfeited, and lasted a long time. Thus you have most of the Reasons that Pallavicini made use of (g) to refute a Story adopted by Father Paul, that Hosius pretended to be Sick, that he might not be present at the Session, in which the Decree for Clandestine Marriages was to be ratified. There is sometimes Reason to say, that the Sicknesses of Great Men are affected, and only Politick Grimaces. But some Historians too Speculative, are some times out in saying so.

(C) A Noble Work, and of a vaſt Extent.] It was the Hiſtory of the Errors of Popery. That which gave him the firſt Thoughts of it, was the Diſcourſe he had in a Country Tavern with his Hoſt, who ridiculouſly believed, that the Monaſtick Life, was derived from Paradiſe. (n) Faſſum aliquando ferunt, cum illa excurſione neceſſum haberet in hoſpitio pernoctare, hoſpitem ruſticum non incuriоſum crebra ſecum colloquia miſcentem, & de Origine Papatûs, vitæ in primis Monaſticæ, quam ille pro ſimplicitate ſua ex Paradiſo arceſſendam ridiculè ſuſtinuerit, anxiè inquirentem, anſam ſibi libros de Origine errorum ſcribendi præbuiſſe. He conſidered that the Papiſts, when beaten by the Scripture, had recourſe to Tradition, and vaunted their Antiquity, and undervalued the Novelty of the Proteſtants. To unharbour them of that Sanctuary, he trac'd the Original and Progreſs of the Romiſh Ceremonies and Doctrines; and ſhew'd by what Degrees the Truth, which JESUS CHRIST and his Apoſtles had taught, gave way to Innovations. (o) Impetum concepit animo ſuo plane heroicum, & laude nunquam intermoritura dignißimum, fictitia illius vetuſtatis ſpectrum debellandi, Gibeoniticaſque artes & fraudes, monſtratis geminis errorum, qui paulatim Eccleſiam inundaverant, originibus, detegendi convellendique. Et magna quidem molis, immenſique laboris opus aggrediebatur, cum de cæleſti doctrina, & ceremoniis veræ primitivæ Eccleſiæ, tum de inclinatione & depravatione ejuſdem doctrinæ, deque ceremoniarum mutatione, auctione & progreſſu iis ſeculis, quæ Chriſtum & Apoſtolos primùm, deinde verò Conſtantinum Imperatorem, imprimis autem Gregorium M. ſecuta ſunt. He (a) chiefly deſigned to Write about Baptiſm, the Euchariſt, the Temples, Feaſts, Faſts, Orders, Monks, the Primacy of the Pope, and Burials. He began alſo to compoſe the Lives of the Popes, and ſome Animadverſions upon Gratian (b). He was about Forty one Years old, when he laid the Plan of this great Deſign.

(D) He ſhew'd ſome great Pieces of it.] I will here give a Liſt of the Books he publiſhed. The firſt was an Oration de origine & progreſſu rituum & ceremoniarum Eccleſiaſticarum. He ſpoke it in an Academical Aſſembly, and printed it in 1585. Two Years after he publiſhed his Treatiſe de templis, hoc eſt de origine, progreſſu, uſu & abuſu templorum, ac omnino verum omnium ad templa pertinentium. He put out a Second Edition of it in the Year 1603. not only with Corrections, but alſo with great Additions; for he added to it, the Confutation of the Arguments which Bellarmin and Baronius had produced in behalf of their Party upon that Subject, ſince the firſt Edition. In the Year 1588, he publiſhed a Tract Monachis, ſeu de origine & progreſſu monachatus ac ordinum Monaſticorum, equitum militarium tam ſacrorum quam ſeculariuм omnium. He put out a Second Edition of it in 1609, in which he refuted Bellarmin's Book de Monachis, publiſhed ſince the firſt Edition of his Work. He was juſt ready to publiſh his Tract de Origine & progreſſu jejuniorum, in 1589, when a Work of Bellarmin juſt printed gave him to underſtand, that this Jeſuit promiſed a Book upon that Subject. He therefore deferred the Publication of it, till he could join a Confutation of what Bellarmin ſhould allege. But becauſe he applied himſelf to other Things in the mean time, he never finiſhed that Treatiſe. Theſe other things were the Holy Days, upon which he publiſhed Two Volumes, one in 1592, the other in 1593. The firſt is intituled, de feſtis Judæorum & Ethnicorum, hoc eſt, de origine, progreſſu, ceremoniis & ritibus feſtorum dierum Judæorum, Græcorum, Romanorum, Turcarum, & Indianorum. He reprinted it in the Year 1611, with many Corrections and Additions. The ſecond is intituled, de Origine, progreſſu, ceremoniis & ritibus feſtorum dierum Chriſtianorum. He reprinted it in 1612. with large Supplements, which ſerved both to refute Bellarmin upon the Romiſh Idolatry, and James Gretſer upon Corpus-Chriſti-Day. In 1598, he publiſhed the firſt Volume of his Hiſtoria Sacramentaria: Hoc eſt libri quinque de Cœna Dominica prima inſtitutione, ejuſque vero uſu & abuſu in primitiva Eccleſia, nec non de ejus origine, progreſſu, ceremoniis & ritibus Miſſæ, tranſſubſtantiationis & aliorum pene infinitorum errorum, quibus Cœna prima inſtitutio horribiliter in Papatu polluta & profanata eſt. Four Years after he publiſhed the Second Volume of that Hiſtory, containing the Controverſies betwixt thoſe of the Augsburg Confeſſion, and the other Proteſtants, about the Euchariſt. The Title of it is, de origine & progreſſu controverſiæ ſacramentariæ de Cœna Domini inter Lutheranos & Orthodoxos quos Zwinglianos & Calviniſtas vocant exortæ, ab anno Chriſti Salvatoris 1517, uſque ad annum 1602. He publiſhed in the Year 1607, a Work intituled, Concordia diſcors, ſeu de origine & progreſſu formulæ Concordiæ Bergenſis. In the Year 1619. he publiſhed a Tract againſt the Jeſuits. Hiſtoria Jeſuitica, hoc eſt, de origine, regulis, conſtitutionibus, privilegiis, incrementis, progreſſu, & propagatione Ordinis Jeſuitarum; item de eorum dolis, fraudibus, impoſturis, nefariis facinoribus, cruentis conſiliis, falſa quoque ſeditioſa & ſanguinolenta doctrina (c). With this he ended his Compoſitions, being reſolved to ſpend the reſt of his Days in Prayers, Holy Reading, and Sacred Meditations.

(E) The Lutherans vexed him in their turn with their Anſwers.] The Hiſtory of the Sacramentarian War betwixt the Lutherans and Calviniſts, and that of the Formulary of Concord, ſhew ſo much Confuſion, Paſſion, Shuffling and Cavilling on the Lutheran Side, that it would be a Miracle, if theſe two Books had not furiouſly provoked the Saxon Divines. In Saxony they choſe a Man to anſwer Hoſpinian, who was very fit to dazzle the Publick; a Man, I ſay, who treated his Adverſaries moſt contemptuouſly, and took upon him a Magiſterial Air. There is nothing like this to conceal the weak Sides of a Cauſe.

Anſwers; to which he did not finiſh his Reply, as knowing that the common Enemies of the Proteſtants would be too much pleaſed on that Occaſion. He therefore turned all his Forces againſt the Jeſuits. I doubt not but the Suppreſſion of his Reply was grateful (F) to ſome Princes. He loſt the Uſe of his Eyes, near a Year, by a Cataract. However, he Preached as he uſed to do. It was happily couched for him the 18th. of September 1613. At Seventy Six Years of Age he grew Childiſh, and was never delivered from that miſerable Condition, but by his Death the 11th. of March, 1626, in his 79th. Year. His Writings had given ſuch an Idea of his Learning, that he was adviſed from all Sides to Confute Baronius's Annals, no Body being thought Feceris magnum operæ pretium Germanicè reſpondendo.* Hoſpinian (h) immediately wrote a Reply, but he did not publiſh it. In the Year 1614, came out another Work of Hutterus, intituled, Concordia concors, ſeu de origine & progreſſu formulæ concordiæ Eccleſiarum Confeſſionis Auguſtanæ. In which he undertook to deprive Hoſpinian of all the Reputation he had got for his Learning or Candour. Quo quantum de libro ipſo, tantundem de eruditionis, candoris & judicii Hoſpiniani fama, ſuoque eccleſiæ infamia ſe detrahere poſſe ſperavit. Opus ipſum haud exigua molis, & varia nullis paulucius prodiit: aſt ſi inanem verborum ſtrepitum, & rerum, convitiorum, ſplendidarumque calumniarum tumorem ei demeres, tantum non ad inciſas redigi, atque in nihilum recidere liquebat (i). Hoſpinian's Friends adviſed him to reply immediately, and to (k) humble the Pride of his Adverſary. He preſently took Pen in Hand, and went about a Reply; but he never finiſhed it. Mr. Heidegger Witneſſes, that this Work is admirable. 'Tis likely the Author was diſcouraged, becauſe he had to do with ſo abuſive an Enemy; he was afraid alſo of diverting the Jeſuits too much, by continuing this Civil-War: whatever was the matter, his Book was never publiſhed. (l) Neque tamen opus iſthoc ad metam perduxit, ſeu tædio victus eſt maledicentiæ adverſarii, qui neſcio quibus agitatus furiis ubique inſultare, quàm cum ratione quadam diſputare maluit; ſeu faſtidium ſubiit ducendi funem moleſtæ adeò contentionis, quæ non tantùm animos veritatis facâ copia ſauciatos agroſque, magis exulcerarum iri, ſed etiam capitales religionis hoſtes, Jeſuitas cumprimis, infauſti certaminis illius futuros ſpectatores aviditimos, delicias jucundo ejuſmodi ſpectaculo ſibi fakturos——metuit. The Lutherans ſeem by this to have got the Victory, the World being ready to adjudge it to him that ſpeaks laſt. This is to remain Maſter of the Field of Battle. I am going to mention a Reaſon which probably contributed to Hoſpinian's Silence.

(F) Was grateful to ſome Princes.] About the time that Hoſpinian printed his Concordia diſcors, Frederick IV. Elector Palatine, wrote to the Magiſtrates of Zurich, about a Conference, that was ſet on Foot between the Lutherans and the Calviniſts, to find out Ways of Accommodation, that might ſerve for a League between the Proteſtant Princes, againſt the Sanguinary Deſigns of the Jeſuits. For this reaſon Hoſpinian's Book was thought to be publiſhed out of Seaſon. He juſtified himſelf as to that matter, the beſt he could, in a Letter he wrote (a) to Maurice, Landgrave of Heſſe. He ſaid, that though theſe Conferences ſerve only to widen the Breach, as has been often found by Experience; yet he would have deferred the Impreſſion of his Work, or even condemned it to the Obſcurity of his Cloſet, if he had known the Princes Intentions before: (b) " Libri intempeſtive editi culpam——ſic ſtudioſe " amolitur, ut ſimul de inſtitutis ejuſmodi Colloquiis " ſententiam graviter proferat hunc ſenſum in modum: " Etſi ego de hujuſmodi colloquio mihi ipſi nihil boni polliceri poſſim, & majores animorum diſtractiones & conturbationes, odia item, contentiones, ac " diſſidia poſt illud nocentiſſima vehementer metuam, " præſertim ſi mecum reputem, quæ Marpurgenſe, " Maulbrunnenſe, Mompelgardenſe & Ratisbonenſe " colloquia tecuta ſint; & adverſarii palam proteſtentur, ſe non diſcere, ſed docere, & ne in minimo quidem articulo ſententiam mutare. ſed in " ſemel concepta opinione firmiter permanere velle: " nihilominus editionem hujus libri vel in aliud tempus rejeciſſem, ac reſervâſſem; vel, ſi ex uſu eccleſiæ fuiſſet, prorſus ſuppreſſiſſem, ſi hoc conſilium & inſtitutum Illuſtriſſ. Principum vel ante " ſemeſtre mihi cognitum fuiſſet, ne illud impediiſſe " accuſari meritò poſſem. The fear he had of diſpleaſing ſome Princes, and expoſing ſome People to great Dangers, obliged him not to inſert in his Work all that he knew. (c) Paſſus eſt ingenuè, operi illi de Concordia diſcorde, deeſſe plurima: nulla equidem ſua culpa, ſed tum quòd ad cognitionem & manus ſuas plura non pervenerint; tum quòd nonnulla dedita opera, omitti conſultiùs viſum ſit, propter admonitionem ex aula potente inſinuatam, ut in ſcribenda ea hiſtoria caute circumſpectèque agat, & quid ſecretorum ex cameris Principum, præſertim verò ex oris Saxonicis habeat. Fore alioquin, ut res hæc ingenti periculo non careat, propter orthodoxos iis in locis ſuſpectos, ne cum iis ludus Crellianus vel (d) Proceriannus ludatur. 'Tis (e) very likely then, that he gave over his Reply, amongſt other Reaſons, becauſe he feared he ſhould be looked upon as the Cauſe of a Theological War, that might hinder the Proteſtant States from uniting in their common Intereſts. 'Tis very certain, that the Princes of the Empire, both Lutherans and Calviniſts, were well-pleaſed with his Silence; for the Hiſtory of that Time informs us, that the Controverſies of the Divines were a great Impediment to the Princes, and they ſtill cauſe from time to time the greateſt Diſturbances to the Magiſtrates in many Imperial Towns. Into what Troubles has Hamburg fallen not long ago (f) upon the Diſputes of the Miniſters that divided the People, and brought 'em into Bodies? Theſe Diſputes are hardly ever laid, but by the Baniſhment of him who has the weaker Faction: So that, if one may be allowed to uſe Compariſons, it might be ſaid, that theſe Quarrels are like thoſe of Bulls, who fight for a Heifer; the weakeſt hides himſelf, and comes no more in Play:

Perhaps the Reaſon I have mentioned, induced Hoſpinian to break off his Hiſtory of the Reformation projected in Saxony, under the Elector Chriſtian. (G) A new Edition of his Works.] There are none of the Tracts in it, to which the Author had not put the laſt Hand. His Heirs have religiouſly obſerved his Intention (k), being not willing to communicate them to the Publick; but have only furniſhed ſome Remarks, which he added to his Works after they were printed. You'll find in his Life what Pieces he had carried far on, and what he had but made a rough Draught of. This is enough to ſhew his vaſt Learning and prodigious Labour.

(A) He was of Auvergne, and of a midling Family.] His Father was a Phyſician, and was employed by the Conſtable Charles de Bourbon. (l) 'He 'never forſook him, following him in Diſguiſe, partaking of all his Misfortunes, aſſiſting him in all 'his Deſigns, againſt the King, againſt the Emperor, and Rome, againſt the Cardinals and the 'Pope himſelf. When he accompanied him in his retreat towards the Emperor Charles, he left (m) in France, 'all his Children, both Sons and Daughters; who being but young, could not bear the 'Hazards and Fatigues of ſuch a Journey. Our 'Michael was at Toulouſe at Eighteen Years of Age, 'and though he was there with no other Deſign than 'to Study, he was carried away upon Suſpicion, and 'clapt up in the publick Priſons, till there was an 'expreſs Command from the King to releaſe him, 'and give him his Liberty to purſue his Studies, 'ſince he was not found tainted with any Deſign 'that could render him guilty. He went to ſee his Father at the time that the Conſtable being returned into Italy, (n) found Affairs much perplexed there; for Francis I. had laid Siege to Milan, 'and (o) 'becauſe the Siege was like to laſt long, this Phyſician fearing, leſt his Son by two great a Diſcontinuance ſhould make a ſtrange Breach in his Studies, 'committed the care of him to ſome Carriers, to 'take him along with them, with whom he left 'Milan, diſguiſed in the Habit of a Mule-Driver; 'and with great Danger of his Life paſſed the River Adda, and afterwards went to Padua, where 'the Study of the Law flouriſhed from all Antiquity. His Father left him in that Univerſity Six 'Years, and then he recalled him to Bologna, 'and to Rome; where he was honoured with a 'Judge's Place, which they call Auditor of the Rota. He reſigned it by the Advice of his Father, 'upon the Promiſes made him by Cardinal Grandmont to advance him to higher Poſts in his Country; but he was diſappointed of his Hopes at once, 'both on one ſide and the other. For the Place of 'Auditor was given to another, and the Death 'which ſurpriſed Cardinal Grandmont, broke off 'the Hopes that brought him into France. Being 'thus diſappointed, he applied himſelf to the Bar; 'and in leſs than three Years, he married Mary 'Morin, Daughter of the Lieutenant-Criminal Morin, 'who brought for a Portion, a Place (a) of Counſellor 'in the Parliament, which he exerciſed about Nine 'Years, and then he was ſent Ambaſſador to Bologna, for King Henry, where an Univerſal Counſel of all the Biſhops had been appointed for ſome 'Reformation. Thevet adds, that he was afterwards Chancellor of the Dutcheſs of Berry, (b) and 'then Head and Superintendant of the King's Finances, in his Chamber of Accompts, and that 'after the Death of King Henry he was elected Privy-Counſellor. Note, that his Father (c) after the Conſtable's Death, attended ſome time the Court of the Emperor Charles V. and then adhering (d) to the Service of Renata de Bourbon, Siſter of his firſt Maſter, and Wife of Antony of Lorrain, ſpent there the reſt of his Days. Some (e) make him the Son of a Man, who was born, and lived and died a Jew in the City of Avignon. Varillas, from whom I take theſe Words, ſays elſewhere (f), that the Father of Michael de l'Hoſpital was a Jew. He is very much ſubject to this ſort of Confuſion. Mr. Teſſier (g) ſays, that Mezerai relates, that the Father of the Chancellor was the Son of a Phyſician to the Queen of Navarre, Wife of Antony de Bourbon. He cites (h) page 1156. of the Second Volume of Mezerai's Hiſtory of France. I find nothing concerning Chancellor de l'Hoſpital in the Second Volume of that Author: I only find in the 22d. Page of the Third Volume, that he was the Son of the Phyſician of Renata de Bourbon, Wife of Antony of Lorrain.

(B) That the Guiſes procured him that Office, and that they they did it upon the Notion they had, that being obliged to them.] Lewis Regnier, Sieur de la Planche, relates, that after the Death of Chancellor Olivier, they offered his Place to (i) Morvilliers a Privy-Counſellor and Biſhop of Orleans——a moſt affectionate Servant of their Family, and that they cunningly ſerved themſelves by his Refuſal. 'For 'thinking they could make better uſe of Michael 'de l'Hoſpital, brought up and advanced by them, 'they took Morvilliers at his Word, and ſent in 'queſt of the other at Nice, where he was Chancellor of the Dutcheſs of Savoy. The Dutcheſs was 'therefore given to underſtand, that the King to o'blige her, made her Chancellor his own. But other Hiſtorians ſay, that the Queen-Mother was the true Author of that Choice, being moved to it by the Dutcheſs of Montpenſier, who thought thereby to give a Check to the Ambition of the Guiſes. See the Article (k) Longueil. Thuanus (l) adds that when they acquieſced in that Choice, the Affair was already concluded, and that Catherine de Medicis let Michael de l'Hoſpital know, that it was not at their Recommendation, but at hers, that the King had honoured him with that Dignity, and that therefore ſhe hoped to ſee him more zealous for the Intereſt of his Prince, and of the Queen his Mother, than for that of a Family, whoſe Ambition was deteſted by every Body. The ſame Hiſtorian obſerves, that it was more eaſie for the Queen-Mother to ſucceed, becauſe Michael de l'Hoſpital was in good Eſteem with the Cardinal of Lorrain. Note, that Mr. Teſſier is (m) miſtaken when he ſays quoting Thuanus's XXIVth. Book, 'that Catherine de Medecis obliged Henry II. to make Michael de l'Hoſpital Chan-'cellor use Address (C), because if he had openly opposed the Designs of the Guises, he had not been able to remedy the Confusions of France. He was forced then to swim betwixt two Streams, and by that Prudent Conduct he turned off some Storms which threatned the Kingdom, and retarded some others, and found the Means of doing good Service to his Country, as much as the miserable Condition of the Times would permit him. He hindred, amongst other Things, the Introduction of the Inquisition (D), by consenting to an Edict * that was much more severe against the Protestants, than he would have had it. 'Twas that of Romorantin. There's no doubt but that if he had been sole Manager of these Things, he would have procured a full Toleration for the Protestants. His good Offices and Management were undoubtedly one of the Causes which alter'd the Dispositions of Mens Minds towards them; this Alteration was so remarkable, that the Second Year of his Ministry there were almost as many Voices for them

' cellor of France. He should have said Francis II.

(C) He was obliged to use Address.] We'll still make use of la Planche, for our Comment upon this Text. ' (n) As for Chancellor de l'Hospital, ' few People rejoiced at first to see him raised to that ' Dignity, having been so familiar with the (†) Cardinal; insomuch that it was thought he would not ' be so bold as to contradict him in any thing, having ' had so many Favours and Preferments from him. ' But as he knew the Genius of the Guises, as having for a long time been used to 'em; so he had ' the Prudence dexterously to prevent their Stratagems, if not as he ought, yet at least as well as ' he could, according to the ill Condition of the ' Times, warding off their most furious Blows with ' a singular Industry. For having proposed to himself, as soon as he was established in his Post, to ' take a right Course, like a wise Man, and not to ' favour one Party or another, but to serve the King ' and his Country, he was obliged to use a prodigious ' Art to contain those of the House of Lorrain ' within due Bounds. Which he had a mind to perform in such a manner, that they might not perceive, he intended in any thing to contradict or displease them, well knowing, that if they once entertained that Opinion of him, he could do nothing to any purpose. Thus with great Dissimulation, many things passed through his Hands, which were thought very dangerous: however he ' kept a Medium, giving Hopes to those who loved ' the Publick, that all should finally end well, provided they would let him do. Few People understood his Intention: but time discovered that ' he had embraced the Service of his King, and the ' Safety of the People, quite otherwise than was imagined. And to speak Truth, his Prudence cannot be sufficiently described. For certainly, tho' if ' he had taken a shorter way manfully to oppose the ' Evil, he would be more to be praised, and God ' possibly would have blessed his Constancy: Yet as ' far as may be judged, he alone by his moderate ' Management, has been the Instrument, which ' God has made use of to stop the force of these ' impetuous Waves, in which all the French would ' have been overwhelmed. Nevertheless, outward ' Appearances were against him. In short, when ' any one minded him of an approaching Danger, he ' had always this Saying in his Mouth, Patience, ' Patience, all will go well.

(D) He hindred——— the Introduction of the Inquisition, by consenting to an Edict.] Here is the Sequel of the Sieur de la Planche's Narrative. ' (o) To make short, when the Question was about ' expediting the Edict for the Spanish Inquisition, ' knowing that the Privy-Council and the Parliaments had agreed to it, he moderated the matter, ' by an Edict on purpose, for which he gave so ' good Reasons, that the Guises themselves, who ' had been for it, were of his Opinion, and made ' the Spaniards approve it, who were desirous that ' France should be ordered and framed by their Model. This happened in the Month of May, in the ' Town of Romorantin, and that Edict was ever after called the Edict of Romorantin. Varillas observes (p) that ' so moderate a Conduct displeased ' the Calvinists, and did not satisfy the Catholicks. ' The Calvinists took Exception, that they had ' given them their Adversaries (q), and their irreconcileable Enemies for their Judges, and the Catholicks suspected from that time, that the Chancellor was of the New Religion——They reproached him with going to Mass only for Form's sake; ' and turned the Mass of the Chancellor into a Proverb, to signify a Mass that People went to, only ' in Obedience to the King. The House of Guise ' had no better Opinion of this Magistrate, and repented that they had contributed with the Dutchess ' of Savoy to make him what he was. They fancied, ' that this able Politician endeavoured to withdraw ' himself from their Dependance, by forming at ' Court a Third Party with the Queen-Mother, to ' keep the Ballance even between the two others, so ' as neither of 'em might supplant the other. This puts me in mind of this Passage of Brantome (r). ' He was reckoned an Huguenot tho' he went to ' Mass, but it was said at Court, God keep us from ' the Mass of Monsieur de l'Hospital.

'Tis the common Fate of those, who seek to keep a Temper between the Pretensions of two opposite Parties, to please neither the one nor the other. But that Inconvenience is sometimes a lesser Evil, than it would be to comply with one of the Parties; and there are many Junctures, in which the greatest Good that can be done, is to divide the Disadvantages, that every one may have his Share of them. Our Chancellor would have spoiled all, if he had at first undertaken to give full Satisfaction to the Enemies of the House of Guise. This had been to split against a Rock. Prudence would not suffer him to attack that Faction, but with a side Wind; they had the Wind in the Stern, and he was not to steer against it. I believe, that many Calvinists, who had more Zeal than Knowledge of the World, always condemned this Chancellor's Conduct. They would have had him to declare himself openly the Protector of their Cause. But could he have preserved his Post Three Months together, had not he observed that Temper? He well understood, that the best way to withstand a Tempest, was that which Plutarch makes mention of, speaking of the Government of Republicks (a). ' Astronomers tell us, the Sun's Motion is neither exactly parallel with the rest of the ' Orbs, nor yet directly and diametrically opposite ' to them; but describing an Oblique Line, with ' insensible Declination, he steers his Course so, to ' dispense his Light and Influence in his Annual Revolution, at several Seasons, in equal Proportions ' to the whole Creation. So it happens in Political ' Affairs, that if the Motions of Rulers be constantly opposite and cross to the Genius and Inclination of the People, they will be stomach'd as ' Arbitrary and Tyrannical; as on the other side, too much Deference and Indulgence to the Subjects Levity and Wantonness, has often proved ' Dangerous and Fatal; but the gratifying them ' in reasonable and fair Requests, when they are not ' masterly and insolent, may prove for the Honour ' and Safety of the Government. Our Chancellor was not ignorant of what Cicero observes, that Politicians ought to imitate Sailors. (b) An, cum videam navem secundis ventis cursum tenentem suum, si non ea cum petat portum, quem ego aliquando probavi, sed alium non minus tutum atque tranquillum, cum tempestate pugnem periculosè potius, quàm illi salute præsertim præposita obtemperem & paream? neque enim inconstantis puto sententiam tanquam aliquod navigium, atque cursum ex Reipub. tempestate moderari. Though he had not the good Fortune of Lepidus, who kept in the Favour of Tiberius, by observing a just Medium betwixt sordid Flatteries, and a too great Stiffness, he deserves the Praises that Tacitus has express'd in this manner:

them (E) as against them in the Council which examined the Petition they presente d to the King, desiring the free Exercise of their Religion. His Influence was no less Effectual in † the Restrictions of the Edict of July 1561, and in the Liberty they had ‡ not to observe it. The Edict of January which they obtained some time after, was doubtless his Work: Now that Edict permitted them their publick Assemblies, and many other Privileges. This was the only Remedy for the Evils of the Kingdom; all the dreadful Miseries that afflicted it for thirty years arising from the Infraction of that Edict: and after all these dismal Calamities, it was necessary to take the same Remedy, and in a stronger Dose. It was necessary to grant them the Edict of Nantes, which was much more Advantageous to the Reformed, than that which Chancellor de l' Hospital had procur'd them. But I confess also that the Romish Religion did not run such a Risk when the Edict of Nantes was granted, (F) as it did when the Edict of January was made. The Obstacles that he was to overcome, did not cease after he had (E) There was almost as many Voices for them as against them.] This Particular seems to me to be curious; and I fancy, that every Body will be pleased to find here the Circumstances of that Affair. I make use of the Commentary that a Catholick Writer supplies me with. (d) 'The Huguenots 'have presented a Petition to the King, that they 'might be permitted to have a separate Church 'from ours. The King sent the Petition to the Parliament, to advise about it with the Lords of the 'Council. They have freely Voted on both sides, 'the one for the Catholick Party, the other for 'the Protestant. The Catholicks have carried it 'by three Voices, it being their Resolution that 'People must either follow the Roman Church as 'our Ancestors did, or depart the Kingdom, with 'leave to Sell their Estates. When the Voices came 'to be cast up, there was not a little Murmur; be'cause the others maintained, that in a Matter 'of such Importance, there was no Reason that 'all France should be put into a Combustion by 'Reason of those three Votes. They added that 'such a Banishment could not be Executed, and that 'to undertake to bring them over to the Church 'against their Conscience, was a very great Ab'surdity, which amounted to an Impossibility. 'The Admiral and several other Lords, cannot 'be silent about it. The Duke of Guise on the 'other Hand, tho' the time seemed to be con'trary to his Design, Declared clearly and aloud, 'that since it had been so resolved, they must stand 'to that Determination, and that his Sword should 'never rest in the Scabbard, when the Question 'should be whether that Decree should take Effect. 'Things in this Contention past over without Con'clusion——— (e) since that, to content both 'Parties by a Form of Neutrality, an Edict has 'been Published in July last (f) ——— The sin'cere (g) Catholicks complain of this Edict, and 'say that those of the New or pretended Reformed 'Religion, being not to be disturbed in their Houses, 'tis 'in plain Terms to Frustrate the first Article of 'the Edict, and nevertheless to deliver them from 'the Power of the Magistrate: Which some time 'after will give them occasion to shake off the Yoke 'from their Necks.

(F) The Romish Religion did not run such a risk ——— as when the Edict of January was made.] The Protestants had very nearly got the upper Hand, in the beginning of Charles IX's Reign; and if they had, God knows what would have become of the Religion that Persecuted them the three Preceding Reigns. If the King of Navarre, who openly Declared for them, had been able to discover the Snare, that the other Party laid for him, he would have continued firm in their Communion. There needed no more to have procured 'em the Victory; for he was Lieutenant-General of the Kingdom, and there had been no difficulty then to have brought over Catherine de Medicis (b) to the Reformed Religion. But he suffered himself to be Cheated by imaginary Hopes, and had not Penetration enough to Discover the Grossness of the Snare; he took the Isle of Sardinia, a Country of Exile, a Country (i) Miserable and Disgraced; he took it, I say, so well he knew the Map, for one of those Fortunate Islands mentioned in the Fables. Being thus grosly deceived by those Artifices of the Spaniards, and the Cardinal Legate, he abandoned (k) the Protestants; and thus Consequently you see, what a little was wanting to their becoming Masters. I will quote a Passage, which will shew the Interest they had in his Favour in the States of Orleans, and the Liberty they injoyed under his Protection. They Publickly Assembled even in the Capital City of the Kingdom, before the Edicts permitted them. But it must be Noted, that the Regent Catherine de Medicis (a) had agreed upon this with the King of Navarre. (b) 'the Huguenots ——— had all 'their Dependance upon this (c) King, as upon one 'whom they had carried on their Shoulders, and 'into whose Hands they had dropt the Govern'ment of France, by their Intrigues and secret 'Practices, in the Assembly of the three States. 'And indeed as an Acknowledgement of this, he 'permitted by a very great Connivance, their 'Preaching with the Doors open, not only in 'Paris, but also at the King's Court at St. Germains 'in Laye. It was a difficult thing for him, that 'he should maintain his Grandeur, but by means 'of those who Reciprocally were to maintain them'selves by his Countenance and Support. Never'theless changing his Mind, he was the first In'strument of the Catholicks Arming themselves 'against the others. But because these are things 'unknown to many, and possibly you have not heard 'how these Practices were carried on; you must 'know that the Pope perceiving the Commotions that 'were among us, sent the Cardinal of Ferrara, 'Uncle of Madam de Guise, with most Ample In'structions ——— (d) We have here also the 'Lord de Charantonneau, Son to the Deceas'd Chan'cellour Granvelle. 'Tis said that this Embassador 'of King Philip is in the Interest of some of our 'great Princes, who were not pleas'd with this 'diversity of Religions. He is gone three or four 'times in a disguis'd Habit to the King of Navarre, 'assuring him in his Master's Name that as soon as 'he would take upon him the Protection of the 'Church of Rome, he would Restore him his King'dom of Navarre, or at least an Equivalent in Rich 'and Plentiful Countries. As this Engine began 'to Work the Legate also came in, promising him 'from the Holy See the County Venaissin, and 'moreover to procure him from his Catholick Ma'jesty the Isle of Sardinia, which the Pope would 'Erect into a Kingdom, in Case the King would not 'Restore to him the Kingdom of Navarre. 'Tis 'said that the Constable, and the Mareschal de St. 'André, countenanced all their Promises, to 'make him relish them. I will not venture to 'assure you that this is as true as the Gospel: But 'so much I can tell, that it was the common Re'port (e). I can say further, that in an Instant his 'Countenance and Will were changed towards the 'Huguenots: For he forbad the Ministers to Preach 'in the Castle any more, when they had Liberty 'and Permission to do it five or six Months before. 'Even in the Assembly of St Germains he oppos'd 'the Huguenots as much as he could: But the 'Prince of Condé, the Admiral and others, who 'then were not the least in Favour with the King, 'oppos'd him, and carried it with respect to the 'Pub-

Many People who judge of things only by the Event, will ſay that the Proteſtants would have been more Prudent, if they had affected leſs Haughtineſs at that time; for that Oſtentation of their Numbers was look'd on as a Bravado, which four'd their Enemies, and put them upon the moſt Violent Remedies. We ſee from a Letter of the Cardinal Legate, that theſe haughty Steps gave him hopes of a Proſperous Iſſue: His Letter is Dated from St. Germains the 27*th*. of February 1562. Here is a Piece of it. ' (m) There happen'd lately a Quarrel betwixt thoſe of both Religions, ſome of whom remain'd Dead upon the Spot: And yet the Danger proved greater than the Damage. The Catholicks in an Inſtant flock'd hither to Complain of the Violences of the Huguenots; They Remonſtrated that according to the Expreſs Order of his Majeſty, they had laid down their Arms; but that the Huguenots had done the quite contrary. For this Reaſon they deſired that it might be immediately permitted them to reſume them, to ſecure themſelves from their Ambuſcades, which made them apprehenſive, that being ſo Reinforced by Advantageous Troops of Soldiers, they would do Violence for the future, either to their Goods or Perſons. But the Huguenots likewiſe fail'd not to come and excuſe themſelves, Alledging in their Vindication: That the Jealouſies the Catholicks gave them by Reaſon of their great Numbers, was the reaſon they did not Diſarm. The Anſwer of the Queen and King of Navarre was extreamly favourable to thoſe of our Party: for they bad them take Courage, and alſo promiſed them that they would take great care to provide for their particular ſecurity, and for the common Repoſe of their City. So that after ſuch obliging Words proceeding from the Mouths of their Majeſties, by which they Expreſs'd more Tenderneſs than they expected, they went away with all poſſible Satisfaction. On the contrary the Huguenots were Aſtoniſh'd, when they were told in very rough Terms; that if they would not be more Modeſt, and abſtain from ſuch Violences, they ſhould be taught better Manners. The King of Navarre went ſtill farther: For even before them he ſaid to the Queen: That her Majeſty needed only give the Command, and that when ſhe pleas'd, he could find a means to ſtop the Courſe of their Inſolences. To this I add this particular, which is none of the leaſt; That not only their Majeſties but all others in general, were extreamly Scandaliz'd with Beza's Walking no otherwiſe in Paris, than attended with Mr. d' Andelot, and a great number of Men on Horſeback following them. However after all this, tho' Diſorders and Scandals are moſt times Prejudicial; Yet ſome times they fail not to produce ſome Fruit, becauſe provoking the Patience of the Great, they frequently incline them to generous Enterprizes. Which makes me believe, that we ought not to be much troubled at this, becauſe there is a Probability, that conſidering the preſent diſpoſition of the Great, ſuch Diſorders will all at once fall on the Heads of thoſe that cauſe them? Let us ſay however to theſe Criticks, that it was very Natural for thoſe who had groan'd near forty years, under ſo hard and cruel an Oppreſſion, to take Advantage of their Liberty, and to overflow like Waters at the opening of the Sluces. Nay, there were ſome Reaſons of Prudence that might prompt them to that Conduct. They might reaſonably imagine, that the Court would think it ſelf obliged to treat civilly a Party, whoſe Power ſhould be found Capable of giving Apprehenſions. Laſtly, I ſay, that neither the Miniſters nor the People could hinder Andelot, and other brave Men of Quality, to mix with their Zeal for Religion, the Soldier and Gentleman-like Carriage, which Courage and Cuſtom gave 'em. However it be, the other Church eſcaped narrowly; for if notwithſtanding the Deſertion of the King of Navarre, the Proteſtants maintained the firſt War very well, what would not they have done under the Protection of the Lieutenant-General of the Kingdom, which would doubtleſs have drawn after it that of the Queen-Mother? Languet tells us the good Opinion one might have of their Forces. (G) In order to put an end to the Scruples, and Conquer the Ill Humour of the Parliament of Paris.] This Parliament refuſed to verify the Edict of January, and deputed a Preſident, and a Councellor, to make their Remonſtrances to the King. Theſe two Deputies (b) 'having particularly explained before the King the Reaſons, that moved the Parliament not to receive that Edict, the Chancellor by reaſon of the Eminence of his Office, and the Minority of our King, Anſwered them in this manner: That he did not doubt but all the Arguments repreſented by them, were very Weighty; but he deſired 'em to conſider that they had not been forgotten in the Grand Conſiſtory of St. Germains; that the Queſtion in Hand, was one of thoſe in which there is ſome difficulty, what way ſoever one may take; and that to ſpeak the Truth, there was room to excuſe the Magiſtrates, whatever part they took. He granted that the Foundation of the Common-wealth was the having but one Religion; but when things were come to ſuch a Height, as was then obſerved in France, the Rejection of this Edict muſt be attended with one of theſe two things: Either to put all the Adherents of this new Religion to the Sword, or to Baniſh 'em intirely, with Permiſſion to diſpoſe of their Effects. The firſt Point could not be Executed, that Party being too ſtrong both in Leaders, and Partiſans; and tho' it were poſſible to do it, if the King's Youth were ſtained with the Blood of ſo many Subjects, perhaps when he came to Age and Underſtanding, he would require it at his Governours Hands. And as to the ſecond Point, that it was as Impracticable: And ſhould it ſucceed to our deſire, we ſhould raiſe by this Conduct as many deſperate Enemies as Exiles. And as to the Edict of July, tho' it had a plauſible Pretence, it really tended to make Men Atheiſts, in permitting 'em not to frequent the Catholick Churches, and yet nevertheleſs depriving 'em of the Exerciſe of their Religion. Wherefore to obviate all theſe Miſchiefs, it was the beſt way to Eſtabliſh in France two Churches till God ſhould pleaſe to Reunite us in the ſame Mind: And this had been the Practice heretofore of Galerius, and Conſtantius the Emperors, to Compoſe the Diviſions betwixt the Chriſtians and Heathens: Remonſtrating to 'em, and praying them to ſubmit to the preſent Neceſſity; In brief to tolerate this Scandal, to avoid a greater Evil, and that if we Tranſgreſſed in this, it was in imitation of the Neighbouring Nations, who in the like Neceſſity had been obliged to do the ſame. This Anſwer being reported to the Parliament, the Chambers once more Aſſembled, did not change their Opinion. This Reluctance diſturb'd the Court, and it was again Debated with ſome Deputies of Paris what was to be done (c). By a Majority of Voices, it was Reſolved that the Edict ſhould be maintained, (d) And the Prince of la Roche-ſur-yon was Commiſſioned to Publiſh it in Parliament with Expreſs Orders, that if they ſhould refuſe or delay to do it, he ſhould cauſe it to be Publiſhed without a Judicial Form, aſſiſted only with ſome particular Councellors, ſuch as he could chuſe. This Commiſſion was violent; but he being a Wiſe Prince, Executed it very gently, declaring that the King's Intention was Founded on the Neceſſity of the Time; that the Court of Parliament might eaſily know what paſſed before their Eyes in the City of Paris, but they were not informed of the Complaints that came daily to the King and Council from all Parts of the Kingdom; inſiſting them to give their Reſolution briefly, and without any long Diſcourſe by Yea, or No. Hereupon it was by common Conſent reſolved that all thoſe who had aſſiſted at the Council of St. Germains, ſhould have a deliberative Voice in that Matter as well as others: So that at laſt it was Ordained that the Edict ſhould Paſs. 'Tis true that in the Execution, they ſufficiently Declared, that it was but a forced Conſent: Becauſe on Friday the 26th. of March an extraordinary Reading Day, it was confirmed with all the Demonſtrations of Conſtraint; foraſmuch as with the Edict were Publiſhed all the Fuſions of the King, which was not uſed to be done in ſuch Publications. Beſides, the Attorney-General required nothing Publickly, but only Declared that he had given his Concluſions in Writing. And therefore it was Ordered by the Court, that upon the back of the Letters it ſhould be put, that they had been Read, Publiſhed, and Regiſtred, after having heard the King's Attorney-General, without Approbation however of the New Religion; all by way of Proviſion, and till it ſhould be otherwiſe Ordered by the King. Thus it was this Edict paſſed in Paris. This has ſome Connexion with the Hiſtory of Mr. de l' Hoſpital, and contains ſome particular Circumſtances, which are not to be found in the General Hiſtory; and therefore the Reader will have reaſon to take it kindly that I have related them.

Mr. Couſin (l) ſhewed his Diſpleaſure at that Injuſtice and Outrageouſneſs of Raynaldus, and has related a fine Paſſage of the Letter, which our Chancellor wrote to Pius IV. the 29th. of September tember 1562. Father Paul (a) tells us that this Pope found the Oration Heretical in many Points, which that Chancellor had made in the Conference of Poiſſi. He adds, that the ſame Pope threatned to have him Cited before the Inquiſition, and that the Court of Rome, where the Copies of this Diſcourſe were ſpread, ſpoke very ill of him, and Conjectured that all the Miniſters of the Kingdom had the ſame Opinion of them: And the Embaſſador of France had much ado to defend himſelf. Note that Pius IV. having Determined to give the King of France an hundred thouſand Crowns by way of Donation, and to lend him as many more, Stipulated amongſt other things, that the Chancellor, the Biſhop of Valence and ſome others that he ſhould name, ſhould be Impriſoned (b). I will here add a Paſſage of a Letter, which the Cardinal Legate Hippolytus d'Eſt wrote to the Pope the 14th. of June 1562. 'Tis Dated from Bois de Vincennes. (c) 'Tis not one of the leaſt difficulties to diſlodge from the Court the Chancellor, and many other dignified Perſons, as your Holineſs deſires; for you put in this Number both Hereticks, and thoſe that are ſuſpected of Hereſy: But if all the latter were to be Baniſhed the Court, it would doubtleſs be deſerted, theſe new Opinions having already made ſuch an impreſſion on the Minds of the Courtiers, that there are few that have not ſome little Tincture of them——But to return to the moſt Factious of the Court, your Holineſs is not Ignorant how hard a Matter it was to get the Chaſtillons removed——But as to the removing of the Chancellor (i) 'tis quite another thing: For beſides that, he is in a Poſt that will not permit him to be abſent from Court, but upon moſt important Reaſons; he cannot either be deprived of his Imployment, but by the Expreſs Order of the King, or for ſome great Fault, if he had committed any; nor can it be reaſonably ſaid, that he has deſerved Death, unleſs it be proved by unqueſtionable Arguments. Now to think to bring an Accuſation againſt him to put him upon his Tryal, is a thing that cannot be done without a great deal of Time. Beſides, ſuch a Proceſs againſt him would doubtleſs be ill Grounded, ſince he is ſeen commonly to go to Maſs, to Confeſſion, and Communion, ſo that he could not be Convicted of being no Catholick. The Letter he wrote the next Day to Cardinal Borromeo, ſhews, that Catherine de Medicis (d) did not take well the Propoſals of removing ſome Perſons; and that ſhe was more Angry, than before, when he named to her particularly the Chancellor, according to the Expreſs Order he had received from Pius IV. Whence it appears that Varillas is in a great Error in ſaying that the Triumviri (e) obliged Mr. de l'Hoſpital to retire, and that the Queen Sacrificed him to them. He will have this pretended Retreat to have Preceded the Declaration of the ſeventh of April 1562. and that it laſted (f) all the firſt War. This is Contradicted as well by the ſilence of other Hiſtorians, as by the Letters of the Legate Dated the fifteenth of June, and the eighth of July 1562. (g).

They were not miſtaken in believing that Mr. de l'Hoſpital approved in his Heart the Doctrine of the Proteſtants. Catherine de Medicis did not ſpeak falſe in all the Diſcourſe that Mezerai Reports. (h) 'She employed all her Induſtry to undermine the 'Credit that he had gotten in the Mind of the 'young King; to whom ſhe taught her Confidents 'to ſay, that undoubtedly he was a favourer of 'Hereticks, that his Wife, his Daughter; his 'Son-in-Law, and all his Family, being of that 'Religion, there was no doubt but that he was of 'the ſame at the bottom, and that it was only the 'fear of loſing his Place, that hinder'd him from 'publickly Profeſſing Calviniſm. Therefore as 'ſecret Enemies are more dangerous than open ones, 'he was much more to be feared than the Admiral; 'and that his Majeſty ought not to ſuffer him to 'Poiſon his whole Council with theſe fine Maxims 'of Peace, under which, as under the Skin of a 'Serpent, Variegated with Colours moſt agreeable 'to the Sight, was concealed a moſt pernicious 'Venom; which by flattering, was Mortal. She had no reaſon to ſay that Mr. de l'Hoſpital was a dangerous Enemy; for if he favoured the Proteſtants, it was not by any Diſloyal Artifices, but by Maxims moſt conformable to the Good of the State, and the Service of the King. (i) The Integrity of his Morals, his Experience and his Wiſdom in the Management of Affairs were acknowledged by all the World: As alſo his inviolable Affection for the good of the State, the preſervation of the Laws, and the eaſe of the People, and his conſtant Courage in opening the Injuſtice of Great Men, were highly cried up by good People. Catherine de Medicis ſpoke a Truth, when ſhe ſaid the Chancellor's Family were (k) Proteſtants. Now this is a good Argument, that he diſapproved the Doctrines of the Church of Rome. In the Icones of Theodorus Beza, he was Painted with a Candle Lighted behind him, to ſignify, ſays Spondanus (l), that he carried a Torch to Light others with, and not himſelf. The Diſcourſe which attends that Picture, teaches us, that two Reaſons obliged him to wave his publick Profeſſion of the Truth. He feared he ſhould be deprived of means to ſerve the good Cauſe, and he hoped the time would come when there ſhould be no more occaſion to Diſſemble. He vainly expected that Conjuncture, and afterwards having reſolv'd to declare himſelf, he could not Execute his Reſolution. He Sacrificed himſelf for others. Beza Expreſſes this very well. (m) Huic——ad juſtum laudis cumulum id videtur defuiſſe, quod partim ne ſibi ad pios juvandos aditum præſtrueret, ſi veram religionem aperte profiteretur, partim vana quadam expectatione deluſus, eo luto ex quo erutos omnes optabat, penitus extricare ſeſe quum diu neglexiſſet, poſtea volens id præſtare non potuit. Sed ecquis illius memoriam non celebrarit, qui, ut aliis conſuleret, ſeipſum tamdiu penè neglexit? His Will is a Proof that he was no Papiſt in his Heart: there was no mention in it of the Maſs, or Purgatory or Prieſt, or any thing like it; and he obſerves in it (n) that Chriſtians have no great eſteem for Funerals and Burials. Spondanus pretends (o) that 'tis the Language of a Profane Perſon; and Maimbourg (p) ſays that theſe Words are unworthy of a Chriſtian. Genebrard inveighed againſt theſe Words in the Funeral Sermon of Peter Danes. Note that it was ſaid that Mr. de l'Hoſpital had a Hand in the Enterprize of Amboiſe. Conſider well theſe Words of d'Ambigne: (q) Chancellor Olivier Dying at that time in the manner before mentioned, l'Hoſpital, a Man of great Eſteem, ſucceeded him, tho' he had been one of the Conſpiracy, in the buſineſs of Amboiſe. Which I maintain againſt all that has been Written againſt it, becauſe the Original of the Enterprize was Conſigned into my Father's Hands, in which was his Name at length, betwixt that of Andelot and one Spifame: A thing I have ſhewn to many People of Note. Mezerai Confutes this by a very weak Reaſon; Which is, ſays he (r), that l'Hoſpital had left France in the Month of November. But did not he know how many Journies la Renaudie cauſed to be made? Was it ſo hard for him to diſpatch one of the Accomplices to Mr. de l'Hoſpital in Piedmont? However it be I am perſuaded that if he Signed that Conſpiracy, he was only ſhewn the beſt ſide of it, and that he did not expect it ſhould be Executed as it was.

bad ſign to be thought proper for that great Employment. An honeſt Man was not what thoſe who had then the Management of Affairs wanted. Let us obſerve that Mr. de l' Hoſpital was nevertheleſs the Author (I) of excellent Laws, and that he neither flattered the Subjects nor the Prince. He was very Zealous to Maintain and Confirm the Royal Majeſty and Authority, and he well knew how by the Gravity of his Cenſures (K) to make the Parliaments ſenſible of their being in the wrong to Diſobey their King; but on the other Hand, he took care that the Prince ſhould obey

I can't forbear putting down two Obſervations in this Place, which I find in an Anonymous Piece, which is excellent. They inform us of the Cauſes of this Chancellor's Diſgrace. I don't think, ſays that unknown Author, (a) 'That a great Mini-'ſter who is Employed in the great Affairs of his 'Prince, ought to hold his Tongue, whatever may 'happen; Otherwiſe he may be the cauſe of his 'Maſter's Ruin, as well by his Silence as others are 'by their Conſpiracies and Undertakings. 'Tis for 'this Reaſon that I can't be of their Opinion, who 'think that Chancellor de l' Hoſpital needed not 'inſiſt ſo much againſt the Reſolution which had 'been taken againſt the prudent Advice of the 'late Conſtable, to cauſe the King to go away at 'the beginning of the ſecond Troubles. For ſince 'that Wiſe and Prudent Miniſter judged, and that 'very well too, as the Event ſhewed, that ſuch a 'ſudden departure, if put into Execution, would 'undoubtedly prevent a Reconciliation, and bring 'things to Extremity; it is certain that if he had 'concealed his Opinion, and had not inſiſted upon 'it as he did, He would have been guilty of a 'baſeneſs, unworthy of a Man whoſe Virtue alone 'had raiſed him to that Dignity. For tho' ever 'ſince he has been Declining, and his Enemies, 'that is to ſay, the Enemies of his Virtue, Inte-'grity and Sincerity, began from that time to 'think of Removing him; it was not a Reaſon for 'him to be wanting to his Duty, ſince the end of 'thoſe who have the Honour to be Employed in 'ſuch Poſts, ought not to be to maintain them-'ſelves in them, to the Prejudice of their Honour 'and Conſcience, but to ſerve well and faithfully. 'Beſides, things taking the Courſe which they took 'afterwards, a Great Man of good Principles and 'Courage, as this worthy Chancellor was, ought 'to be very well ſatisfied to be Diſmiſſed——(b) 'A good Miniſter and truly Virtuous——will 'never give his Advice contrary to his Judgment, 'and when he is Commanded to ſpeak and give his 'Opinion, he will do it with Fidelity and Courage. 'This is what the ſame Chancellor did, about the 'Queſtion concerning the Bulls, which permitted 'the Sale of Church Lands, amounting to the Re-'venue of an hundred and fifty thouſand Livres, 'for the Extirpation of Hereticks. That Clauſe 'was contrary to the Edicts of Pacification, the 'upholding of which the Chancellor judged ne-'ceſſary for the good of the Kingdom: Beſides, 'thoſe Edicts having been granted in a Solemn 'manner, he was of Opinion that they could not 'be Infringed, and that it was one of the Effects of 'the League which was then Contriving; and 'therefore he propoſed his Opinion, which was 'followed, viz. to obtain new Bulls, without that 'Clauſe, which was the laſt Stumbling-block, 'and the Reaſon which was urged to render this 'great Man ſuſpected of Herely, and to take away 'the Seals from him, and put them into the Hands 'of a Man whom they thought more proper for 'the time, and ſoon after every thing was 'ready for War.

(I) Was the Author of excellent Laws.] Stephen Paſquier ſupplies me with this Reflection; theſe are his Words: (c) 'We have ſeen in our time, a 'young King Charles IX. in France, who by 'Reaſon of the infirmity of his Youth in the be-'ginning, and afterwards by the extraordinary 'Violence of his Temper, had no Leiſure to make 'Laws; nevertheleſs none of his Predeceſſors made 'ſo many good Edicts as he: Witneſs that of 1560. 'in the States held in the Town of Orleans, the 'other that he made at Rouſſillon in the Year 1563, 'and the laſt at Moulins in the Year 1566. Thoſe 'three Edicts containing abundance of Articles in 'Matter of Civil Government, and fine Regulations, 'infinitely exceeding our Antient Ordinances. To 'whom are we Indebted for this Advantage? To 'no other than to Michael de l' Hoſpital, his Great 'and Wiſe Chancellor, who under the Authority 'of the young King his Maſter, was the principal 'Mediator of the firſt, and the Inſtigator, Promoter 'and Author of the two others. And I wiſh with 'all my Heart, that they had been always obſerved 'with the ſame Zeal as they were introduced. I wonder that Paſquier does not ſpeak of the excel-lent Edicts Mr. de l' Hoſpital procured under Francis II. A Hiſtorian (d) of that time reckons three, which were extraordinary good and whole-ſom. I am going to ſhew in what the firſt conſiſted; 'twas that which Regulated the Wills, or the Donations of Widows, who quickly Married a-gain. I will make uſe of the Words of an Author of that Age. (e) It was at the Solicitation of Chan-cellor de l' Hoſpital, that many Ordinances, Edicts and Statutes were made and Publiſhed by our Kings of France for the Relief of the People, and the Pre-ſervation of Juſtice. Amongſt others, we have an Edict of King Francis II. which gives a Check to ſecond Marriages, by taking away the Liberty they had who Married again to give more to the ſecond Husband, than to one of the Children of the firſt. The occaſion of this Edict was this: it happened that a Woman of this Kingdom extreamly Rich, fell in Love with a young Lord, who becauſe ſhe ſeemed too old for him, had no Inclination to make her his Wife. She found her ſelf ſo Extravagantly in Love, that underſtand-ing how greedy he was of Money, ſhe made him a Donation of all her Eſtate, reſerving only what might belong to her firſt Children, as a Lawful Portion. So that for a ſmall matter, they were deprived as it were of their Mother's Inheritance, which was Transferred to a ſecond Huſband. To prevent ſuch Defraudations, this Chancellor brought into France the Ordinance of the Emperor Leo, which is mentioned in the Law hac Edictali. 6. tit. de ſecund. nupt. in the fifth Book of Juſtinian's Code, which forbids giving or leaving to the ſecond Huſband more than to one of the Children of the firſt Marriage. It was very juſt and neceſſary to renew this Law for the Intereſt of the Children of the firſt Husband; for there are but too many Women, who deſiring to be Married again, would deprive them of their Rights, to make themſelves more agreeable to their new Husband. They would ſup-ply by their Liberalities, what Age has taken from their Charms; beſides, the liberty of diſpoſing of their Eſtates would expoſe them to Pretenders, who without it would never have diſturbed the Reſolu-tion they might have taken, to Edify their Neigh-bours by a Virtuous Widowhood.

obey Justice and Reason. He opposed as much as possible unjust Edicts. And if after much give an Account of it. The first fault is your Disobedience to your King. For altho' his Ordinances are presented to you, you observe them as you please: If you have any Remonstrances to make, make them assoon as you will, and he'll hear 'em. You Rob him of his Royal Power, when you will not obey his Royal Ordinances, which is worse than to Rob him of his Crown Lands. I am acquainted that the Ordinance made at the Request of the States, is not yet Published here. And, Addressing himself to the Presidents, and the King's Council, he said, I will now speak to you, that are Presidents and the King's Council, who ought to require and follicite the Publication of his Edicts and Ordinances; and you Presidents, you ought to propose them, for you are the King's Presidents in the Court. I have also notice, said he, that the Ordinance about Justice is not Published. I remember likewise some others, which I will not speak of, not to be too long: I think, said he, that you fancy your selves wiser than the King, but your Wisdom is Limited to judge of Tryals; don't think you selves Wiser than the King, and the Queen and his Council. He has obtained Peace, and at present there is a War betwixt him and the Court of Parliament—— (c) You despise the Queen and the King's Council. I see that you so much Value your own Decrees as to set 'em above Ordinances, which when you have received, you Interpret as you please: 'Tis not your business but the King's, to Interpret an Ordinance, even the Ordinances that concern the Publick Welfare. I omit the Sequel of his Discourse, which is still more thundering than what we have seen. Note, that this is but a Commentary on what the King had said in few Words to this Parliament; (f) That he would for the future be better Obeyed than he had been; that he would not suffer any of his Subjects to take up Arms without his leave, and that he would have his Edicts observed. There's no doubt but Mr. de l' Hospital suggested this Discourse to him, as also the vigorous Declaration made by the same Prince some time before, to the Deputies of the Parliament of Paris. They had made Remonstrances to him about the Edict of his Majority, which they had not Registered. (g) 'The King whose Voice 'and Countenance shewed a studied Severity, An- 'swered them, that they were to obey, that they 'should meddle no more with Publick Affairs, and 'that they should rid themselves of this old Error, 'That they were the King's Tutors, the Defenders 'of the Kingdom, and the Guardians of the City of 'Paris. The Deputies having made their Report 'to the Court, it was divided, and they made a new Deputation to the King, (h) who Ordered that the Edict should be Published and Registered without delay, and that all the Presidents and Councellors should be present at it, upon pain of Interdiction. 'Tis easy to perceive, considering the King's Age, that he in that case only repeated the Lesson of Mr. de l' Hospital. (i) 'He once made a Speech to the Parlia- 'ment, when they would not pass some of his E- 'dicts——and complaining of his Court of 'Justice, and of the Corruption that was in it, and 'of the refusal of his Edicts; 'tis your business 'said he, with a brave and menacing boldness, to 'obey any Ordinances, without Disputing and Con- 'testing about them; for I know better than you, 'what is proper and convenient for the Advantage 'and Interest of my Kingdom. Having as yet no 'Beard, he held this Discourse before those Old 'and Wise Heads, who all Marvelled at his Bold- 'ness and Gravity, which favoured more of his 'generous Courage, than of the Lessons of Mr. A- 'miot his Preceptor. Brantome should have added that this Discourse was the Lesson of Michael de l' Hospital. The Prince, who had already disgraced him (a), well remembered the Instructions he had received from his Chancellor, that it concerned him to Humble the boldness of the Parliament of Paris, so Pernicious at that time to all the Kingdom.

In this place I ought to examine in a few Words the Discourse we daily hear, which lays down as a Principle of Misery, the Suppression of the Right, which was heretofore in Parliaments of rejecting the Edicts, that appeared unjust to 'em. This was a Bank, say they, which kept the People from being Drowned under the Arbitrary Power of the Monarch. The breaking of this Bank ought to be compared to the Blow by which Æolus stooped the Mountain, which served for a Prison to the Winds.

They imbellish this with many Maxims, which have a great appearance of Solidity; but they never go farther, they never turn the Tables, nor consult Experience, nor Examine whether any one could Answer, I Appeal to Practice. Now this is the weak side; for it's easy to prove, that France was never so Desolate and Miserable as when the Parliaments enjoyed the full Authority of Rejecting the Edicts and Ordinances of the Prince, under Charles IX. and Henry III. 'Tis easy to prove also that the Exercise of that Authority, was the main cause of the Miseries of the Kingdom from the year 1562. to 1594. Our Chancellor had laid the Foundations of the Publick Peace by the Edict of the Month of January. The Church of Rome had no longer reason to fear the danger I have mentioned above (c); the King of Navarre had Deserted the Huguenots; Catherine de Medicis thought no longer to pull off the Mask. They had been contented to have had their fill of Preaching; and so the Kingdom would have remained in Peace, provided the Edict of January had been observed. But the Catholicks infringed it, and from hence proceeded the first War of Religion, the Root of all the Evils that Afflicted the State, till the extinction of the League; for all those Evils were grafted upon, or sprung from one another, by a well Connected train of Causes and Effects (d). Now to what must the Infraction of this Edict of January be principally Ascribed, but to the Parliament of Paris? Did not they Encourage every Body to the Non-observance of it? They did not Register it (e) but by defaming it, that is to say, not till after three Commands, and with such Restrictions and Clauses, as plainly shewed that it was Registered by Force, and as a very Transient and very Mischievous Order? Who would have feared after this, to violate such an Edict, when they could not but be well assured, that a Parliament who judged in this manner, would never trouble themselves to Punish those that should break it? Now at that time to lend a Hand to the infraction of the Edict, and to sound an Alarm for Civil War, was one and the same thing. Observe well the Words Varillas makes use of in the beginning of his Relation of the Measures that were taken against the Protestants a little before the Massacre of Vassi. The House of Guise, says he (f), judged by the opposition that the Edict of January had met with in the Parliament, that it would not long subsist, and doubted not but that Civil Wars would quickly begin. It may be said in General, that the Parliaments of France by refusing to ratify the Edicts of Ratification, or by Ratifying 'em with an Ill Grace, and then by a Natural Consequence taking no care that they should be observed, have been one of the greatest Causes of those long Calamities that wasted the State, and had like to have ruined the Monarchy Root and Branch. If Charles V. had Reigned at that time, it would infallibly have become a Province of his Dominions, or at least would have been divided into a thousand Pieces.

You only Alledge, will some say, the ill use the Parliaments made of their Right to reject the Edicts of the Prince. But I Answer, are Tyranny and most other Disorders any thing else but an ill use of good Things? It suffices to refute your Reflections, to tell you, that this Bank or Barrier you speak of, and which properly speaking, includes this Contradiction, that a State is, and is not Monarchical, can't be thought a good Remedy, since it has done much more harm than good. What Comparison is there between the Advantages that accrued from the Rejection (g) of some Pecuniary Edicts, and the deplorable Misery of the Kingdom for thirty years to-all he was obliged (L) to Seal 'em, he ſhewed that it was againſt his Will. One of the Occaſions in which he diſcovered the great Preſence of his Mind, was when the demands of the Engliſh Embaſſadors were Examined in the King's Council concerning the Reſtitution of Calais. together? Theſe Calamities are much leſs to be imputed to the Court, than to the Parliaments. The Court was grown Wiſe by the Inſtructions of a moſt skilful and moſt virtuous Chancellor. Mr. de l'Hoſpital had induced it to prevent, by the Edict of January, all Misfortunes, and to cut off the Root of Civil Wars. The Parliament, inſtead of ſeconding him, oppoſed him, and diſappointed the Remedy he had found; a Remedy which could not chuſe but be good, ſince (b) there was no other. The Court would have walked in the Road the Chancellor had marked out, and yet left it, by Reaſon of the Confuſions into which the Kingdom fell, through their Fault who diſobeyed the Edict; and 'twas the Parliaments that open'd a wide Path to this Diſobedience. They therefore are reſponſible for ſo many Churches profan'd, plunder'd, overturned, of which ſome are pleas'd to give long Lifts to render the Huguenots odious. Nor was it their fault, that the Miſeries of the State were not perpetual, even after the Deſtruction of the League. They oppoſed the Edict of Nantes, the only Remedy for Inteſtine Confuſions: The Parliament of Paris would never have ratifyed it, if Henry IV. had not made uſe of Intreaties; (i) but in a Tone, that ſhewed he knew how to make himſelf obeyed. Note, that the Speech (k) of Mr. de l'Hoſpital to the Parliament of Bourdeaux, ſhews that at that time, when ſo little account was made of the King's Ordinances, the Adminiſtration of Juſtice was horribly corrupted, and full of hideous Diſorders. I will conclude with ſaying, that the Government of the People is ſuch a confounded thing, that the Remedies which ſeem beſt, are ſometimes worſe than the Diſeaſe, and the cauſe of the greateſt Miſchiefs. I am going to give a great Inſtance of it.

A REFLECTION upon what is said by so many People, that the Interest of the Kingdom of France requires, that the Parliaments should have more Authority than they have.

(L) If——he was obliged to ſeal 'em, he ſhewed that it was againſt his Will.] A Miniſter of State, and eſpecially the Chancellor of a Monarch, ought to do two Things, if he would well diſcharge his Duties. One is earneſtly to recommend Submiſſion and Obedience to all the Subjects; he ought not to ſpeak to 'em of any thing elſe; he muſt not ſtand arguing with 'em, whether they have ſometimes right to take up Arms, or to refuſe Obedience to the Ordinances that they think unjuſt and burdenſome. He muſt ſuppoſe as an inconteſtable Point, that they have not that Right. The other thing which he ought to do, is to repreſent livelily, and inceſſantly to the Prince, that the Royal Authority does not diſpenſe with an abſolute Submiſſion to Juſtice, and that it has no Right or Privilege to depart from Reaſon, Equity, and Promiſes, &c. Mr. de l'Hoſpital punctually acquitted himſelf of both theſe Duties. He took the part of the King before the Subjects, and the part of the Subjects before the King. He repreſſed with great Vehemence, thoſe who made any Attempt upon the Royal Authority. See (l) the Cenſures that he made, or that the King made to the Parliaments, according to his Advice. See alſo (m) what he anſwered to the Deputy of the Parliament of Dijon. But you will now ſee with what Integrity, with what Conſtancy, he reſiſted the unjuſt Propoſals which were ſuggeſted to the Prince. He withſtood them by his Arguments, as far as was poſſible; and if his Remonſtrances did not hinder the Concluſion of the Affair, he ſhewed that he had no ways conſented to it. (n) Ah, SIR, what a foul and venomous Tale is it in an Edict, when the Ratification of it is decreed with theſe Words, by the expreſs Command of the King, often times repeated, which only produce a Condemnation from the wiſe and good, againſt the Injuſtice of it, ſupported only by the Commands, which the Chancellors are frequently forced to ſeal againſt their Advice, in which are ſeen theſe odious and ſhameful Words: Notwithſtanding all the Remonſtrances made and to be made, which we hold for heard and underſtood, and for which we will not have it delayed. That is to ſay, in ſpite of Reaſon, by a malignant Counſel, an unjuſt Will, and a raſh Determination; by the rebuke of Virtue, the Toleration of Evil, and the Hatred of Honour, and by an affected Ignorance, and the Contempt of good Things. Wherefore, not to participate of that Shame, the good and moſt worthy Chancellor de l'Hoſpital, commonly wrote theſe Words with his own Hand upon the back of the Letters, Me non conſentiente, that is to ſay, I have been forced to ſeal them againſt my Advice; as he did to the Letters about the Reception of the Power of the Cardinal of Ferrara, ſent Legate (1) into France by Pope Pius IV. and the Court of Parliament reading theſe Words indorſed by the Chancellor, joined with him, and would never ratify that Power. Preſident de la Place will inform us more particularly of what concerns this laſt Paſſage. (a) 'Now for 'as much as amongſt other Articles decreed in the 'States, it was ordered, that the Benefices of the 'Kingdom ſhould be conferred by the Ordinaries, in 'every Diocels, and not by the Pope, and that no 'Diſpenſations ſhould be received; there was great 'Difficulty in admitting the Power of the ſaid Le'gate: The Chancellor remonſtrating, that he 'could do nothing againſt what had been ſo lately 'reſolved and concluded by the ſaid States. But 'notwithſtanding, the ſaid Legate giving to under'ſtand, that he being related to the Houſe of France, 'it would be a great Reproach and Diſhonour to him, 'to be the firſt Legate refuſed in it, and offering not 'to uſe the ſaid Power, and to return immediately 'after the Ratification of it, the Chancellor was 'commanded to ſeal the Letters; which he did after 'many Alterations betwixt the Legate and himſelf, 'writing with his own Hand under the Seal of the 'Letters, theſe Words, Me non conſentiente, that 'is, not with my Conſent: which being ſeen by 'the ſaid Court, were refus'd, ſaying they could not, 'and ought not receive them. Some Hiſtorians ſay, (b) that at laſt the Legate, in ſpite of the Chancellor's Advice, got his Powers received in the Council of State; in which he was allowed a Place. Every one knows the Tranſcendent Power of the Guiſes, under Francis II. yet they were not able to make the Chancellor ſtoop. He was the only (c) one that refuſed to ſign the Warrant of the Prince of Conde's Death.

(M) The Artifices of a Secretary, who was an ill Man.] I will relate upon this, what I have read in a Book, intituled, The Fortune of the Court. 'Chan-'cellor de l'Hoſpital was blamed (d) for that being 'naturally very ſevere in expediting Juſtice, and 'ſtern to thoſe that came to ſpeak to him; yet he 'was otherwiſe with reſpect to his Domeſticks, 'and eſpecially to his Secretary Bonvant, who put 'upon him as often as he pleaſed; which he con-'tinued to do, till a Complaint was brought to the 'Council, on occaſion of a very incivil Letter: The 'Chancellor was aſhamed to be ſo over-reach'd, and 'was obliged to turn out a Servant whom he had 'loved very well before, with a Thouſand Reproach-'es. The Author tells another thing, which has no reference to my Text, yet I'll tranſcribe it, being a remarkable Paſſage. (e) 'He was in like man-'ner ſeverely reprimanded by the late Mr. de Mont-'penſier, in full Council, for that being almoſt in-'exorable to paſs the Grants which the King made 'of no great Sums, yet he had ſome Days before 'received from the Treaſurer Fifty Thouſand Li-'vres; and he was miſerably reproach'd for it, 'though it was certain that the King himſelf of his 'own Motion had preſs'd him to take them.

'And as to the Likeneſs, (ſays he) (g), which 'Beza feigns, betwixt Ariſtotle and our Chancellor; 'if he takes it from the Features and Lineaments 'of the Face, there's no Man that compares the 'Picture that I have given of Ariſtotle, with that 'of the Chancellor, which he has got drawn to the 'Life, but will diſcover at firſt Sight, that there 'is a great Difference. But Stephen Forcadel gives us ſome Circumſtances, which make for Beza. He ſays, that as Charles XI. was viſiting the Towns of his Kingdom, a Statue was dug up, bearing the Name of Ariſtotle, which perfectly reſembled Michael de l'Hoſpital. He adds, that he made Verſes upon it, which pleaſed the Chancellor. Thuanus (i) confirms what Beza ſays. Note, That Brantome ſpeaks of another Reſemblance: 'Chancellor de l'Hoſpital, (ſays he) (k), had all over 'Cato's Mien, a great White Beard, a pale Face, 'a grave Countenance; ſo that one would have ſaid 'upon the Sight of him, that he was the true Pi-'cture of St. Jerome. So many ſaid at Court.

(O) Some attribute to him the Compariſon of the Apes, and probably they ——give to one what belongs to another.] They transfer to our Chancellor a Thought of his Predeceſſor. Read theſe Words of Montagne: '(l) I have found the ſhorteſt and 'eaſieſt way ——to rid my ſelf of this Deſire, 'and to ſit ſtill ——judging impartially of my 'Strength, that it was not capable of great Things. 'And remembring that Saying of the late Chan-'cellor Olivier, that the French ſeem to be Apes, 'who go leaping up a Tree from Branch to Branch, 'and never leave off, till they are come to the top-'moſt Bough, there ſhew their Breech when they are 'there. Mr. Menage (m) cites theſe Words of Montagne, having firſt repeated ſome Greek Verſes (n), in which Scaliger made uſe of the ſame Thought againſt Lydiat, and the Latin Verſes which Salmaſius made againſt Petavius, which turn upon the ſame Compariſon. Coſtar intimates that Chancellor Olivier ſpoke thus in a Speech, which I can hardly believe. 'Chancellor Olivier, ſays he (o), 'made no Scruple publickly to compare the French 'to Apes, who leap from Branch to Branch, and 'ſhew their Breech when they are at the top of the 'Tree. I will ſhew, that an Advocate in the Par-liament of Paris, aſcribes that Compariſon to Chancellor de l'Hoſpital. This Advocate is little known, but by the Name of * Gutherius, which may be tranſlated Five or Six different Ways, without departing from the Analogy, by which the French have latinized their Names. This by the Way. The thing is this. (p) Sæpe ego audivi à ſoris noſtri principibus viris, Michaëlem Hoſpitalium Franciæ Cancellarium, cui nulla ætas habuit parem, ſolitum dicere, multos, qui ad honores à fortuna pelluntur, ſimiarum eſſe ſimillimos, quæ altiorem arborem naſcæ, eoſque conſcendunt, ut cum ad ſummum arboris faſtigium evaſerint, foliis vento ſtridentibus operta tota poſteriora tantùm prætereuntibus riduculè oſtentant. There are a Thouſand Inſtances that prove, that the ſame Thought is aſcribed to different Perſons. I'll only cite one which has ſome Affinity with the Reign, under which M. de l'Hoſpital was Chancellor. Mr. Villeroy (a) 'was told one Day, that he was the 'fitteſt Man to write the Hiſtory of Charles IX. 'as having had a hand in every thing, and for that 'Reaſon, that he ought to write it. I am too much 'obliged, anſwered he, to that Prince, and I love 'his Memory too well to write his Hiſtory, meaning 'that the Truths he ſhould be obliged to relate, 'would diſgrace the King. This is what is ſaid by the Author of the Book, intituled, de la Fatalité de St. Clou; but M. le Laboureur (b) relates this as Morvillier's Anſwer. And I had rather follow this laſt Tradition.

He made his only Daughter his Heireſs, whom he had married to Robert Hurault, and he left his Library to Michael Hurault, the Second of his Grandſons, who has been well known by the Name of (R) Mr. Du Fay. I might have added a great many more Things; but I have omitted them, becauſe they may be found in Moreri, or in the Additions of Mr. Teiſſier to the Elogies of Thuanus, or in Thevet's Elogies, or Brantome's Memoirs. The latter, who was a Man of the Sword, has ſucceeded better in the † Praiſes of the Chancellor, than all the Writers that I have read; tho' I confeſs, that Thuanus and Scævola de Ste Marthe have praiſed him very well. Ronſard's Ode [a] deſigned as an Elogy upon this Principal Officer of Juſtice, has been looked upon as an excellent one; but in certain Reſpects I find nothing that comes up to Brantome's Deſcription. It ſhews Mr. de l'Hoſpital to have been a Man that might be oppoſed to the greateſt and moſt eminent Men of the Gown in ancient Greece and Rome. I cite in my Remarks ſo many other Paſſages, that, not to be too tedious, I wave what Brantome has written. I only intreat my Readers to conſider two Things: The firſt is, what he obſerves, upon the Diſpute which the Chancellor maintained with the utmoſt Reſolution, againſt the Cardinal of Lorrain, who demanded that the Council of Trent ſhould be received: The other concerns the Undauntedneſs that Mr. de l'Hoſpital expreſs'd [b] after the Paris Maſſacre, when he had reaſon to fear, that the Murtherers had received Orders to do Execution in his Houſe. I will add this one thing more. A famous Author, having defined the Force of the Soul to be 'a certain Temper and Diſpoſition of Mind, always equal in it ſelf, conſtant, ſtable, Heroick, able to ſee, to hear, and do all things without Diſturbance, Confuſion, and Aſtoniſhment, adds, that 'tis much in the ſame manner Juvenal deſcribed it in Six fine [c] Verſes of his Xth. Satyr. Chancellor de l'Hoſpital, (he goes on †), 'who was furniſhed with this Strength of Mind, as much as any that went before, or came after him, deſcribed it ſtill more briefly, though in much bolder Words, out of which he had compoſed his Device; * Si fractus illabatur orbis, Impavidum ferient ruinæ. See the Margin †. Shall I forget the Services which he did even after his Death? Is it not juſt to obſerve, that the State Maxims by which he regulated his Conduct, were of very great uſe to France, becauſe he left ſome Diſciples, imbued with his Wiſe Principles, who in due time (S) oppoſed the Leaguers, and rendred their pernicious Enterpriſes Abortive?

upon him, and of the Miſeries which France was plunged into, he adds: (f) 'I gave place to Arms, 'which were too ſtrong, and retired into the 'Country with my Wife and Family, and little 'Children, begging but one thing of the King and 'Queen at my Departure: That ſince they had determined to break the Peace, and to proſecute 'thoſe with War, with whom they had concluded 'a Peace but a little before, and ſince they removed 'me from the Court, becauſe they underſtood I was always contrary, and had an ill Opinion of their 'Deſign: I requeſted them, I ſay, that ſince they 'did not acquieſce in my Counſels, yet at leaſt, 'when they had ſatiated and glutted their Heart and 'their Thirſt with the Blood of their Subjects, they 'would embrace the firſt Occaſion of Peace that 'ſhould offer it ſelf, before things were reduced to 'extream Ruin; for whatever might be the Iſſue 'of that War, it muſt neceſſarily be very pernicious to the King and the Kingdom.

(Q) About Sixty Eight Years of Age.] He begins his Will thus: '(g) I have always been in doubt 'concerning my Age, becauſe my Friends ſaid they 'have heard my Father (i) ſpeak variouſly about 'it, who ſometimes ſaid that I was born before the 'War began againſt the Genoeſe, and at other times 'maintained, that my Birth was dated from the 'end which King Lewis XII. put to that War, 'in which my Father was employed as a Phyſician 'to Charles Duke of Bourbon. It would be no wonder, that a groſs and ignorant Clown ſhould not know the Age of his Son, and yet this happens but rarely; but 'tis very ſtrange, that a Man of Parts and Learning, as was the Father of Michael de l'Hoſpital, ſhould ſo vary about it, and that not by a Day or a Week, but by many Months. His Son declares, that he (h) was Eighteen Years old when the Conſtable Bourbon (i) left France; he believed therefore he was born in the Year 1505. Note, that the War of Lewis XII. againſt the Genoeſe, was terminated in April 1507. Brantome who has inſerted in his Memoirs (k) the Chancellor's Will, does not forget the Preface (l) in which witneſſes, that the Teſtator was 68 Years of Age. The Date of the Will is (m) the third Day of March 1573. This is ſtill to place his Birth in the Year 1505. If (n) Thuanus, and Scævola de ste Marthe (o) had conſidered theſe Things, they would not have ſaid that Michael de l'Hoſpital lived about Seventy Years.

(R) Who has been very well known by the Name of Mr. du Fay.] We find in his Panegyrick, compoſed by Ste Marthe, that he had a great deal of Wit and Learning, and that he was Chancellor to the King of Navarre, and might have arrived to the Dignity of Chancellor of France, if inſtead of unluckily engaging in a Soldier's Life, he had perſevered in the Functions and Exerciſes of the Gown. We find there alſo, that he died (p) with Diſcontent, for having been forced to quit the Government of Quillebeuf (q), but we don't ſee, that he was actually a Proteſtant. Some have accuſed him of being ready to be one. See the Confeſſion Catholique de Sancy, and the Notes upon it in the Edition of 1699. He wrote a Treatiſe in 1588, intitled (r) le Franc & Libre diſcours, which paſſed for a very good Piece. See the Perroniana, at the Word Fay, and Thuanus's 92d. Book.

(S) He left ſome Perſons imbued with his Wiſe Principles, who in due time oppoſed the League, &c.] An Anonymous Author, whom I have already quoted, furniſhes me with the Commentary that I have occaſion for. He ſays (s) that of the Devotion of a Miniſter or Counſellor to a Prince, is not well-grounded, and his Zeal well regulated, 'tis impoſſible to imagine the Miſchief he may do. Firſt of all, he ſuffers himſelf to be ſurpriſed, and then he himſelf ſurpriſes his Maſter; for in Point of Devotion, the wiſeſt Men are often impoſed upon. Many think that they are very pious and devout, if they are groſſly ignorant of what concerns Religion, and refer themſelves to thoſe whoſe Buſineſs it is to teach it: ſome of whom being practiced upon, lead them a fine Dance. We have ſpoken of the great Miſfortunes into which ſeveral great Princes, who were otherwiſe prudent Men, have fallen for want of underſtanding this Caſe. We'll ſpeak a Word of ſome of their Miniſters ---There were two Sorts of 'em, to thoſe who had been bred up under the Diſcipline of Chancellor l'Hoſpital, kept to the Maxims, which were not only Conſonant to Piety and Chriſtian Moderation, but uſeful for the Preſervation of the Peace, and Maintenance of the King's Authority. The others (on the contrary), whether it was out of Conſcience, without much HOSPITAL (Francis de l') created Mareſchal of † France, the 23d. of April, 1643, was called before that time Mr. du Hallier. Moreri copying Father Anſelme, ſpeaks largely of his Genealogy, and ſhews his Exploits and Dignities; but he does not mention a thing which I have (Y) read in a State of France. I'll give here a Supplement to an Obſervation I have made above, concerning the firſt Wife (Z) of Mareſchal de l'Hoſpital.

HOTOMANUS (Francis) was one of the moſt Learned Civilians of the XVIth. Century. He was born the 23d. of Auguſt, 1524, at Paris, where his Family, (A) originally of Sileſia, flouriſhed ſometime ſince. At Fifteen Years of Age he was ſent to Orleans, there to ſtudy the Civil Law, and he became capable of a Doctor's Degree in three Years. His Father, a Councellor in the Parliament, who had already deſign'd his Employment for him, cauſed him to return Home, and entered him at the Bar; but the young Gentleman was quickly diſguſted with the Wranglings of the Court, and fell deep into the Study of the Roman Law, and Polite Learning. He reliſhed the new Opinions, for which ſo many were put to Death in the Kingdom; and finding, that he could not make Profeſſion of them at Paris, he went to Lyons in the Year 1547, where he publiſhed a Book. 'Twas the Second Work (B) that he put to the Preſs. Seeing that he had nothing to hope for as a Subſiſtence from his Father, he went to Lauſane (C), where the Gentlemen of Bern made him Profeſſor of Philology. He publiſhed ſome Books there, and married a French † Gentlewoman, who had Knowledge, or to make a ſeparate Party, adher'd ſo much to the Externals of Religion, that they thought it better to let the Kingdom fall into a Combuſtion, than to ſuffer the leaſt Accommodation in Matters of Religion. Now what followed from this Diverſity of Opinions, was, that the latter proved very Inſtrumental in forming, raiſing, and fortifying the League, the other in deſtroying it and preſerving the Kingdom, which the contrary Party had brought to the Brink of Deſtruction.

(Y) A thing which I have read in a State of France.] Which is, that Mareſchal de l'Hoſpital (a), 'was originally of Calabria, of a very illuſtrious 'Family, having had many Alliances with the 'Kings and Queens of Naples. But the Love his 'Predeceſſors had for Charles of Anjou, ſecond King 'of Naples, ingaging them in his Intereſt againſt the 'Kings of Arragon and Caſtile, they were forced to 'ſeek a Sanctuary in France, when the Spaniſh Princes 'reſumed the Scepter of that Kingdom. Since Father Anſelm has not mentioned this, he muſt either have not known it, or have judged it uncertain. He begins the Genealogy of that Family (b), with one Francis de l'Hoſpital, who lived in 1314, and 1338, and in another Book (C) he goes no higher than Francis de l'Hoſpital, Chamberlain, &c. to Charles VI. in 1401, and Fifth Grandfather to him, that is the Subject of this Article. Note, that the Author of the Notes upon Gabriel Naude's coups d'Eſtat, is very much out (d) in pretending, that our Mareſchal de l'Hoſpital was deſcended from the Chancellor of the ſame Name.

(Z) Concerning the firſt Wife of Mareſchal de l'Hoſpital.] We have ſeen elſewhere, that he made no ſcruple to marry Charlotte des Eſſars, Mother of many illegitimate Children, ſome of King Henry IV. and others of Cardinal de Guiſe. I forgot when I made that Remark, what I had read in the Notes upon the Amours of Henry the Great. But ſince I now remember it, I muſt give my Readers a new Circumſtance of the Victory Mr. du Hallier obtained over Matrimonial Scruples. You will ſee, that Charlotte des Eſſars was a Baſtard her ſelf, and that after the Death of Cardinal de Guiſe, ſhe was Miſtreſs to another Prelate. (f) Henry IV. 'loved alſo Charlotte des Eſſars, Natural 'Daughter of the Baron de Sautour in Champagne, 'and of the Lady Dheny, by whom he had two 'Daughters. She had attended the Counteſs de 'Beaumont Harlay in her Embaſſie to England; then 'ſhe was Miſtreſs to Cardinal Guiſe, who had many 'Children by her, the Count de Romorantin, the 'Abbot de Chailly, the Chevalier, Madam de 'Rhodes, &c. Afterwards ſhe was Miſtreſs to Mr. 'de l'Ile, Archbiſhop of Auſeb, Three Years; then 'ſhe married Francis de l'Hoſpital, Count de Roſnay, Baron de Beine, Mareſchal of France. Father Anſelm tells us (g), that ſhe married him about the Year 1629, and that her Husband 'married a-'gain the 28th. of Auguſt, 1633, to Frances Mignot, by whom he had a Son, who died a few Days 'after he was born. Moreri obſerves, that the Adventures of this Frances Mignot are very ſingular. This has been left out in the Paris Edition of 1690. Mareſchal de l'Hoſpital's Stars were not fortunate in that reſpect.

(A) His Family Originally of Sileſia.] There are many Families of the Name of Hotman in Breſlaw, the Capital City of Sileſia, from which are deſcended many others, ſettled in Luſatia, in Miſnia, in the Country of Cleves, &c. Lambert HOTMAN (k) went into France to bear Arms in the Service of * Lewis XI. and married advantageouſly at Paris. John HOTMAN his eldeſt Son was ſo rich, that he diſburſed vaſt Sums for (l) the Ranſom of Francis I. Peter HOTMAN, the laſt of Lambert's Eighteen Children, was Maſter of the Waters and Foreſts, and afterwards Counſellor in the Parliament of Paris. Our Francis Hotman was his eldeſt Son (m). The Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary imports, that Henry HOTMAN born at Cleves in the Year 1466. was the firſt of that Name that came into France, and that he came with Engilbert Duke of Cleves, who was the firſt Duke of Nevers.

(B) 'Twas the Second Work which he put to the Preſs.] For he had already publiſhed a little Book de gradibus cognationis, which was much eſteemed. Pene puer libellum de gradibus cognationis adjunctâ diagrammate publicavit à doctiſſimis viris in pretio habitum, & mox à quodam haud ignobili Juriſconſulto probatum, ita ut eum ſuis in Inſtitutiones commentariis vehementer commendatum inſereret (n). His Second Work was a Commentary ad titulum Inſtitutionum de actionibus. The Beauty of the Stile, and the Knowledge of the Roman Antiquities, that ſhined in that Piece, gave him a great Reputation (o). Mr. Teiſſier (p) ſhould not have applied that fine Commendation to the little Book concerning the Degrees of Affinity. Had he more attentively conſulted the Work (q) he quotes, he would not have taken the one for the other.

LA CROIX du Maine will tell you, that the French Tranſlation, which Hotomanus made of Socrates's Apology, written by Plato, was printed in the Year 1549, at Lyons, for Sebaſtian Gryphius, in 8.

(C) He went to Lauſane.] Mr. Teiſſier (a) ſays, that Francis Hotomanus retired to Geneva, and lived ſometime in Calvin's Houſe. I believe he is in the Right, tho' the Life of Hotomanus, which he cites, does not mention it. Nevelet ſeems to have ſuppreſſed a thing, which he ſhould not have omitted. It is not very probable, that the Magiſtrates of Bern ſhould have offer'd a Profeſſor's Chair, in the Academy of Lauſane, to a young Man of Twenty three Years of Age, who lived at Lyons. But 'tis probable, they made this Offer to him, ſuppoſing, that he lived at Geneva, and had got the Love of Calvin. Thus you ſee the want of Exactneſs that is found in the beſt Books; becauſe commonly good Authors are thoſe, who love to ſhorten a Narration. They don't always take Notice, that by this Brevity they ſpoil it. Brevis eſſe laboro, obſcurus fio (b). This might have been the caſe of Nevelet; or we may ſay, had fled thither upon Account of Religion. His Merit was so well Known in all Parts, that the Magistrates of Strasburg offered to make him Professor of the Civil-Law; and whilst he was discharging that Duty, he found himself Courted by the Duke of Prussia, and the Landgrave of Hesse. He did not accept those Invitations; but he did not refuse to go to the Court of the King of Navarre, at the beginning of the Troubles. He went twice into Germany to demand Succours of Ferdinand in the Name of the Princes of the Blood, and even in the Name of the Queen-Mother ‡. We have the Speech he made at the Diet of Francfort. Being returned to Strasburg, he yielded (D) to the Persuasions of John de Monluc, to go and Teach the Civil Law at Valence; which he did so Successfully, as to restore the Reputation of that University. Three years after he went to Profess it at Bourges, being invited thither by Margaret of France, Sister to King Henry II. but five Months after he repaired to Orleans among the Heads of the Party, who made use of his Counsels. The Peace which was made a Month after, did not deliver him from the fear of a new Storm; for which Reason he retired to Sancerre, and there waited for better times. It was there he wrote an excellent Book * de Consolatione. He returned afterwards to his Professorship at Bourges, where he had like to have lost his Life, during the Massacre of the year 1572. Having the good Fortune to escape, he left France, fully resolved to return thither no more, and betook himself to Geneva. He there Read Lectures of Civil-Law, and Published some Books with that strength (E) against the Persecutors, that he had great Promises made him, to oblige him to Write no more in that Strain: But he hearkened not to those Proposals. Some time after he removed to Basil, where he Taught the Civil Law. The Plague obliging him to leave it, he retired to Montbeliard, where he lost his Wife. He went afterwards to Geneva, where he wrote a Book (F) in say, that having not found in the Memoirs that were given him, the Journey from Lyons to Geneva, he thought Francis Hotomanus left Lyons, only to be Professor of Philology at Lausanne (e). But let us not decide on the most probable side; for as there were already at Lausanne many eminent Refugees (d), who both knew and loved the Merit and Piety of Francis Hotomanus, they might easily obtain from the Magistrates of Bern an Invitation of him from Lyons. Mr. Teissier observes, that it was by the Mediation of Theodorus Beza, that the Town of Lausanne offered Hotomanus a Professorship of Philology. I believe he is mistaken, and that he had better have ascribed it to Calvin's Interest; for Hotomanus was Professor at Lausanne (e), before Beza came thither to profess the Greek Tongue, and it is certain, that Beza wanted Calvin's Good Offices to obtain that Professorship. Is it likely a Man should procure a Professor's Chair for another, in a Town, where he is not, and where he cannot settle himself, but upon the Interest of others? Mr. Teissier, no doubt, believed, that Beza was Professor of the Greek Tongue before Hotomanus was invited thither. Thus you see how important it is in the Narrative of this sort of Things, to consult well the Dates and the Rubricks of Chronology.

(D) Being returned to Strasburg he yielded to the Persuasion of John de Monluc.] If Thuanus had consulted the Dates, he would not have said that John de Monluc took Hotomanus from Lausanne to settle him at Valence; (f) Lausanæ primum docuit, INDE, à Joanne Monlucio Valentiæ Episcopo, & postea à Margarita Biturigum Duce evocatus repetitis vicibus Valentiæ & Avarici Biturigum, ubi eum aliquando audivi, evocatus, &c. These Words repetitis vicibus were not understood by the French Translator: He thought they signified that Hotomanus (g) Taught the Civil-Law, sometimes at Valence and sometimes at Bourges: which is not the meaning; for he Taught no longer at Valence, when he once had left it. The Translator should have said then, that the Inhabitants of Bern had him twice at Bourges, as may be seen in the Body of this Article. Those who see in Hotomanus's Life his successive Removals from one Town to another, will make no great Account of the Memoirs that Thuanus was supplied with, since he says, that after the Massacre of the year 1572. Hotomanus went to Montbeliard, and from thence to Basil. He should have said, that he went to Geneva, and from thence to Eyk, and then to Montbeliard, afterwards to Geneva, and lastly to Basil.

Non modò non excusandum patricidium, ultro etiam defendendam causam innocentium.* A little after he speaks of the Book de regni Galliæ statu, which Hotomanus Published about that time under the Title of Franco-Gallia. 'Tis a commendible Work in point of Learning, but very unworthy of a French Civilian, if we take even many Protestants Word for it. Mr. Teissier speaks thus of it: His Book Intituled Franco-Gallia, drew upon him, WITH REASON the Censure of the honest French-men. For in that Work he endeavours to prove that this (k) Kingdom which is the most Flourishing in Christendom, is not Successive, as the Inheritances of private Persons are, and that heretofore Crowns were obtained only by the suffrages of the Nobility and the People: So that as Anciently the Power and Authority of Electing Kings belonged to the States of the Kingdom, and to all the Nation Assembled in a Body; so it was the State who deposed them from the Government. Hereupon he brings in the Examples of Philip de Valois, John, Charles V. Charles VI. and Lewis XI. But that which he principally insists on, is to shew, that as Women have ever been judged incapable of Royalty, they ought also to be excluded from all Publick Posts, and Administrations (l). Add to this Passage of Mr. Teissier the judicious Words of Bongars, taken from a Letter (m) to Thuanus. ' (n) I'll freely confess to you de Franco-Gallia vellem parcius, both because the Book is not Seasonable, and also because it seems to me that the good Man is grossly mistaken in that Dispute. Grief gave some Colour to the Work when it was first Printed: And we suffer many Words to escape us in an extream Trouble, which we should blush to hear repeated when the Passion is over: I Write to you my Thoughts about it, not knowing what Judgment you make of it. I am sorry I did it not sooner. I know well that the good Man was well pleased with that Piece; he thawed it by the repeated Impressions. 'Tis a Distemper, with which many of our People, and too many are Tainted, who would willingly have even Monarchy reduced to an Anarchy. If there be any harm in a thing, it doth not follow, that it must be destroyed. Bongars, you'll say, has hit the Mark: Hotoman was in a Passion against his Country when he wrote that Book, and not content to Revenge himself on the present Rulers, he he indeavoured to Diſcharge his Reſentment upon the Monarchy it ſelf, and the whole Body of the Nation: and that with ſo little judgment, that he furniſhed the Leaguers with powerful Arguments for the Excluſion of Henry IV. For according to his Principles, the Catholicks of France had a full right to Elect the Duke of Guiſe King of France to the Prejudice of the Princes of the Blood. A Paſſionate Writer, you'll Reply, is ſcarce capable of thinking of the Future, his Thoughts are intent upon the preſent; he conſiders not that the times may Change, and that the Doctrine which this Day ſuites with the intereſt of our Cauſe, will one time or other be as favourable to our Enemies. This was manifeſt in France under Charles IX. and Henry III. Each Party was obliged to confute it ſelf, as Montagne has well obſerved: See the Remark I. 'Tis certain that if Catherine de Medicis had imbraced the Reformation, and Eſtabliſhed it all over France, Hotomanus would have written a fine Book to prove that the Regency of Women was a very good thing, and according to the Spirit of our Fundamental Laws. With what ſtrength would he not have refuted the Papiſts, who ſhould have written againſt this Queen? The ſtrongeſt Reaſon that the Proteſtants of France alledged to juſtify their taking up Arms, was what Catherine de Medicis wrote to the Prince of Condé. They therefore Acknowledged the Authority of this Woman. Did not Hotomanus ſollicite Succours in Germany in this Queen's Name? (a) Ab his paullo poſt, immo & ab ea quæ tum minorem annis Regem regnumque adminiſtrabat, in Germaniam bis miſſus eſt de Regis regnique rebus legatus, & auxilium à Cæſ. Ferdinando ordinibuſque Germaniæ rebus ruentibus petere juſſus. Exſtat dicta tum ab eo in comitiis Imperii Francofordienſibus oratio. We ſhall ſee elſewhere (b) that he is Accuſed of dealing unfairly in his Franco-Gallia, and we'll try to Anſwer ſomething in defence of that Learned Man.

(F) He wrote a Book in Defence of the Rights of the King of Navarre.] 'Twas that of the Right of the Nephew againſt the Uncle (c). The League had put it into the Head of Cardinal Bourbon Uncle to the King of Navarre, to ſet up for the Lawful Succeſſor, and an Italian Civilian was employ'd to write a Tract of the Right of the Uncle againſt the Nephew. Francis Hotomanus learnedly Confuted him. We'll cite Father Maimbourg: Antony Hotman, ſays he (d), Advocate-General to the League in the Parliament of Paris wrote the Treatiſe of the right of the Uncle againſt the Nephew to ſucceed to the Crown. But it happened by a very lucky Chance, that the Civilian Francis Hotman Brother to the Advocate, having Read this Book, which was diſperſed in Germany, where he then was, maintained with great ſtrength, Reaſon and Learning, the Right of the Nephew againſt the Uncle; and in a Learned Piece he Publiſhed on that Subject, he Manifeſtly expos'd the Weakneſs and falſe Reaſonings of his Adverſary's Treatiſe, without knowing that it was his Brother, who had not put his Name to it. There are many Miſtakes in theſe Words. 1. It is not true that Francis Hotomanus wrote againſt an unknown Author. He wrote againſt one Matthew Zampini, of Recanati, an Italian Civilian. Ll Matthæus Zampinus Racanatenſis de trivio J. C. à fœderatis pecunia ſubornatus, edita conſultatione probare conatus fuerat, quam Fr. Hotomannus magni nominis noſtra ætate J. C. contraria conſultatione eadem edita confutavit (e). 2. And Conſequently 'tis not true that he wrote againſt his Brother. 3. 'Tis not true that he wrote this Book in 1589. It was about the year 1585. as Thuanus obſerves: which agrees with Nevelet, who makes him then 60 years Old. 4. He was then at Geneva, and not in Germany. 5. Antony Hotman was not one of the Advocate Generals of the League in 1589. and was not ſo till two years after (f), when John le Maitre who diſcharged that Employment with Lewis d' Orleans, was promoted to the Office of Preſident au Mortier. Preſident Briſſon was already Dead. 6. 'Twas Antony Hotman who wrote againſt his Brother Francis Hotman, and not the contrary. (g) Poſtea & peculiari libro quem conſultationi à Franciſco fratre pro Navarro editæ — oppoſuiſſe videri voluit, (Antonius Hotmannus) rationes amplificatæ.

(G) They do not contain all that he had Publiſhed.] The Burleſque Pieces which he wrote againſt Matharel, and Papyrius Maſſo, were left out, as alſo the Book he Publiſhed at Geneva in the year 1553. under the Name of Francis de Vilhier, † Ad Remundum Rufum defenſorem Rom. Pontificis contra Carolum Molinæum de ſtatu primitivæ Eccleſiæ &c. and the nullitatis proteſtatio adverſus formulam concordiæ (h), which he Publiſhed under the Name of Johannes Palmerius; and the Apology of this laſt Book, in which he diſguiſed himſelf under the Name of Johannes Franciſcus Aſpaſtis Salaſſi V. D. M. (i) His Anti-Tribonianus, Printed in French in 1603. the Latin Verſion whereof was Printed at Hamburg in 1647. was alſo left out. Concerning this Book, ſee the curious (k) Mr. Baillet. Laſtly, his brutum fulmen was left out, which is not a Burleſque Piece as Thuanus will have it. 'Tis a very ſerious Work, in which Hotomanus refutes the Bull which Sixtus V. Publiſh'd in 1585. againſt the King of Navarre, and the Prince of Condé. Poſtea, ſays Thuanus (l), & in cenſuram illam ſcripſit Franciſcus Hotmannus J. C. joculari iſto ſtilo, libroque Brutum Fulmen titulum fecit, quo & de B. Franciſci & B. Dominici vita ac moribus veteres hiſtoriæ, ab obſolete devotis viris ſcriptæ ridicule diſcutiuntur. There's nothing leſs than this Treated of, in that Tract of Francis Hotomanus. Deckher has been in this deceived (m) by Thuanus, but he has committed a Fault of his own: He will have this Learned Civilian to have left France on account of that Piece; which is falſe. Hotomanus quitted France in 1572. fully reſolved (n) never to ſet Foot in it again. The Brutum fulmen came out in 1585. as Deckher obſerves againſt Goldaſtus, who places the Edition of it in the year 1586. I have ſaid nothing of the Tract de regno vulvarum, which d' Aubigne aſcribes to our Hotomanus in the 3*d*. Chapter of the 1*ſt*. Book of the Confeſſion de Sanci: I know not what it is.

(H) Author of the Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos.] When I mentioned this Work in the Project of this Dictionary, I ſaid (o) that the Error of thoſe who aſcribed Junius Brutus's Book to Francis Hotomanus was a ſmall one. Hotomanus, continued I, 'left France for his Religion, and tho' he was not 'like thoſe, who fly from Perſecution, breathing 'out Threatnings and Slaughter (p) as the Per'ſecutors themſelves, yet he did not fail to Com'plain and Murmur in his Retreat. He wrote a 'Book Intituled Franco-Gallia, to ſhew that the 'French Monarchy is not what it is thought to be, 'and that of Right, the People are the true Sove'reigns in it. This was the Reaſon that made it 'believed that he was the Author of Junius Bru'tus's Work; beſides, there are many Maxims of the 'Franco-Gallia ſcattered in it. Barclay refutes 'only this laſt Reaſon, which ſeems to him plauſi'ble enough, and pretends to ſhew the weakneſs of 'it by ſomething that is ſtill more plauſible; which 'is, ſays he (q), that Brutus makes uſe of ſeveral 'Arguments, which Hotomanus Laughed at and 'Refuted, and falls into ſuch Childiſh Errors as to 'the Civil-Law, that ſuch a Man as Hotomanus 'could not be capable of. This is more obliging to 'this Learned Civilian, than what has been ſaid 'by Boeclerus. I wiſh, ſays he, Hotomanus had 'not ſo obſtinately appeared among the Authors, who 'found an Alarm againſt Kings, and by their 'private Authority Convert 'em into Tyrants with ſuch which is a Book intirely Adapted to Republican Notions. Sometime after, his own (I) Maxims were Retorted againſt him. 'Tis hard to avoid this Inconvenience in

' ſuch Querks and Cavils, and not only Corrupt good ' Philoſophy, but alſo the Holy Scripture. I wiſh ' he had not given an ill Example to others in his ' Franco-Gallia, and that he had not falſified Hiſtory ' more than once, to ſatisfy his Prejudices with too ' ſervile a Complaiſance. The Greek Phraſe of Boe- ' clerus has much more Emphaſis in it, ὡς ἐκεῖνος ' τὴν ἱστορίαν, etiam hiſtoriam non ſemel corrumpit (r) ——(f) I can't forbear ſaying that Boerlerus does very much abuſe Hotomanus, who once more was none of thoſe, who, like ſome Engliſh Catholicks of the laſt Century, leave their Country for Religion, in a menacing Manner, calling Fire and Flame, Vomiting a thouſand Imprecations, thundering out Maranatha's, and endeavouring a Reſtoration with Sword in Hand, or by the help of Exterminating Armies; in a Word, deſiring a return, Preceded, like the departure out of Ægypt, with all the Plagues of Pharaoh, not excepting the Paſſage of the deſtroying Angel. Hotomanus contented himſelf with ſome good ſtrokes of the Pen, and with touching upon ſome things that did not pleaſe him. 'Tis true, that without thinking of it, he Labour'd for the League (a), and Forged Weapons for Bellarmin: 'Tis true alſo that his Blows were like thoſe of the (b) Parthians; I mean, that in a flying Poſture he Fought better than he would have done without Retreating. But his Writings are far from deſerving to be Branded, like many other Productions that came out in the like Circumſtances. For Example, the Engliſh Catholicks have in vain made Satyrs and bitter Invectives (c) againſt Queen Elizabeth: This is all loſt Paper, of which Wiſe Men make no manner of uſe in any Party. However it be the Appearances were againſt Hotomanus, as to Junius Brutus's Book; and as I have already ſaid, it was a very ſmall Error to make him the Author of the Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos.

(I) His own Maxims were retorted againſt him.] 'Twas by Accident and by a very common Fate which Changes the Intereſts of Parties, that Hotomanus's Work was Subject to the Inconvenience I ſpeak of. The Revolutions of France ſo Changed the Scene, that the Maxims of each Party were Reciprocally Metamorphos'd into their contraries. Montagne (d) does pleaſantly Ridicule the Catholicks. See, ſays he, with what horrible Impudence we toſs about Divine Reaſons, and how we throw them away, and catch them again, according as Fortune has chang'd our Situation in theſe Publick Storms. This Solemn Propoſition, Whether it be Lawful for Subjects to Rebel and Arm againſt their Prince for the Defence of Religion, was maintained the laſt year by a certain Party, and denied by the other Party: But ſee now who maintains the Affirmative, and whether Arms rattle leſs for this Cauſe than for that. We Burn thoſe People that ſay it is neceſſary to ſubmit Truth to the Yoke of our Neceſſity, but does not France do worſe than ſay it? &c. As long as the World will be a World, there will be every where Ambulatory Doctrines, dependant on Times and Places: True Tranſitory Birds, which are in one Country in the Summer, and in another in the Winter: Wandering Lights, that, like the Cartefian Comets, Illuminate ſucceſſively ſeveral Vortices. Whoever pretends to ſet up for a Cenſor upon this occaſion, will be look'd on as a Morole Critick, and a Native of Plato's Common-Wealth. And ſo Hotomanus ought not to be Reſponſible for the Advantage the famous Advocate of the Holy League found a way to make of his Franco-Gallia. ' They can't Complain, ('tis Lewis d'Orleans who ſpeaks this in the Name of the Engliſh Catholicks) ' that ' they are dealt with as they dealt with others. ' Purſue their Counſels, tread in the Path they ' have Traced out to Eſtabliſh themſelves, and you ' will Eſtabliſh your ſelves, and involve them in ' Shame and Confuſion. In their Franco-Gallia, ' which is one of the moſt Deteſtable Books that ' ever ſaw the Light, and was Compos'd to put all ' France in a Flame, they ſay, that it is Lawful to ' chooſe a King at ones Pleaſure. Tell then the ' Hereticks that the King of Navarre does not ' pleaſe you, and therefore let him keep in Bearn, ' till you deſire to have him. Thus they are to be ' Whipp'd with their own Rods, that they may ' know that the Potent hand of God Chaſtiſes them, ' with their own Wicked Counſels, and Pernicious ' Writings (e). That Book of Hotomanus is at the bottom a fine Work, well Written, and full of Learning, and ſo much the more Vexatious to the contrary Party, becauſe the Author contents himſelf to cite Matters of Fact, as he himſelf repreſents to his Cenſurers. Cur vel ita flagitamus, ſays he (f), vel Authanellus Francogallia ſcriptori & ſimplici hiſtoriarum narratori ira terribiliter inſeritur? Nam ut dicit Seneca nup. lib. 1. num. 10. quomodo poteſt aliquis ei ſuccenſere qui eſt tantum relator & narrator facti? Francogallia enim tantum narrationi & relationi ſimplici vacat, quod à aliena dicta delerentur, charta remaneret alba. He was told (g) that his Book look'd like the Production of a Drunken, Furious and Mad Man: To which he Anſwered, that it was an actionable Impudence to ſay ſuch a thing, ſince he had conſtantly preſerv'd in that Book the Character of a Moderate Relater, and of a Man in Cold Blood: Which is a wonderful Advantage in ſuch ſort of Books. Tho' the Anſwer be Written in a Burleſque Style, yet it contains a thouſand things that ought to be ſeriouſly underſtood. † Ridentem dicere verum quid vetat? Such is for Inſtance, what he ſays to his Adverſary, that it is not ſufficient for him to preſent his Acculation, and give Bail de l. te proſequenda; but that 'tis farther neceſſary he ſhould engage to ſubmit to the Law of Retaliation, in Caſe he ſhould be Convicted of Calumny. (h) Sed adhuc requiritur tertius ut ſe expreſſe obliget ad pœnam talionis, in caſu quo præſens calumniator; quod probatur per L. ult. C. de calumniat. & omnes Canoniſtas, ſed maxime per Hieronym. de Zanettinis in repetit. cap. 1. Extr. de accuſat. De quo ſi fumus contendes, & Mathanellus ſe ſubjiciat talioni in caſu quo calumnia convincatur, totum negotium noſtrum bene audiet, niſi forte &c.

If we believe an Hiſtorian, who had been a Miniſter, that Piece of Hotomanus did not pleaſe all the Proteſtants, nor diſpleaſe all the Catholicks of France, and was not written without ſome Relation to the Cabal of Mareſchal d'Amville. A little after (ſays he (i),) the Duke of Alençon, his Majeſty's Brother, retired from Court with many Lords, having been Tamper'd with by the ſaid Mareſchal d'Amville; and taking the name of Malecontents, they joined with the Huguenots. Some of which began to write otherwiſe than they had ſpoken all along: And Hotman the Civilian in his Franco-Gallia, undertook to Write, That the French People had a Supreme Authority not only to Elect their Kings, but alſo to put by the Sons of Kings, and to Elect Strangers: He ſays upon that Subject many things, praiſing the People that Curb the Licentiouſneſs of their Kings and bring them to Reaſon. After much of his Diſcourſe, he falls upon the Regency of Queens, the Mothers of Kings. Which he did becauſe the Queen Mother had been Declared Regent till the return of the King of Poland her Son: In ſhort, he Alledged many Antient Hiſtories nothing to his Paſſion. This Book was agreeable to ſome Proteſtants, and to ſome Unreaſonable Catholicks, who were fond of Innovations, but not to all. D'Aubigne (k) gives the ſame Plan of this Book; but he ſays it was Publiſh'd in 1573 in the Life time of Charles the IX. Thuanus (l) and Mezeray (m) who give the ſame Plan of it, Place it, the one under the Reign of Charles IX. the other, before the departure of the King of Poland. Which overthrows Cayet's Hypotheſis; viz. That the Regency conferr'd on Queen Catherine at Charles IX's Death, was one of the Grievances of Hotomanus. 'Tis certain his Work was Printed before the Queen was Declared Regent by the Edict of the 30*th.* of May 1574. But he foreſaw perhaps that it would be ſo, and 'tis very likely he had her in view in what he ſaid againſt a Female Regency. He remembered the Miſchiefs that Princes had caus'd in her former Regency. This great Civilian had re-

He was one of those who would never consent to the drawing of their Picture *, but it was drawn when he was in his Agony. See Mr. Baillet †. Moreri has not been guilty (L) of many Faults.

I wonder that a thing was forgotten in the Life of Francis Hotomanus, which is very glorious for him, viz. that at the Age of Twenty Three Years (M) he read publick Lectures in the Schools of Paris. The Author of his Life has also omitted, (and I don't wonder at it,) certain Things which Baudouin had published against him, and which would horribly (N) stain his Memory, if they were true. One could not give any Credit to them, without believing that it is a much easier thing to become very Learned, and a great Enemy of the persecuting Religion, than to become an

(K) He was well paid for his Brutum Fulmen.] We will begin our Comment with these Words of the Author of his Life. (o) His meritis præmium deberi cum intelligeret Henricus tum Navarræ Rex, ultimo codicillo ad eum missi Senatoria in Consistorio sui dignitatis: cujus tamen emn fructum non tulit, quem beneficus Princeps voluerat: ac opinor in tantis rerum omnium angustiis factum, ut ex annuo quod debatur salario, vix ad eum quidquam, sicut audio, pervenerit. Bongars, to whom Nevelet dedicated Hotomanus's Life, made a Reflection upon this Passage. (p) 'There is another stroke. Having said, 'that the King had upon his Writing the Brutum 'Fulmen, given him a place of Councellor of State, 'cujus tamen cum fructum non tulit quem beneficus princeps voluerat. I assure you, Sir, the King 'never bought a Book so dear as that: It was paid 'far above its worth. You'll tell me, that I should 'have given my Advice upon these Strokes sooner; 'but it often happens, (and to me but too frequently) that we never consider till 'tis too late. I 'write to Mr. Hotman my Thoughts about the 'first (a). I don't touch upon the Second, he might 'be offended at it, not knowing how the matter 'went. Note, that Nevelet does not speak there of the Brutum Fulmen, as Bongars supposes, but of the Book against Zampini de successione inter patruum & fratris filium.

(a) That is, what concerns the Franco-Gallia. See above the Words of Bongars, in the Remark E.

(L) Moreri has not been guilty of many Faults.] I. He supposes falsly, that Hotomanus was saved by his Scholars at Bourges, at another time than that of the Massacre; that is, of one Event he makes two. II. The Year of his Death is not well fixed; it should have been 1590, instead of 1591. III. He should not impute that Mistake to Spondanus, by citing him under the Year 1591. n. 22. for it is under the Number of the preceding Year that he speaks of Hotomanus's Death.

(M) At the Age of 23 Years, he read publick Lectures in the Schools of Paris.] I prove this in Stephen Pasquier's Words: (b) 'I can tell you, that 'one of the most Fortunate Things that I think I 'ever met with in my Youth, was on the next Day 'after our Lady's Assumption in the Year 1546, 'when Hotomanus and Baudouin began their Law 'Lectures in the Schools of this Town of Paris; 'the former at Seven a Clock in the Morning, read-'ing the Title de Notionibus; the latter at Two of 'the Clock in the Afternoon, reading the Title de 'Publicis judiciis, before a great Number of Audi-'tors. And that very Day I began to study the 'Civil Law under those two Learned Persons.

(N) Which would horribly stain his Memory.] Baudouin assures us, that Hotomanus was excommunicated at Strasburg, for the Crime of Adultery. (c) Argentinæ propter adulterium excommunicarat fodalem tuum Hotmannum (Petrus Alexander). These Words are address'd to Beza. The Author had already mentioned this with more Circumstances, and had added, that the same Hotomanus lost also his Canonship and his Academical Employ. (d) Recitata tunc quoque nostro fuit causa tui Hotmanni, nempe propter quod facinus ille aliquando primum fuisset excommunicatus abs Jac Gallo Concionatore Petro Alexandro, te quidem propter antiquam societatem submurmurante, sed assentiente tamen eo minus parente, at certe avo Gulielmo Favello, Patrue illum jurisperditum appellante. Addebant & templura ejusdem generis quæ pervulgata sunt per Joannem Infantium, testem valde idoneum, & cujus non solum opera, sed & opibus quandiu opus habuisti, tam liberaliter es abusus, ut fidem ei detrahere vix audeas. Altera causa fuit exposita cur tibius ille Hotmannus (cujus causa non est abs te sejuncta) ut antea Ecclesia, sic deinde schola & suo Cœnobio pulsus esset: tandemque quid in eo Sturmius ipse gravissime accusaret narravi ei, & perlecta Sturmiani adversus eum terribilis expostulatio, qua profecto non modo de illius flagitiis, sed & de vestra conjurationis mysteriis narrabat nimis multa. All these Things had preceded the Year 1562. Baudouin a little after (e) relates, that having known Hotomanus at Paris, as a Person that loved Learning, he advised him to go to see the Lake of Geneva; that he received him in his House at Strasburg, with all Civility, as an old Friend, when Hotomanus retired thither, having demanded his good Offices for a Law Professorship, and expresst (f) a great dislike to his teaching at Lausane; and that he quickly perceived he harboured a Viper in his Bosom, since Hotomanus endeavoured all that was possible to ruine him by secret Practices. Here is one of his Tricks: Having plaid his fraudulent Contrivances, which moved Duaren to send him an Invective against Baudouin; he dispersed it all over the Town, taking care however, that Baudouin should not know it. He was at last obliged by Sturmius to go to him to hear himself reproached, and he expresst an extream Repentance for his Conduct. Baudouin produces a Fragment (g) of the Letter which Sturmius writ to him, in which he accuses him of using a great deal of Knavery to supplant Baudouin. His Plot succeeded; for he made Baudouin out of Conceit with Strasburg. Baudouin went to Heidelberg, and Hotomanus succeeded him. All this is to be found in Baudouin's Third Answer to Calvin. He had already alledged in the Second, this Letter of Sturmius, and he had drawn many Things out of it to Hotomanus's Disreputation. He had mention'd a piece of it, containing a Reproach of an execrable Perjury. Hotomanus, the very Day that he received the Sacrament, protested to Sturmius, that he wished the Sacrament he had received might be turned into a Devil, if he denied falsly what he denied (i). And yet, adds Sturmius, he denied a thing that was most true. Baudouin mentions this as a Proof, that his Adversary, who undertook to dispute about the Eucharist, made no great Account of it, and he takes this occasion to reproach him, that he had been excluded from the Communion in Germany for Adultery. (k) *Etiam de mysterio Cœnæ Dominicæ disputat, & me cum sua Gallica (ut vocat) Ecclesia non idem sentire narrat, qui ab ea propter Clodianum factum in Germania excommunicatus aliam quacunque illi fortasse patuit mensam occupavit. an indifferent honeſt Man. I'll ſpeak a Word or two concerning the Author (O) of Hotomanus's Life. The Book which was printed in 1700, 4*to.* at Amſterdam, intituled, Franciſci & Joannis Hotomanorum. Patris ac Filii & clarorum virorum ad eos Epiſtolæ, might furniſh me with a great many Additions for this Article, both concerning the Application of our Civilian to the Search of the Philoſophers Stone, which proved very prejudicial to him, and upon ſeveral other Particularities of his Life; but I think it better to refer my Readers to Mr.* Bernard. The Extract which he gives us of this Work, leaves nothing wanting. You may alſo conſult the firſt Volume Obſervationum Selectarum ad rem litterariam ſpectantium, printed at Hall in the Year 1700.

HOTTINGER (John Henry) one of the moſt famous Writers of the XVIIth. Century, was born at Zurich the 10th. of March, 1620. The Progreſs he made in his firſt Studies, gave ſuch promiſing Hopes, that the Truſtees of the Schools reſolved upon ſending him to ſtudy in Foreign Countries at the publick Charge. He began his Travels the 26th. of March, 1638, and went to Geneva; from whence, after a ſtay of Two Months, he proceeded into France. He afterwards ſaw Flanders and Holland, and choſe Groningen for the Seat of his Studies; but his deſire to perfect himſelf in the Oriental Languages, engaged him at the Year's end to remove to Leyden †, to be Tutor to the Children of the Profeſſor Golius, who was beſt skill'd in thoſe Languages of any Man in the World. He made a great Progreſs in Arabick by Golius's Aſſiſtance, and by the Lectures of a Turk. He would have attended the Ambaſſador of the ‡ States to Conſtantinople, in 1641, in Quality of Chaplain, if the Magiſtrates of Zurich would have conſented to it; but they choſe rather to recall him to employ him for

Now this is the Reaſon why I have made a Diſtinction between what we find in Baudouin's Third and Second Anſwers. Beza has confuted the Second, but has ſaid nothing againſt the Third; and therefore the Third is no Argument againſt our Civilian; for it may be preſumed, that if Beza had confuted it, he would have juſtified him. We muſt therefore give greater Attention to the Reproaches contained in the Second, becauſe they may be compared with the Piece in which Beza refuted it. We muſt conſider by that Confutation, what Grounds Baudouin went upon. I find that his Adverſary advances nothing to the clearing of Hotomanus; he only ſays, that the Reproaches of being ignorant of the Latin Tongue, and of being an Atheiſt, will not at all diſturb Hotomanus, who will not vouchſafe to give any Anſwer as to the laſt Head. (p) Magnum tibi certamen ſupereſſe video. Nam quæ tibi objecit magnam inſectiam arguunt, quæ tamen (ut ajunt) refellere non poſſis. Illa vero quæ regeris cujuſmodi ſint quæſo? Latinè ſcilicet neſcit, ut eum oportuerit ad Latinam epiſtolam ſcribendam alterius operam requirere. Crimen autem [illegible] etſi omnium eſt graviſſimum, ille tamen, ut opinor, ne reſponſo quidem dignum putabit. Quid enim hoc aliud eſt quam latrare? Here is nothing relating to the Accuſations I have tranſcribed, and which are found in the 176, 180, 181, 182 Pages of Baudouin's Second Anſwer. All that Beza has ſaid for Hotomanus, concerns the 175th. Page, where we find, 1. That Hotomanus appropriated to himſelf an Epiſtle Dedicatory that Sturmius wrote: 2. That he then praiſed the very ſame Works of Duarenus, which he had villified formerly in Writing againſt Rufus for Du Molin. 3. That an elegant Maſter of Cicero's Atheiſm, is not fit to be a Catechiſt. (q) Noſter magiſter Latinitatis priuſquam de meis ſcriptionibus garriat, ſuarum oblitus reſpondeat Sturmio & aliis, à quibus accuſatus eſt quod ſuo nomine ediderit epiſtolam ab Sturmio ſcriptam, eamque inſtitutionibus pr. fixam tanquam ſuam vendiderit Duci Saxoniæ —— Oportet iſtius cui patroni incredibilem eſſe, non jam dicam impudentiam, quia latitat, ſed nequitiam, cum quidem poſteaquam edito libello de ſacerdotiis adverſus Rufum pro Molinæo, profecit illos Beneficiarios commentarios (Duareni) nunc eos ſe adorare fingat —— ſcilicet religionem nos docet elegans magiſter Ciceronianæ [illegible]

(q) Id. ib. pag. 175.

I am very certain, that my Readers will agree in comparing theſe Paſſages of Baudouin and Beza together, that nothing could be more diſadvantageous to Hotomanus, than to anſwer, as Beza has done. Silence would have been infinitely leſs injurious. To compleat the Misfortune, Beza publiſhed (r) a Letter of Sturmius, who diſowns all that could be cited from him to the Diſadvantage of Calvin and Beza; but as for Hotomanus, there is nothing like it.

Languet a true Refugee, and a very honeſt Man, having ſeen Sturmius's Accuſations againſt Hotomanus, made very ſenſible Reflections, and altogether worthy of a good honeſt Soul; but it was a great uneaſineſs to him, that his Countrymen behav'd themſelves ſo ill in Germany, and that ſome Men, who under Pretence of Religion, endeavoured only to ſatisfy their Vanity, did more Injury to the Proteſtant Religion, than the King of Spain and the Pope: However, he could not believe that Hotomanus could ſo far forget himſelf, as to be guilty of ſuch infamous Deeds. Theſe are his Words: (a) Hæc ſunt levia, ſi conferantur cum turpibus factis noſtrorum hominum in Germania, & quidem eorum qui ornati ſunt Eruditione, & religionis ſpecie, inſinuarunt ſe in amicitiam bonorum virorum, qui ipſi ſumma beneficia exhibuerunt. Ut alios omittam, nuper vidi accuſationem Sturmii adverſus Hottomannum, quæ ſi vera eſt, miſeret me Sturmii, & pudet alterius; ſed talia ſunt, ut mihi videantur vix poſſe venire in mentem viro erudito. Quidam merum egerunt, ut ipſius accuſationis Capita ad te perſcriberem, ſed à talibus miniſteriis ego planè abhorreo, cùm præſertim ſciam te nec voluptatem nec utilitatem ex iis percipere poſſe, & ad me nihil pertineant, niſi fortè infamiæ pars in me redundet, eo quod à noſtris hominibus tanta perpetrentur in ipſa Germania. Hæc ſane tanto dolore me afficiunt, ut neſciam an ex ulla re majorem unquam ſenſerim. Video ubique eorum ambitionem, qui prætextu Religionis ſuæ quærunt, magis obeſſe ipſius Religionis progreſſui, quam pontificem Ro. Regem Hiſpaniæ, & omnes ipſorum miniſtros; ſed de re odioſa nimis multa ſcribo. The Letter out of which I have taken theſe Words is dated from Paris, the 11th. of December, 1561. Another Letter of his, dated from the ſame Place the 23d. of January, 1562, informs us, that the Duke of Guiſe, who was gone to ſee the Biſhop of Straſburg at Saverne, (b) had entered a Proceſs againſt Francis Hotomanus, for Defamatory Libels, and that ſeveral People affirmed, that 'twas on that Account he had undertaken that Journey. Languet could not believe that ſo inconſiderable a Motive had obliged the Duke of Guiſe to go to Saverne; but I make no doubt, that he thought it was a ſhameful Thing for Hotomanus to be proſecuted as a Writer of Libels.

They permitted him to see England before his return to Switzerland; and when he was returned, they made him * Professor of Ecclesiastical History; and a Year after they gave him two other Professorships, that of Catechetical Divinity, and that of the Oriental Tongues. He married † at 22, and began to set up for an Author (A) at 24. He was so well pleased with that Character, that he continually published (B) new Books. This was no Difficulty to him; for he was extreamly laborious, and had a prodigious Memory. Nevertheless, there is reason to wonder, that a Man taken up with so many Academical Functions, and who had so many Avocations through Visits (C), and a vast Correspondence of Letters, could be able to compose so many Volumes. He had new Professorships given him * in 1655, and was admitted into the College of the Canons. Two Years after he was lent for Three Years to the Elector Palatine, who was desirous to make use of him to re-establish the Reputation of the University of Heidelberg. Before he went thither, he took his Doctor of Divinity's Degree † at Basil. He arrived at Heidelberg in August, 1655, and was very well received. Besides the Professorship in Divinity of the Old Testament, and in the Oriental Tongues, he was made Governour of the College of the Sapience, and promoted to the Dignity of Ecclesiastical Counsellor. He was Rector of the University the Year following, and composed something for the Reunion of the Lutherans and Calvinists, which he did to please the Elector, who was [illegible] of it; but letus Doschius, signifies Peter Nevelet, Lord of Osche. The Title of that Lordship, and that of Advocate (c) in the Parliament of Paris, are given him in Pasquier's Letters. He was Son to a Sister of Peter Pithou, as appears by a Letter that Uncle writ to him, which was printed at the end of Quintilian's Declamations, in some Editions Isaac Nicolas Nevelet his Son, published Æsop, and other antient Fabulists, with Notes, in 1610. This was the first Fruit of his Studies, and he dedicated it to his Father.

(A) And began to set up for an Author at Twenty Four.] It was not for a little Enterprise, but to attack, upon a very crabbed Subject, one of the most Learned Men that was then in Europe. For he undertook to confute Father Morin's Dissertations (d) upon the Samaritan Pentateuch. We may therefore apply to him these Verses of the uncoiffed Chaplain:

Mes pareils avec toi sont dignes de se batre,
Et pour des coups d'essai veulent des Henris quatre.

(d) Printed in 1631, and not in 1651, as 'tis said in Father Morin's Life, p. 22. edit. Francof.

This Work, which he intituled Exercitationes Anti-Morinianæ, was very grateful to the Protestants, whether because of the Learning of the Author, or by reason of the Subject, which could not be more favourable, since Hottinger defended the Hebrew Text of the Bible, whose Authority Father Morin invalidated, as much as possible. Mr. Simon judges this Work to be one of the best that Hottinger published; and so it might be said, that his first Essay was his Master-Piece. Let us quote Mr. Simon's Passage at large: it is not very advantageous to the Memory of this Swiss Doctor. '(e) If 'Hottinger had observed some Moderation in his 'Works, and had not so much insisted on Punctilio's, we might find something useful in them, for 'the understanding of the literal Sense of the 'Scripture. But being commonly a Party-Writer, 'and having composed his Books with too much 'haste, he mistakes very often. One of his best 'Works upon this Subject, is that which he wrote 'against the Samaritana Exercitationes of Father 'Morin, but he is not altogether exact in that 'Work. Mr. Simon in another Piece, has criticised upon this Book of Hottinger, but lightly, and without any real Design of prejudicing him. These are his Words: (f) Joannes Henricus Hottingerus, qui statim à Libri sui limine cujus hæc est inscriptio, Exercitationes anti-Morinianæ de Pentateucho Samaritano ejusque udentica authentica, Morinum appellat Monachum qui communem Monachorum sortem superet. Ille de Samaritanis & eorum codicibus disserit, putatque Samaritanos à Judæis Pentateuchi sui exemplar hausisse; sed conjecturis tantum, non autem firmissimis rationibus, ut ita sentiret adduci potuit; istud minus accuratum esse probat exemplis aliquot Keronasmorum, vocum vel mutatarum in alias vel omissarum, similibusque erroribus quos profert, & ex quibus confici posse arbitratur, non magis credendum esse Samaritanis Pentateuchum suum jactantibus, quam Ebionitis verum & solum Matthæi Evangelium Hebraeum venditantibus: quæ in re profecto gravissime hallucinatus est Hottingerus, qui tam venerandæ antiquitatis Pentateuchum Samaritanum cum adulterato Ebionitarum Evangelio comparare audeat. Morinum etiam imperitiæ arguit Hottingerus, quasi Rabbinorum quorundam quos laudaverat mentem haud assecutus fuisset. Mr. Heidegger had reason to observe, that Father Morin's Silence was a glorious thing to our Hottinger; but I question whether he understood the Thought of Father Mersenne. (g) Liber toti erudito orbi charus, acceptusque fuit. Constat Morinum diu adhuc superstitem librum accepisse & legisse, neque contra mutire ausum (b). Et Marsennus, cui Hottingerus librum adjunctis literis misit, id solum respondit, nec sibi Hottingeri juvenilem ardorem satis probari, nec Hottingerum Morinum penitus nosse. Quasi videlicet juveni integrum non fuerit senum deliria tanare, & ipse Morinus interiorem animi sui notam in vulgus edito libro non patefecerit. Father Mersenne seems to mean nothing else, but that Hottinger did not well know Father Morin. I doubt not but the Sense of his Answer was this, 'The heat of Youth has carried you too far, and 'if you knew the real Merit of Father Morin, 'you would not have treated him in that manner: Do you pretend to confute this, by saying, that Father Morin has discovered the bottom of his Heart by his Work? I grant he discovered that his Design was to raise the Credit of the vulgar Latin, and to enervate the Authority of the Original Text; but is not this the general Interest and Design of the Romish Controversists? Hottinger did not very well know Father Morin, since he took him for a Monk.

but (D) he met with the ſame Obſtables that prevented the like Deſign ſo often before. Hottinger attended this Prince at the Electoral Diet of Francfort, in the Year 1658, where he (E) conferred with Ludolfus upon very important Matters. He was not recall'd to Zurich till the Year 1661. for they had the Complaiſance to prolong the Term, for which he was lent to the Elector Palatine. He was immediately choſen Preſident of the Commiſſioners, who were to reviſe the German Tranſlation of the Bible. The Civil War that aroſe in Switzerland, in the Year 1664, occaſioned his being ſent into Holland upon Affairs of State. The Univerſity of Leyden offered him a Profeſſorſhip of Divinity in the Year 1667; but not obtaining leave of his Superiors, he refuſed it. They were not diſcouraged with this Refuſal, but inſiſted at leaſt to have him by way of Loan, and then the Magiſtrates of Zurich condeſcending to the States of Holland, who concerned themſelves in this Affair, he accepted the Offer. As he was preparing all Things for his Journey, he unfortunately loſt his Life the 5*th.* of June, 1667, upon (F) the River that goes by Zurich †. Some Pages after there is a Liſt of all thoſe, who correſponded with Hottinger by Letters; their Names fill up above two Pages. After all the Strangers that viſited him, we muſt not forget the Deputies of th. Janſeniſts; for he had many Converſations with them, when they paſſed by Zurich, in 1663. in their return from Rome to Paris. The Relation of what he told them, and of what they ſaid, has been found amongſt his Papers, and lately publiſhed (c).

(D) In which he met with the ſame Obſtacles.] According to Mr. Heidegger, theſe Obſtacles are the Animoſity of the Parties, and a certain Itch of the Mind, which is fed with theſe Diſputes, as a Camelion with the Air. 'Tis not I who judge thus of theſe Gentlemen (f), generally ſpeaking, but 'tis one of them, and he amongſt others, that can ſpeak beſt of it by Experience. He ſays, that the Buſineſs of the Reunion ought to be principally committed to ſecular Perſons (g), and not to Eccleſiaſticks; the Divines, adds he, are too much addicted to their own Senſe, and have but little Equity for thoſe that differ from their Opinion———. They ſhould not diſpute concerning the Truth of the Doctrines; for Diſputes rather create new Wars, than appeaſe the old ones. The Diſputants are not for Concord, but for Victory: They who find themſelves worſted, grow more haughty and inraged. In an Aſſembly where a Reunion is treated of, the Divines ſhould be reduced to the plain Functions (h) of Advocates: they ſhould be heard, but ſhould not be Judges; that Quality ought to be left to Stateſmen, and 'tis neceſſary, that the Divines ſhould even take an Oath, that they will ſubmit to the Sentence that the Political Judges ſhall pronounce. Hoc opus per manus præſertim Virorum Politicorum, non autem Eccleſiaſticorum eſt tractandum & inchoandum. Nullus ſe victum unquam fatebitur, & ſi ſentiat ſe dejectum aut proſtratum, tantum abeſt ut ad concordiam fiat pronior; contra ferocior evadet mutus & indignans, quod res ipſi male cedant. (k) There is no Deſcription, that Author was more capable of ſucceeding in, than in this.

It muſt not be forgotten, that in the Year 1666, Tobias Wagnerus, Chancellor of the Univerſity of Tubingen, writ againſt Hottinger's Book about the Reunion (l), in his Inquiſitio Theologica in Acta hujus ea noſtro potiſſimum tempore inter Theologos Auguſtanæ Confeſſionis & Reformatæ Eccleſiæ à Reformatis inſuperata. Hottinger defended himſelf, not in a Book written on purpoſe, but by the bye, and occaſionally. It was in a Synodal Diſpute, where he proved, that the Reformed Church was not Schiſmatical (m).

(E) Where he conferred with Ludolfus upon very important Matters.] Every Body knows, that Job Ludolfus had got a wonderful Knowledge of Æthiopia. He and Hottinger concerted Meaſures for ſending ſecretly into Africa, ſome Perſons that underſtood the Oriental Tongues, and that might exactly inform themſelves of the State of Chriſtianity in that part of the World. (n) Agitata præterea inter eos ſunt ſecretiora conſilia de mittendis Principum authoritate & impenſis in Africam juvenibus uno vel duobus, in Orientalium idiomatibus & rebus paulo jam provectioribus, qui Africanarum, imprimis Æthiopicarum Eccleſiarum arcana paulo penitùs indagarent, & novis monumentis ibi collectis copias noſtras augerent. I believe this was the chief Subject of the Letters which they wrote to one another, after the Diet of Francfort; but I make no doubt that they began to ſpeak of it at Francfort.

(F) He unfortunately loſt his Life———upon the River.] He went into a Boat with his Wife, and three of his Children, his Brother-in-Law, one of his good Friends, and his Maid, to go and make a Leaſe of a Seat which he had two Leagues from Zurich. The Boat running againſt a Stake, which the riſe of the River prevented the ſight of, over ſet. Hottinger, his Brother-in-Law, and his Friend retrieved themſelves from the danger by Swimming; but they went again into the Water, when they perceived the danger the reſt of the Company were ſtill in. There it was that Hottinger loſt his Life: His Friend and his three Children (a) had the ſame Deſtiny: His Wife, his Brother-in-Law, and his Maid were ſaved. (b) His Wife was the only Daughter of John Henry Huldric Miniſter of Zurich, a very Learned Man (c). He had many Children by her, for without reckoning thoſe three that were loſt with him, and thoſe that Died before, he left four Sons and two Daughters.

(G) He had often refuſed the Profeſſorſhips that were offer'd him.] The Magiſtrates of Deventer earneſtly Sollicited him in 1661. to come and ſupply the Place of Henry Diſet Profeſſor of Divinity, who by reaſon of his great Age was Declared emeritus (d). The Landgrave of Heſſe would have had him to come to Marpurg to profeſs Divinity there, and ordered Felix Hilarus a Phyſician of Baſil, to Negotiate that Affair. He was founded by the Magiſtrates of Amſterdam, and thoſe of Bremen (e).

HUYBERT (Peter de) Lord of Burgh, Craysteyn, &c. made himself famous by the great Services he did to the Republick of the United Provinces of the Netherlands, and particularly to the Province of Zeland. His Family is (A) very Antient, and many considerable Persons are reckoned in it. He was Born at Middleburg the first of August 1622. and was Elected Councellor of that Town the 24*th*. of March 1646. He gave such Proofs of his Capacity, that the Province of Zeland deputed him to the Assembly of the States General, and then to the first Conferences * that were held betwixt the Deputies of the King of Spain and those of the United Provinces, after a long and bloody War of 80 years, and gloriously terminated at Munster the 30*th*. of January 1648. He was sent in Quality of Embassador Extraordinary to the King of Sweden, the King of Poland, and the Elector of Brandenburg, during the famous War, in which the Swedes Invaded Poland, and made so many Conquests upon the King of Denmark, that they Forced him to give up to them three Provinces beyond the Sound. In March 1659. he was chosen Secretary of State for the Province of Zeland, and in May the same Year was Nam'd Plenipotentiary for the Treaty of Peace †, which was Concluded betwixt Sweden and Denmark, by the Mediation of France, England, and the United Provinces in 1660. The Ability and Fidelity that he shewed in those Illustrious Imployments, gave such content, that in March 1664. he was preferred to the Post of Great Pensionary of Zeland. The Instructions of that Post import, amongst other things, that one shall maintain on all Occasions, and at all Times, (H) The most Violent Adversaries —— were Leo Allatius, Abraham Ecchellensis.] See how the Rage of the first is Described in his Life. (f) Quorum in numerum refero imprimis Labeum Lojolitam miserum & rancidum, nec non morosum illum & tristem Senecionem Chium, Allatium, qui vel solo illo libro contra Hottingerum furiis inspirantibus & mentem ac calamum flectentibus scripto, apud bonos omnes cognomen Leonis conturbavit ac decoxit, & Canis plusquam Epirotici jure meritoque obtinuit. Quæ enim, malum, hæc feralis insania est, quis furor, quæ amma rabies, leviter sibi contradicentem, & contradictionem argumentis talibus, quibus si error infuisset, hominis tamen non pecoris eum fuisse apparuerat, munientem, non æquo animo tolerare, non fomentis, malagmatis & lenibus remediis curare, sed probris veluti de plaustro congressis non cumulare sed obruere, & eidem convitia ac maledicta atrocissima non modo nec trimodio, sed toto horreo admoveri? Quæ obscœnitas ad nomen ita alludere, ut casta aures & purus animus abhorreat? Canem hac, non Leonem generosum, non hominem, nedum Christianum obolent. Fuerit Allatius, ille Gigantum frater, paulo in Græcorum, imprimis eorum, quæ hactenus inedita nobis fortuna invidet, monumentis versatior. Habuerit senex ingenium (g) ad corrumpendum & detorquendum, ad dolos ac fallacias instruendum, ad parasitandum denique subactius. Hæc enim sola laus ipsi propria & eximia esse potest. Quanquam hominem in Græcia natum, Græcum idioma calluisse paulo exactius, mediocri in laude ponendum mihi videtur. Sed fuerint hæc, quæ dixi, in eo summa. Quo pacto ille assurget ad gloriam Hottingeri, qui, præterquam quod veritatis & Orthodoxiæ studio ductus sub signis Christi militavit, etiam excelluit non in vernaculo sibi idiomate, sed in Hebraico, Chaldaico, Syriaco, Arabico, Coptico, Persico, in quibus singulis Allatius non tantum nihil vidit, sed Talpa Tiresia cæcior fuit? Olim Chii in senatu Attico data est licentia vomendi. Credidi igitur lecto Allatii Chii libro, quod tot convitia in Hottingerum nostrum non jactavit, sed vomuit, gentis suæ antiqua licentia eum uti voluisse. Hottinger (b) defended himself in few Words: as for Ecchellensis, he put him in mind of the (i) Blunders, of which he had been Convicted, and he shewed him some others. (k) Prafatus est illi libro de gradibus studii Philologia, inserta simul Apologia brevi adversus Abrahamum Echellensem, qui Prafationi in Catalogum librorum Chaldaorum Hebed Jesu Metropolita Sobensis, traduxit Seldenum, Hottingerum nostrum, Caltaxum, Ludovicum de Dieu, Constantinum L'Empereur, Salmasium; eo potissimum nomine, quod Orientalibus studiis intenti, germanam tamen verborum significationem, ut plurimum non deprehendant, ambigua & obscura pro certis & luculentissimis statuant, atque interim ea, quæ in clarissima luce versantur, quod ipsorum commenta radicitus extirpent, omnino fraterent. Verum non aliam defensionem tum sui, tum virorum horum doctissimorum, quos eâdem accusatione involverat adversarius, Hottingerus paravit, quam in memoriam revocatis Ecchellensi errorum plaustris, quæ ipsi à contribulibus Flavigneo, Grabiele Sionita, Johanne Morino objecta sunt; nec non ex proprio ingenio demonstratis notoriis sphalmatis [illegible] in tractatu Arabico-Latino, Synopsis propugnaculum sapientiæ Arabum Philosophorum inscripto, ac versi genium Arabicæ linguæ admisit.

(I) Mr. Claude took his part.] 'I relate the 'History (l) chiefly upon the Credit of Allatius, 'who took a particular care to inform himself, and 'who being a Greek by Nation, is more credible 'than the Dutch or Swiss Ministers, and Hottinger amongst others, who is one of the most 'Passionate and Unsincere Writers I ever read. They are Mr. Arnauld's Words (m); and this is Mr. Claude's Answer. (n) 'Why would Mr. Arnauld have us rather believe Allatius than Hottinger? The first has all the Characters of a Dissembling Man; the latter on the contrary, whatever Mr. Arnauld may say, has all the marks of a Man of sincerity, who speaks things as he knows 'em. The first is more Polite, I confess it; but the other has more Simplicity. Allatius says of his own Head whatever he pleases; Hottinger brings his Witnesses.

(A) His Family is very Antient, &c.] He descended from Cornelius de HUYBERT, and Joan de Haemstede. The Family of Haemstede Descended from Witte de Haemstede Natural Son to Floris Earl of Holland and Zeland, Lord of Friesland &c. and from a Daughter of the Lord Heusden a very considerable House in that time. That Maid had too much Complaisance for Count Floris; but it was under the promise of Marriage. Jacob and Herman de HUYBERT Sons of Cornelius, Commanded the Fleet that carried the Arch-Duke Philip and his Wife into Spain in the Year 1506. These two August Persons were on Board these two Brothers: The Fleet which was very Numerous, met with a dreadful Tempest in the Channel; several Ships were lost in the sight of the Arch-Duke, and yet by reason of some difference betwixt him and the King of England, he would not consent to put into any English Port. But when the two Brothers HUYBERT represented to him the extream Danger they were in, and that it was absolutely necessary to make into Weymouth Haven, he and his Queen submitted to their Advice and good Conduct. Then it was that he gave them this Motto WAECKT HUYBERTS. That is to say, AWAKE HUYBERTS. The Emperor Maximilian, and the Arch-Duke Charles, to Express their great satisfaction for the Services they had done to the King of Castile, their Son and Father, on the thirteenth of March 1513, Honoured the three Brothers John, Jacob, and Herman de HUYBERT, and their Posterity with the Privilege of wearing a Sword, permitting to each of 'em to have three Domesticks that should wear it likewise: Which was a very great Honour at that time. John and Herman were sent Times, the Rights and Preeminences of the State, and the Laws and Privileges of the Country, against all those that should attempt their Violation: Whereby this Employment becomes very Intricate and Laborious: Nevertheless he discharged the Duties of it 23 years and an half with a general Applause, and to the great satisfaction of his Masters, who deputing him the 17th. of September 1687. to the great Council of State, express'd in his Commission, that they were very well satisfied with his long and faithful Services, of which they should ever preserve a favourable Remembrance. We must not forget that he was Created Plenipotentiary of the United Provinces in the Year 1667. for the Treaty of * Breda. He Died at the Hague the seventh of January 1697. He was always observed to have an unshaken Zeal for the Religion Establish'd by the Laws of the State. He was its Defender on all Occasions, and could never suffer any Alteration to be made in it, either in the Doctrine or Discipline †. I will speak (B) of his three Sons in the Remarks. They have Buried him in a Chappel of the Church of Burgh in Zeland, on whose Tomb ‡ is Ingraved the Epitaph, which may be seen in the Remark (C).

HUNGARY (Mary Queen of) Sister of the Emperor Charles V. was Married in the Year 1511. to Lewis King of Hungary, who unfortunately lost his Life at the Battle of Mo[illegible] in the Year 1526. His Widow was made Governess of the Low-Countries [illegible]21, and shew'd a great deal (A) of Courage and Prudence in her Regency. The Emperor Charles V. being in the Town of Z[illegible], Lod'k in the House of Lieven Jacobsen de HUYBERT, who was Overseer of the Dike[illegible] the three Brothers settled in the same Town, and Built each of them a House, which are still the largest and most considerable Buildings of Zierickzee (a).

Juan Christoval Calvete de Estrella makes an Honourable mention of this Family: y no poco nombrados, says he (p), eran los Huyberts de Ciriexea por su valor y nobleza, that is, The Huyberts were very famous for their Valour and their Riches.

The Author of the Supplement to the Chronicle of the Abbot of Urspeng mentions him, that Conducted the Arch-Duke Philip into Spain: the Name he gives him, does not agree with the Memorial which I have quoted: However, here is what he says. (a) Carolus Quintus redit in Hispanias, Johannes Cornelius nauta navigatione decem dierum ab Anglico littore vehit. Hic nauta regem Philippum illustrissimi Augusti patrem, ultima navigatione in summa tempestate in Hispanias vexerat, & reginam Danorum una cum Principe Ultrajectino in Daniam vexerat. Vir dives & peritissimus rei nauticæ.

(B) I will speak of his three Sons.] The Eldest is Antony de HUYBERT Lord of Gruyningen, Councellor in the Sovereign Court of Justice. The second is John de HUYBERT Lord of Noorgawe. He took to Arms, in which his good Conduct and Valour advanc'd him to the Post of Lieutenant (b) General of Horse. The third has been Councellor in the Council of Flanders, and at present is one of the Directors of the East India Company (c).

(C) An Epitaph which may be seen, &c.] It contains in very noble Expressions, an Abstract of his Life and the Character of his Soul.

(A) A great deal of Courage and Prudence.] Consult Brantome who tells you, (k) 'that this Queen 'of Hungary was very useful to the Emperor, 'and 'that she proved so very serviceable to him, that one 'can't tell how he could have done without her, 'and that he so depended upon her in all the Affairs 'of the Government, that when the Emperor himself was in Flanders he put all the Affairs of the 'Low-Countries into her Hands, and that the Council 'was held under her and at her House. 'Tis true 'that she, who was a great Politician, informed 'him of all that passed in the Council in 'his Absence, which was a great Pleasure to 'him. She made noble Wars there sometimes 'by her Lieutenants, sometimes in Person, always 'on Horseback, as a Valiant Amazon. What he says (l) of the Speech she made on the Day of the Abdication, is very curious. We have here a Proof, that Women are capable of Reigning well.

(B) She wonderfully lov'd Magnificence.] Brantome (m) says, that when Philip II. went to take Possession of the Low-Countries, the most sumptuous Entries that can be imagined were made for him; but adds he, the Queen of Hungary surpast them all in her Houses at Rains and Marimont. He afterwards describes the Siege of a Place, which the Queen represented to divert the Emperor and all her Court, in her fine House of Marimont. He says in another Book (a) 'that she Feasted at Rains the Emperor 'Charles and all his Court, when his Son King 'Philip came from Spain to Flanders to see her, 'where the Magnificence was so great that nothing 'was so much talked of then as les fiestas de Rains, 'as the Spaniards call'd it: Which puts me in Mind 'that in the Journey to Bayonne, tho' the Magnificence 'was never so great, the running at the King, 'Combats, Masquerades and Expences that were 'seen, were nothing, if compar'd with le fiestas de Rains, as some old Spanish Gentlemen, who had 'seen them report'd.

(C) Was extreamly pleased with Hunting.] She (b) accompanied her Husband every where, 'even 'when he went a Hunting, for which she had a 'wonderful Passion; also afterwards being Regent 'of the Low-Countries for her Brother the Emperor Charles V. she often quitted her agreeable 'Residence in her Palaces of Mechlen and Brussels, 'to live in the Country at Marimont, and in her 'Houses near the Forests; where from Morning 'till Night she diverted her self with Hunting. 'For which reason the Flemings called her the 'Huntress, and Painted her like Diana: She Communicated that Inclination to her Niece Margaret 'of Austria, Dutchess of Parma, who has been also 'Governess of the Low-Countries. She had Inherited a Passion for the laborious Exercises of 'Hunting from her Grandmother by her Father's side, Mary Dutchess of Burgundy, Wife of the 'Emperor Maximilian I. who being a Hunting, '(with which she almost every Day diverted her 'self) fell from her Horse, and Died to the great 'grief of the Flemings and the Emperor her Husband, who lost also his second Wife Blanca 'Sforza by the same Misfortune. This seems to be 'the Translation of these Words of Strada: *Capessatus venandi studio summopere Gubernatrix, plane ut Venatricem vulgo appellarent, habitumque venatricis expingerent: neptem videlicet Mariæ Burgundæ, quæ ab infestandis feris nunquam destitit, donec inter venandum equo excussa (1) vitam amisit, fato non tam suo, quam Maximiliani mariti, cujus & uxor altera, Blanca Sforzia, in venatione equo decidit, (2) obitque. (D) To Moderate the Punishment of the Protestants.] When to appease the Malecontents of the Low-Countries, the Court of Spain promised them the Suspension of the Inquisition in the year 1566, it was added that the Imperial Laws which Condemned Hereticks to Death, should be Mitigated, as they had been in the year 1550. at the Request of the Queen of Hungary. Immo sic Cæsarem fatturum fuisse si viveret, quando ipse ob similes difficultates anno millesimo quingentesimo quinquagesimoque, postulante Mariâ Hungariæ Reginâ ejus sorore, eadem pœnas quas ante statuerat, emendare ac lenire non inutile aut indecorum arbitratus est (d).

(E) To Revenge her self for some Songs.] Here is what we find in Brantome upon this Subject. (e) 'I have heard say, that the chief Reason, that 'moved the Queen of Hungary to Burn Picardy and 'other Parts of France, was the Insolence of some 'Babblers and Story-tellers, who spoke commonly of 'her Amours, and Sung every where the Barbanson 'of the Queen of Hungary, which was a very unmannerly thing. By this we see that People are Fated to bear the Punishment non only (f) of the Follies of their Soveraigns, but also of many others. I shall set down a Passage which does not seem to be full enough. (g) There was a great hatred between Henry II. and the Queen of Hungary, the occasion whereof I do not know; but only that the French Soldiers had made Songs of her, and of Barbanson the finest Lord of her Court. It was an easy thing to supply what's wanting in this Discourse; it was but saying that this Queen set on Fire several Places of Picardy, without sparing the Royal House of Folembrai. By this we understand the reason of their Personal Hatred on both sides. Mary doubtless believed, that Henry Applauded these Songs, and she Personally hated him for it. Henry on the other side took for a Personal Affront the Burning of his House of Pleasure. I know not what we are to believe of the Gallantries of this Princess; I only remember what Brantome says (h), that she was very handsome and Agreeable, and very amiable, altho' she appeared somewhat Manly; but as for Love, she was not the worse for it, nor for War, which she made her Principal Exercise.

If you desire to know when she made these Ravages in Picardy; you need only cast your Eyes on the following Words. (i) 'Whilst the Emperor her 'Brother was Besieging Metz, she came with the 'Count de Reux into Picardy to hinder the King 'from Succouring the Besieged, where she made a 'great Havock and Burnt Noyon, Nesle, Chauny, Roye, Folembray, a Royal House Built by King 'Francis I. and ruined above seven or eight hundred Villages; she laid Siege to Hesin and took 'it.

(i) Hilar. de Coste ubi supra, p. 567. There is in the Margin: 'which occa- 'sion'd 'the com- 'mon say- 'ing, Elle a fait la folle en Bray, elle a esté Marieen Bourg, when the French burnt that Town. But it is a difficult thing to understand this Marginal Note; there is no Sence in it: Perhaps it should be marrie, instead of Marie.

(F) Henry knew how to be even with her.] Having taken Marienburg and Dinant, and Raz'd Bouvines, whose Inhabitants were either Hanged or put to the Sword, he passed the Sambre, and Ruined the Hainault, 'and Burnt Marimont a Country 'Seat, Built by the Queen of Hungary; and the 'Pretty Town of Bains (l) with the Magnificent 'Palace she had built there, adorned with Infinite 'Pictures, Antick Statues, and Works of Sculpture. 'The Antient Town of Bavets, of whose Antiquity and Greatness, the Old Chroniclers have told a 'thousand Stories, suffered a like Desolation. These 'Burnings and Destructions were very far from the 'Temper of Henry II; but he thought himself in 'Honour oblig'd thus to Revenge the Ruin of his 'Castle of Folembray, and the Affront of the Flemings, who had two Days together expos'd on the 'same Place to the Insolence of the Black-Guards a 'Picture of the Great King Francis his Father. I add to this Testimony of Mezeray that of Brantome, which contains more Circumstances. 'Twas she 'that first began the great Conflagration in our 'France, and made Bon-Fires of our fine Houses 'and Castles, as of that of Folembra, a fine and 'agreeable House for the Sport and Pleasure of 'Hunting; which gave the King so much Indignation and Discontent, that sometime after he paid 'her in her own Coin, Revenging himself upon the 'fine House of Bains, which was reckoned the 'wonder of the World, surpassing (as I have heard 'those relate who have seen it in its perfection) 'the seven wonders of the World, so Renown'd in 'Antiquity (m). There was in this Queen's Chamber (n) a Suit of Hangings of Gold, Silver and Silk, wherein were Figur'd and Represented to the Life all the Conquests and Expeditions of Charles V. (o) 'In a Word, there was nothing in it but what was 'most admirable: But the poor House quickly after 'lost its Glory; for it was Totally Pillag'd, Ruined 'and Raz'd. I have heard say, that its Mistress, 'when she knew the Ruin of it, fell into such Anguish, Indignation, and Rage, that she could not 'for a long time Recover her self; and coming one 'Day near it, desirous to see its Ruins, and looking upon it very Pitifully with Tears in her 'Eyes, she Swore that all France should Repent of 'it, and that she should never be at ease till the 'fine Fontaine-bleau, which was so highly valued 'should be levelled with the Ground, and not a Stone 'left upon another. And indeed she Discharged 'her Rage upon poor (p) Picardy, and I believe if 'a Truce had not interven'd, her Vengeance had 'been Excessive; for she had a Heart that was great 'and could not easily be softned; and she was 'thought to be somewhat inclin'd to Cruelty. But 'such is the Nature of Women, especially of great 'Ones, who are too eager for Revenge, when they 'are Offended. The Emperor, as it is said, loved her 'the better for it. Some Historians say, that Henry II. had an Inscription Ingraved on a Stone, which Argued this Queen's Folly, and made her remember Follembray. Bincium Mariæ Hungariæ Reginæ olim deliciæ, Henrici secundi Galliarum Regis odium ex-

(G) To make her a Prisoner.] Brantome tells us this. (b) 'I have heard say, says he, that the late 'King Henry II. desired nothing so much as to take 'the Queen of Hungary Prisoner, not to treat her 'Ill, tho' she had given him many occasions by her 'Burnings; but to have the Glory of keeping that 'Queen a Prisoner, and to see what Countenance 'and Constancy she should shew in her Prison, and 'whether she would be so Brave and Haughty as in 'Arms: For, there's nothing so Lofty and Brave as 'a great Lady when she pleases, and has Courage 'as she had; and she was much pleased with the 'Name the Spanish Soldiers had given her, who, 'as they called the Emperor her Brother el Padre de los soldados, called her la madre: Just as Victoria or Victorina, in the Old Time of the Romans, was 'called in her Armies the Mother of the Camp (c).

(H) Maliciously made a very strange Fault.] The Book which Erasmus Dedicated to her in the year 1529, is Intituled Vidua Christiana. The Author Declares, she was wonderfully pleased with the Reading of Latin Books. Cæsaris germana Maria Latinos codices habebat in deliciis, cui nuper scripsi Viduam Christianam. Id efflagitarat à me quidam Ecclesiastes illi charissimus. Scena rerum humanarum invertitur, monachi literas nesciunt, & fœminæ libris indulgent (d). She was then in Austria, from whence she retired a little after into Moravia (e), not thinking her self safe at Vienna, by reason of Solyman's Irruption. But to come to the Malicious Fault of the Printers, you must know they were vexed they had not received the New-years Gift they expected from the Author. Hereupon the greatest Toper of them all undertook to be Reveng'd, and found a means for it, which vexed Erasmus Heartily, and which can't be Translated into another Language. We must therefore be contented with the Original. (f) *Nuper cùm inter imprimendum excusores aliquot conquesti fuissent me sibi xenia nondum persolvisse, exortus est inter eos quidam cæteris vinolentior, qui profiteretur se pœnas à me exacturum, ni darem: atque id profectò veterator tam egregiè effecit, ut aureis nummis trecentis redimere eam ignominiam voluissem. (I) Father Hilarion de Coste has Committed.] He says (g) that our Queen of Hungary was Born at Brussels the thirteenth of September 1513. Which is false and impossible, since the Arch-Duke her Father Died in 1506. Queen Mary did not live continually (i) at Linz in Austria, during the years 1527, 1528, 1529, 1530. I have cited (k) Erasmus, who assures us that in 1529. she retired into Moravia. IV. She did not Govern the Low-Countries 28. years (l), but 24, (m) namely from 1531, to 1555. The Author I Confute Contradicting himself. Confesses Page 569. that this Government lasted but 25. years; but he has committed many faults there. V. He supposes that the Queen of Hungary Resigned her Government into her Brother's Hands in October 1557. It was the the 25*th.* of October in 1555. VI. He supposes that Margaret of Austria Governess of the Netherlands Died in 1532. It was in the year 1530. In the Elogy (n) of this Princess, he makes her to be Born the tenth of January 1480. and to Die (o) the first of December 1532, Aged 51 years. Is this to have a skill in Counting? VII. He supposes that the Queen of Hungary began her Government of the Low-Countries in 1532. It was the year before. VIII. He supposes, that when she Resigned this Government to her Brother, she made a long Speech to the People. This is not the Name that should be given to that Assembly, before which Charles V. Renounc'd his Kingdoms.

He has been a more faithful Transcriber of one of the Faults of this Monk: He says after him, that this Queen Governed the Low-Countries 25. years till 1557. when she went over into Spain. I have already said, that she Governed them but from the year 1531. to the 25*th.* of October 1555, and I add, that she went into Spain in the year 1556. Moreri should not have said that she Married Lewis Jagellon King of Hungary, when she was very young: for she was then eighteen years Old. Moreri's Expression would make one believe that she was Younger. 'Tis known that the Daughters and Sisters of Kings are sometimes Married before they are ten years Old.

(A) He Drank to Excess, which occasioned his Death.] He was gone into Transylvania to suppress a Sedition that the Favourites of Ferdinand had raised there. Stephen Mailats the most Obstinate amongst them, was retired (r) to 'the 'Castle of Fogaras to wait for the Succours which 'Ferdinand sent him, under the Conduct of Ar-'dasdy. The King Besieged him in it, and took 'him after a long Siege. In the meantime there 'comes a Courier, who brought him the News of 'the Birth of a Son which God had given him. 'This News being agreeable to all that want 'Children, and especially to Persons far in years; 'we may imagine that John received it very Joy-'fully: it made him fall into an Excess, Drink-'ing like an Hungarian, and this Excess increa-'sing his Distemper, he Died at Sassebes a few 'Days after the Birth of his Son in the 53*d* year 'of his Age.

said Month. Isabella being not able to keep the Crown for her Son, which Ferdinand would Deprive him of, implor'd the Protection of the Ottoman Port, from whence she receiv'd so great Succours, that Ferdinand's Army which Besieg'd Buda, was cut in Pieces. Solyman came in Person into Hungary to bring Ferdinand to Reason. He caress'd (B) Isabella's little Child, and alledged very honourable Excuses (C) for his not visiting her. But he quickly discovered his wicked Designs; he made himself Master of Buda, and forced Isabella * to retire to Lippa. 'Twas a cruel Mortification to that Princess, who was fond of Dominion. The Hopes of seeing him restore the Kingdom of Hungary to her Son, when he should come to Age; those Hopes I say, grounded on the Promises of Solyman, were but a poor Consolation. She expressed a great deal of Constancy in that unhappy Trial, and comforted her self as well as she could, with the Title of Regent of Transylvania, which Solyman had left her; but as he made George Martinusius her Co-Adjutor, she met with a Thousand Causes of Vexation in her Regency. It was but a Name; the Authority being intirely in the Hands of this Monk George †. An open rupture ensued, the Consequences whereof compleated the Ruin of Isabella's Authority; for his Adversary, supported by Ferdinand, introduced a fine Army, commanded by a very cunning Italian ‡, who managed Things so dexterously, that he engaged this Queen to give up Transylvania to King Ferdinand, in the Year 1551, after which she retired to Cassovia. 'Twas in her Passage thither, that she wrote some Latin Words upon a Tree (D), which are mentioned by Historians. She was a restless Woman; she staid but little at Cassovia. She went from thence into Silesia, and then into Poland, to Bonna Sforza her Mother, and Sigismund Augustus her Brother. She kept Intelligence with the Grandees of Transylvania, to attempt the regaining that Country. She had Recourse again to the Protection of Solyman, and used so many Devices, that she return'd into Transylvania, in the Year 1556. There she lived till her Death, and kept the

(B) He caressed Isabella's little Child.] I'll use here the Words of the Author I have cited in the foregoing Remark. 'Solyman (a) sent Presents to 'the young King ——— in treating the Queen to 'let him see her Son, assuring her, it was only to 'oblige his Children to love him the more. At the 'same time the Deputies were ordered to tell her, 'that if he did not visit her, 'twas for fear his 'Visit might injure her Reputation. The Queen 'thanked the Grand-Seignor for his Civility, and 'wavering in her Mind, whether she ought to send 'her Son or not. George Martinusius told her, that 'she could not refuse it. Being then overcome by 'Necessity, she put him into a Cradle worthy of 'such a Child; and ordering the Nurse and some 'other Matrons, and many Hungarian Lords to ac'company him, she sent him to the Camp. Soly'man designing to do him Honour, received him 'with a Troop of Horse, saw him, caressed him, 'and made his Children do the like. Hilarion de Coste (a) in his Elogy of our Queen Isabella, is very particular about these things. 'Solyman, says he, sent 'the young King three Horses of an extraordinary 'Beauty, with Trappings adorned with Gold, Pearls 'and precious Stones, and also very rich Plumes and 'Vestments of Cloth of Gold. He also sent to the 'Principal Lords and Barons Chains of Gold, and 'rich Turkish Robes ——— The Queen put her 'Son into a Gilt and very Rich Coach, with his 'Nurse and some Ladies, who had dress that little 'Prince to Advantage, that he might be more agree'able to him ——— The Ottoman Prince sent some 'Troops of Horse nobly equipped, and some Bands 'of Janissaries to meet him, and give him an ho'nourable Reception and Entertainment.' As soon 'as these Troops had saluted the King of Hunga'ry, they placed him in the midst of them, to 'conduct him with that Pomp to the Emperor, who 'as soon as he saw this little Prince, expressed a 'great Affection to him, and received him very 'passionately, both as a Vassal of the Ottoman 'House, and as the Son of John, King of 'Pannonia, whom he had greatly loved and ho'noured, having protected him against Ferdinand, 'King of Bohemia, and the Emperor Charles V. 'He commanded his Sons, Bajazet and Selim, who 'were then in his Camp, to do the like. They 'were the Sons of the beautiful Rose, or 'Roxelana. This Author pretends (b) that Soly'man had a 'mind to know whether this Child was 'a Son or a Daughter; for there was a Report spread 'in the Turkish Army, that it was the latter, and 'that for this Reason Isabella Jagellon had 'him brought up secretly.

(C) Alledged very honourable Excuses.] I have already said, that he assured this Princess, 'that the 'Reason of his not seeing her, was the Injury that 'his Visit might do her Reputation. This was a very civil Reason; for 'tis certain, that an Interview betwixt Solyman and this Queen, would have occasioned much obloquy in the World. Hilarion de Coste makes him alledge other Excuses, which are no ways probable. (c) 'They told also this Prin'cess, that Solyman had no less Respect for her, 'than for her Son, as well for her own Merit, as 'for being the Daughter of Sigismund King of Po'land, whom he called his Father; and that if it 'was lawful for him by his Law to visit her, he 'would not have failed in it: which was the Rea'son he could not invite her into his Tents, and he in'treated her to send only her Son with his Nurse (d). If Solyman's Religion had forbidden him to receive Isabella in his Tents, would it have permitted him to receive the young Prince's Nurse, and the Ladies who accompanied him (e)?

(D) That she wrote some Latin Words upon a Tree.] Thuanus observes in relating this, that she was a Learned (f) Woman. (g) Qua (Regina) statim, ne privata in eo regno, cui summo cum imperio præfuisset, diutius viveret, convasatis rebus suis per montes asperos Cassoviam versus iter direxit. Cum propter angustiæ viarum inter silvas de curru descendere cogeretur, dum auriga currum traduceret, ipsa retro in Daciam respiciens, pristini culminis, è quo decidrat, memor altum corde suspirium duxisse dicitur, & cum aliud non posset litterata fœmina, inscripto arbori nomine, hæc addidisse, SIC FATA VOLUNT, eoque relicto justi doloris monumento, rursus currum conscendit, institutum Iter persequitur. Hilarion de Coste deserves to be copied, by reason of the Particulars to which he descends. (h) 'As 'that virtuous but unfortunate Princess was going 'to Cassovia through the troublesome and difficult 'Roads of those Countries, she was forced in an ug'ly Passage to light from her Coach. Whilst the 'Coachman was busied in getting out the Coach 'from that bad Place, which was near a Wood; this 'Heroine, being as learned as she was valiant, look'ed back on Transylvania which she had left; and 'remembring the Honours she had received there, 'and the Condition she was in, could not forbear 'fetching a deep Sigh, and leaving on the Bark of 'a Tree these Three Words, shewing thereby her 'just Grief, and Knowledge of the Latin Tongue: 'SIC FATA VOLUNT: So fate will have 'it; as it is related by Thuanus, and many other 'Historians (i). Martin Fumée, Sieur de Genille, 'has described it in this manner, saying, that Queen 'Isabella passing over the Mountain which separates 'Transylvania from Hungary, and going down a rug'ged and difficult Hill, which her Coach could not 'pass through for the Badness of the way, 'was forced to go down on Foot with her La'dies, not without much Trouble and Inconvenience, as well by reason of the Roughness of the 'Ways, as of a great Shower which overtook her, 'with which she was wet thorough. The poor 'Queen

HUNNIUS (Giles) born in a Village of the Country of Wirtemberg, the 21st. of December 1550, was one of the most Famous Divines of the Augsburg Confession. He studied Divinity at Tubingen, under James Andreas, Brentius the Son, and two other Professors; and he grew so Eminent in the Five Years he spent in that University, that he was thought capable of Professing Divinity at Marpurg, at Twenty Six Years of Age. He answered the Advantageous Opinion they had entertained of his Learning: For upon some Lectures and Sermons that he made † at Marpurg, the Landgrave being resolved to retain him, recommended him in a very honourable manner to the Duke of Wirtemberg, to be promoted to his Doctor's Degree. Hunnius returned to Tubingen, where he was admitted Doctor of Divinity a few Months after his Marriage, the 16th. of July, 1576. During the first six Years of his Professorship, he published no Books against the Calvinists; but otherwise (A) he was continually at War with them, and did not spare them in his Academical Disputations. At last he (B) wrote against them in the Year 1584. and got such a Reputation, that in the Year 1592, he was invited

Queen of Hungary, as she went along, complained of her ill Fortune, which not content to be contrary to her in great Things, would also afflict her in little ones, and attributing this Disgrace which happened to her in passing over that high and difficult Mountain, to the obstinate Malice of her Destiny, she took a Knife, and a little to solace her Affliction and extream Sorrow, wrote with the Point of it on the Bark of a great Tree, under which she retired to rest her self a little, and avoid the Rain, (which fell in great Abundance,) these Latin Words: SIC FATA VOLUNT, and below, Isabella Regina: So the Fates will have it, Queen Isabella. There's reason to believe, that she wrote not this Inscription without murmuring and Reflecting upon Divine Providence; for in the Speech she made in parting her self of her Royalty, she ended with very sad Complaints against Destiny. 'Although inconstant Fortune, 'said she (l), according to the cruel Mutations with 'which she thrives and confounds at her Pleasure 'the Things of this World, hath so chang'd mine, 'that [illegible] my Son and my self are obliged to 'leave this Kingdom, &c. This was to reproach the Providence of God, and accuse him of Cruelty, as the Heathens did in their Misfortunes.

Atque Deos atque astra vocat crudelia mater.

Probably our Princess thought to leave on the Bark of this Tree, a Monument of the Injustice she believ'd she received from Heaven, and to acquaint all the Passengers with the Courage she had to complain of it.

(E) And kept the Authority as much as she could, without imparting it to her Son.] This may be proved by the Remonstrance that Henry II. made to this Princess. John (a) James de Cambrai, Dean of Bourges, Ambassador of this Prince, had assured her as he went to Constantinople, that she should receive from France all the Succours she could desire, 'Which obliged her to send into France Chr. Stopher '(b) Bathori on an Embassy ——— to thank the 'Most Christian King for his Favour and good Affection. Bathori was well received by Henry II. 'and sent back with Peter Francus Martinez into 'Transylvania, where they assured Queen Isabella 'on the part of his Most Christian Majesty, of the 'Alliance he would make with her by the Marriage of one of his Daughters with her only Son 'King John Sigismund, who was Seventeen Years 'of Age; upon Condition that he should be bred up, 'and educated like a Prince, and she should not suffer near him so many Women and Men of mean 'Birth, who are not fit to be entertained near young 'Princes, and that she should admit him to the 'Knowledge of her Affairs. Petrovitz, and most 'of the Lords of Isabella's Council, approved the 'Reasons of the Most Christian King in her 'Majesty's Presence, and said aloud to the Embassador of France, That they had already remonstrated 'this to the Queen their Mistress; who began then 'to suspect that Embassy, and thought those Lords 'had given this Advice to the King of France. She consulted her Mother, who made her this Answer. (c) 'Daughter, keep always the Power in 'your own Hands, don't give so much Authority 'to your Son; which you will lose as soon as you 'marry him to the Daughter of so Potent a Monarch as that of France. Isabella following the 'unhappy Counsel of Queen Bonna her Mother, 'entered not into Alliance with the French King, 'and ever since had an Aversion for those who advised her to shew the Armies to the King, and 'to give him an insight into the Affairs of the 'Kingdom, and to send him to Varadin. She gave 'the Command of all her Armies to Michael Bellassi, an imperious Man; Which was not agreeable 'to her Subjects, who desired that she would make 'choice of a Commander more tractable and condescending.

(F) The Biggots vainly endeavour to excuse that Conduct.] As there is no Passion but they justify at the Expence of Religion, they made use of this admirable Cloak to conceal our Isabella's Ambition. 'Here are the Words of a Monk, who cites Florimond de Remond; (d) The Authors, who have 'written in Favour of this virtuous Princess, say, 'that she did not look with a kind Eye on the great 'Lords of Hungary and Transilvania; particularly, 'Petrouwiz was odious to her, because of his professing Luther's Heresie; and that under Pretence 'of giving him light into the Affairs of his State, 'they designed to remove him from the Queen his 'Mother, to make him more easily quit the true 'and old Religion, for a new and a false one. Which 'he did after the decease of the Queen his Mother. Father Maimbourg (e) says, that John Sigismund durst not declare for the Hereticks in his Mother's Life-time; but that was not the only Reason, but also because Soliman (f) 'had written to the 'Queen, that new Sects should not be suffer'd to 'be introduced into the Kingdom, for fear of disturbing the Peace of it, by dividing Mens Minds 'upon so nice a Point as that of Religion. (g) 'But the Queen dying soon after, and Selim, who 'troubled not himself about these Disturbances of 'Religion, succeeding her Father Soliman, who 'died of an Apoplexy at the Siege of Zyget, the 'Lutherans, the Calvinists and Arrians returned into Transilvania, and under the Protection of Petrouwitz, took more Liberty than ever.

(CA) To do the same in Silesia.] This is witnessed by Melchior Adam. (e) Fridericus IV. Lignicensium & Brigensium in Silesia Dux, Hunnii potissimum opera ac studio usus, Ecclesiarum Lignicensium per Silesiam reformationem suscepit atque perfecit; ejecto inde Leonhardo Krentzheimio, Lignicensium tunc Superintendente; cui Calvinismi crimen impingebatur.

(D) Huberus about Election.] This Man had been Minister of a Village near Bern; and having examined the Acts of the Conference (f) of Montbeliard, he found four Articles in Beza's Doctrine, which he thought repugnant to the Scripture: 1. That Jesus Christ did not die for all Men. 2. That most Men are excluded from the Promises of Grace. 3. That the Cause of the Damnation of the Reprobate, is the sole good Pleasure of God, who created 'em on purpose to shew in them the Power of his Anger. 4. That no Body can know whether Baptism regenerates Children. He had the Courage to contradict these four Articles: but he was expelled for his Boldness; Musculus and Grynæus having successfully worked his Expulsion. He retired into the Country of Wirtemberg, where he obtained a Church, after having embraced the Augsburg Confession. Being made known to the Elector of Saxony, by some Books he published, he was invited to Wittemberg to profess Divinity. By much refuting the Swiss Protestants about the Doctrine of Predestination, he ran into another Extream, so far as to teach publickly, that God has elected all Men to Eternal Life. Hunnius and his Colleagues gave him notice of his Error, and as he did not correct it, he was expelled. He went from thence to Ratisbonne, where he had some Conferences with some Divines: he continued obstinate in his Errors, and published some Books at Spire to maintain 'em. This was the 14th. Schism of the Lutheran Church (g). Such was the Man that our Hunnius had to deal with. He was so happy as to triumph over his Enemy, for he got him deprived of his Place; but he exposed himself to some Suspicions of Heterodoxy, and was obliged to write in his Justification. Read in the Margin the Words of Calixtus (h), and what follows. Fortem se & fidum purioris doctrinæ hyperaspistem, adversus inanes Huberi nævias eo tempore præstitit Hunnius, dum partim monendo, partim scribendo, errantem Huberum in viam revocare studuit: quod ipsa res loquitur, & monumenta hac de controversia bene multa edita; hâc primis verò ille tractatus Hunnii de providentiâ & prædestinatione filiorum Dei, satis luculenter testantur. Dissidio autem illo Huberi remotione sopito, prodiit anno nonagesimo septimo epistola, qua variorum errorum, de cœnâ Domini, de baptismo, de libero arbitrio, de personâ Christi, de æterna prædestinatione fuit insimulatus. Hinc igitur Hunnius eodem anno refutavit: ut & eos qui in Anhaltinis Ecclesiis altaria, imagines, organa musica, hostias, & alia cæremonias abrogarant (i). I add these last Words, to shew, that Hunnius was not against Altars and Images, and many Romish Ceremonies, which were detested by other Lutherans.

(E) In the Conference of Ratisbonne.] I am sure that most of my Readers will be glad to be freed from the trouble of consulting another Book, to know in general what this Conference was: Wherefore, I put down here, what Peter Matthieu says of it. '(k) Maximilian Count Palatin of the Rhine, and Duke of Bavaria, and Philip Lewis also, Palatin of the Rhine, and Count of Veldents and Spanheim, Cousins, and related by Blood, but very much divided and disunited in Religion, resolved, in order to reunite themselves in the same Belief, and to bring their Subjects to the same Confession and Profession of Faith, to assemble at Ratisbonne the greatest and most famous Divines of Germany of both Religions, that by an amicable Conference they might clear the Difficulties, that were the Cause of that unhappy Schism. The Dispute was only upon this Thesis, Whether the Holy Scripture be a sufficient Rule for things necessary to Salvation. The Catholick Disputants were four Professors in Divinity of the University of Paris, (l), one of which was a Jesuit. For the Protestants there were Fifteen Divines, as well of the Palatinate of the Rhine, as of the Duchies of Saxony, Brandenburg and Wirtemberg—— The Presidents were the two Princes, and the Speakers Gretzerus a Jesuit, and Heilbrun a Minister——The (m) Conference took up Fourteen Sessions, in which they largely and warmly discourfed of the Power of a Judge, but not very clearly, since that verbal Dispute was followed by many Apologies in Writing. I insert here this Marginal Note of Peter Matthieu. 'Upon this Dispute of Ratisbonne, says he, besides the Acts and Registers of the Sessions, Day by Day, we have a Book with this Title: Analysis Dialectica Colloquii Ratisbonensis, anno 1601. de norma & judice omnium controversiarum fidei Christianæ habiti.

(k) Matthieu, hist. de la paix, Book 4. ad ann. 1601. p. m. 134.
(l) Matthieu is mistaken. Cayet Hist. de la paix pag. 290. says we in the 1st between he says, that the Divines of the Duke of Bavaria were Hunger and Tanner Doctors of the Faculty of Paris, and Gretser a Jesuit. Tanner had been a Jesuit ever since he was 18 Years of Age, and consequently he was not Doctor of the Faculty of Paris.

This Historian's Thought upon these verbal Disputes, is pleasant enough. 'When I consider, says 'he, (n), the little Advantage that has been reaped 'from these Disputes in several parts of Europe, and 'that the Holy Scripture is the Field in which every 'one thinks he has a right to fight; I can't chuse 'but wish there was some severe Prohibition against 'this vulgar Treatment of it: and it would be well 'if it were taught like Epicurus's Atoms, Pythagoras's Numbers, Plato's Ideas, Aristotle's Entelechia, and the Figures of the Cabalists; that no 'Body might come at the Knowledge of it, but by 'those that are capable of understanding it. Whilst 'every one pretends to be skilled in it, it happens, 'that from the same Flower, the Faithful, like the 'Bee, gather Honey, and the Disobedient like the 'Spider, gather Poison, and many grow mad and 'beastly upon the Beast of St. John's Revelation.

Add to this Passage the Words of Mr. Baillet (o). 'This Conference was like those Battles, wherein 'the Victory is not determined by the Number of 'the Dead. Each Party pretended to have come off 'with Advantage; and Relations were made of it 'on both Sides, and Treatises in Latin and High-Dutch, above Twenty in Number. Amongst these Writings I have found one in the vulgar 'Tongue,

Year following the 4th. of April †. He was prolifick (F) both in Books and Children. Some of his Sons made themſelves known (G) by their Works; but one of them turned (H) Roman Catholick. There is no Book in which our Hunnius has diſcovered more Prepoſſeſſion and Violence, than in that which (I) he entituled, Calvinus

'Tongue, concerning the Triumph over the Jeſuits, 'printed at Tubingen, a Lutheran Town, in 1603, 'in Quarto, and another in Latin, compoſed by 'Hunnius, and publiſhed at Wittemberg in Saxony 'the ſame Year, in the ſame Size, with this Ti'tle, Epiſtola conſolatoria cum not———Hun'nius endeavoured to revenge his Party, by an An'ti-Tanner——, and an Anti-Gretſer. He had read the Hiſtorical Relation which Father Tanner had made; (p) 'but he was not ſatisfied with an Ac'count prejudicial to his Party. To prevent the 'Effects he feared from the reading of it, he made 'a Counter-relation, that is, an Hiſtory of the 'Conference of Ratisbonne, in his own way, which 'was publiſhed in 1602, at Wittemberg in Saxo'ny. Father Tanner thought he ought not to let 'that Piece paſs unanſwered; and not content with 'reprinting his Relation in Latin and German, at 'Munich in Bavaria, he publiſhed, beſides, ſome 'Reflections upon that of Hunnius, intituled, Ex'amen Narrationis quam Hiſtoricæ Relationis nomine 'inſignitam de Colloquio Ratisbonenſi edidit Ægi'dius Hunnius Prædicans, at Munich. 1602, in 'Quarto. 'Twas againſt this laſt Work that 'Hunnius wrote his Anti-Tanner, which he printed 'the ſame Year at Wittemberg. Father Tanner pub'liſhed a Reply, 'in which he made a Defence 'of his firſt Confutation——and ſome Remarks 'upon the Death of his Author. It appeared at Munich in 1603, in Quarto, intituled Apologeti'cus pro compendiaria relatione de colloquio Ratisbo'nenſi 1601. adverſus Anti-Tannerum cum appendice de morte Ægidii Hunnii. Mr. Baillet (a) obſerves, that Father Gretſer could not forbear making Reflections upon Hunnius's Anti-Gretſer. 'They were 'printed at Ingolſtad ſometime after, and inſerted 'afterwards among ſome of his Works, with this 'Title, Admonitio de Anti-Gretſero. This Jeſuit publiſhed ſome thing elſe againſt the ſame Antago'niſt. (b) Labyrinthus Critico-Hunnianus, hoc eſt, diſputatio de Hunnio Prædicante, genioque Lutherano ſemetipſum contradictionibus implicante & jugulante in aliquot articulis fidei. 1602. & reſponſum ad theſes Hunnianas, de Colloquio Pontificio jucundo (c), una cum ſex digreſſionibus contra ejuſdem Hunnii calumnias, 1602. Note, that the Two Bibliographers of the Jeſuits, aſcribe to Father Tanner a Book, intituled Labyrinthus (d) Critico-Hunnianus, printed at Munich, in 1612. One may very well think there is ſome (e) Miſtake in the Matter. Would two Jeſuits have made uſe of the ſame Title, writing againſt the ſame Adverſary?

ral Oration would not have failed to obſerve it, and would not have ſaid, that 'twas about the year 1584. that Hunnius began to Write againſt the Calviniſts. The Jeſuit Contzen (p) places the Impreſſion of Calvinus Judaizans in the year 1593. and I believe he is in the Right. That which perpleves me, is to ſee in Pareus's Life, that in the year 1595. Giles Hunnius diſturbed the Peace of the Church, by Accuſing the Calviniſts, and John Calvin by Name of Judaizing. I ſet down the Paſſage ſomewhat at large, becauſe we find in it ſome Strokes of our Hunnius's Character in his Adverſaries Judgment: (r) Revertus eſt anno deinceps 1595. turbulentus quidam Gracchus, qui pacem Eccleſiæ livido calamo inquietare paravit, ægrè ferens, Evangelicorum Principum animos à tribunitiis Erebolorum concionibus abhorrere, unionemque ac concordiam Chriſtianam ſerio meditari: quam proinde non alia fabrica melius ſe diſrumpere poſſe ſperavit, quam ſi immani iſto convitio gravaret Eccleſias Reformatas, criminatus eas Judaïzare, ac CALVINUM primipilarem Eccleſiarum Reformatarum Doctorem, Judaicis gloſſis plerasque oracula Veteris Teſtamenti detemerare. Accuſatio hæ tametſi non communem cauſam Eccleſiarum Orthodoxarum tangeret, proprieque eam ſpectaret, cujus Epiſcopus fuiſſet Calvinus, tamen quia per illius latus cætera omnes in capite CHRISTO unita petebantur, propudioſis iſtis calumniis CLYPEUM Veritatis Catholicæ de ſacroſanctâ Trinitate oppoſuit, Eccleſiaſque Orthodoxas, & CALVINUM Electum DEI organon fortiſſimè aſſeruit: adeoque in fumos diſſipavit Judaïca & Arianica illa cymbala In Reading this Concluſion, would not one think that the Controverſy was intirely laid aſleep by Pareus's Anſwer? And yet it is not true. Hunnius replied; and ſo did his Adverſary. Hutterus relates that in 1598. Hunnius Publiſhed (a) two Books againſt Pareus, who had Written for Calvin. Pareus returned to the Charge with a Book 'that 'he (b) Printed at Neuſtadt in 1599. in 8. Intitu'led Orthodoxus Calvinus oppoſitus Pſeudo-Calvino 'Judaizanti. It was Reprinted forty two years 'after at Geneva. This I learn from Mr. Baillet, who thereby brings me into a new Perplexity; for I infer from the Preface of (c) Calvinus Orthodoxus that Pareus Compoſed and Publiſhed it in 1594. He ſays (d) that Calvin had been Dead thirty years, and that this Apology ſhould have come out at Francfort at the Spring Fair (e), if the Authority of the Superiors had not retarded the Impreſſion. He adds (f), they have changed their Mind, and approved my Publiſhing this Book. This plainly ſhews that Calvinus Orthodoxus was Printed in 1594. and yet the Author tells us in the laſt Pages that Samuel Huberus had been Baniſhed from Wirtemberg, which, according to Melchior Adam, did not happen till the year 1595 (g).

One can't forbear asking this Queſtion; Was he perſuaded of what he ſaid, or was he not? Chriſtian Charity obliges us to ſay he was; for otherwiſe we muſt take him for the moſt Wicked Man a live. Let us ſay then, that he ſpoke according to his Perſuaſion, and conclude from thence, that in hot Conſtitutions like his, Zeal is a ſort of Drunkenneſs, which ſo diſorders the Mind, that a Man ſees every thing double (k), and the wrong way. The Prieſteſs of Bacchus, who fell upon her own Son, whom ſhe took for a Wild Boar, (l) whilſt he looked on the Ceremonies of the Feaſt without any Faith, or rather with Contempt, is an Image of the Vertigo's, that ſeize the Zealots. Pareus Aſcribes all this Outrage of Hunnius to the Devil; 'tis the Devil, ſays he (m), that Employs Hunnius as a proper Artiſt to write ſuch Calumnies. *En vero tandem, Chriſtiane Lector, extrema improbitatis Satanæ exemplum. (A) 'Twas in the year 1513.] He was therefore 25 years Old when he began to ſet up for an Author: Moreri is therefore miſtaken, and did not know how to Copy Melchior Adam, when he ſays that Hutten at eighteen years of Age Publiſhed ſeveral Works in Verſe.

(B) He was then in Italy.] I have followed the Chrohe had given many Proofs (C) of his Courage, in the War that the Emperor Maximilian maintained nine years in that Country. At his Return into Germany * he was so Recommended to this Emperor by Conrad Peutinger, that he gave him (D) the Poetical Crown. From that time Hutten caused himself to be Painted, Armed with a Crown of Laurel on his Head, and was infinitely pleased with that Equipage. He went soon after to the Court of the Elector of Mentz, where he Composed a Dialogue Intituled Aula, in 1518. A little after he went to the Diet of Augsburg with the Elector his Master, who received there a Cardinal's Cap. In that Diet Complaints were made against the Duke of Wirtemberg; nor was the Murther of the Marshal of his Court forgotten. These Complaints produced no great Effect; but at last this Prince having Seized the Imperial Town of Reutlingen in January 1519. a League was formed against him in Suabia, which laid not down its Arms, till he was driven out of all his Dominions, which he did not enter again, but fifteen years after. Our Hutten bore Arms in that War. Luther's Cause appearing to him to be good, he warmly Embraced it, and Published Leo X's Bull against Luther in 1520. with Interlineary and Marginal Glosses, in which † he turned the Pope into Ridicule. The Liberty wherewith he Wrote (E) against the Disorders of the Court of Rome, extreamly Provoked Leo, and induced him to Command the Elector of Mentz to send him to Rome bound Hand and Foot. Hutten (F) retired from that Court, and went into the Low-Countries to that of Charles V; but he staid not long there, having notice that his Life was in Danger. There is some Probability, that he retired then into the Fortress of Ebernburg; for there he Wrote in 1520. his Complaint to the Emperor, to the Electors of Mentz and Saxony, and all the States of Germany, against the Attempts that were made upon him by the Pope's Emissaries. 'Twas from the same Place he Wrote to Luther, ‡ in May 1521. and sent out several Pieces in favour of the Reformation. 'Tis not well known, when he left this Castle; but 'tis certain, that in the Month of January 1523. (G) he was gone from Basil, where he thought to find a safe Retreat; but he found himself exposed to great Dangers there. Erasmus having excused himself from receiving his Visit, for fear of Heightning the Suspicions, that were raised against him, and for fear of something else, which he (H) afterwards Confessed, found himself Attacked soon

(a) Præfatione ad Principes German. ut bellum Turcis inferant, apud Melch. Adam. ib. p. 15.

Chronology of my Author Melchior Adam; but I ought to caution my Readers, that I suspect it a little. I do not believe that all the Pieces, that concern the Death of John Hutten, were Publish'd before Ulric Hutten's return into Germany. I find in Gesner's Bibliotheca, That the Collection of all these Writings was Printed in the Castle of Steckelberg, in 1519. in 4to. It contained Ulrichi Hutteni super interfectione propinqui sui Joannis Hutten equitis à Wirtenbergiensi Duce Ulricho deploratio, heroicis versibus. Ad Ludovicum Huttenum super interemptione filii consolatoria Oratio. In Ulrichum Wirtenbergiensem orationes quinque invectivæ. In eundem dialogus, cui titulus Phalarismus. Apologia pro Phalarismo, & aliquot ad amicos epistolæ. Ad Franciscum Gallarum regem epistola, ne causam Wirtenbergiensis tueatur exhortatoria. Inseruntur etiam epistolæ aliquot ad amicos. I see moreover that Melchior Adam cites a Speech of Ulric Hutten against the Duke of Wirtemberg, which was not Compos'd till 1519, that is, two years after the Author's return from Italy into Germany: have I not reason then to Question the Exactness of Melchior Adam? What he quotes out of this Speech, is too curious to be omitted. We learn from it, that John Hutten was taken up near the Forest where he was killed, whilst the Confederates were at War with Duke Ulrich of Wirtemberg. It was four years since the Murther was committed, and yet the Corps was not Corrupted; it Bled when it was touched, and the Face was still to be known. Ulric Hutten draws from hence a Proof of his Cousin's Innocence (o).

(C) Many Proofs of his Courage.] Those which he gave in the War, were doubtless inferiour to that which he gave on a particular Rencounter. He went from Rome to Viterbo at a time that an Embassador of France had made a stay in this last Town. There happen'd a Quarrel, in which Hutten forsaken by his Comrades had five Frenchmen upon him at once, and put 'em all to Flight, in spite of the Wounds he had received. He made an Epigram thereupon, in quinque Gallos à se profligatos, which may be seen in Melchior Adam.

(D) The Poetical Crown.] He owned himself indebted for that Honour to Peutinger's good Offices, and Express his Acknowledgement of it in one of his Books. He says also that that Crown was made in Peutinger's House by his Daughter Constantia, whose Virtue and Beauty he very much Extolled. Illam ajo coronam, illam lauream quam tu ante domum tuam, recurate contexente & adornante filia tua Constantia, omnium quæ usquam sunt puellarum & forma & moribus præstantissima, apparaveras. For a Poet who loved the fair Sex, like Hutten, this was a Subject for new Words, and a great many Thoughts; and it had been a great Chance if the Fair Constantia Peutinger had not been Praised with many Epigrams.

(E) He Wrote against the Disorders of the Court of Rome.] Amongst other Works, he Published an Historical Tract in High-Dutch upon the continual Disobedience of the Popes to the Emperors. At the end of it we find these Words of Maximilian I. who had been deceived by Leo X. This Pope has already basely Cheated me, and I can truly say, that no Pope since I have been in the World has been a Man of his Word; but with the Grace of God I hope that this will be the last. Cochlæus (b) says, that before Luther had been Spoken of, Ulric Hutten had Published many things against the Vexations, which Germany suffered on the Popes Account, and that in 1519. he made a little Treatise called Trias Romana, of a very pretty Invention, which render'd the Court of Rome extremely Odious.

(b) Act. & script. Lutheri ad ann. 1519.

(F) Hutten retired from the Court.] I don't find in his Life that the Elector of Mentz ever Arrested him, as Moreri Affirms; but only that he Banished him from his Court, exclusus itaque aula & urbe Moguntina (c), and that he forbad all People to Sell and Read his Books under Pain of Excommunication.

(c) Melch. Adam. p. 21.

(G) January 1523. he was gone from Basil.] This appears from these Words of a Letter (d) of Oecolampadius: Sunt hic ex sacerdotibus & theologis, qui de me pessime loqui cupiant, nec desistent nisi etiam de me pessime loqui cuperent. Tantum machinati sunt Hutteno nostro fuerit dictum tutum hic agere, unde & audacter hinc discessit, quorsum autem nescio.

(d) Dated from Basil the 24*th. of January* 1523. lib. 4. Epist. p. 96. and not the 24*th. of* March as Melch. Adam. p. 21.

(H) Which he afterwards Confessed.] Writing to Melanchthon in September (e) 1524. he tells him plainly that he would have received his Visit without caring much what People would say of it; and that the Reason of his refusing Hutten's Visit, was not for fear of rendring himself Odious as one more for the fear of rendring himself obliged to Lodge in his House that Night abounding with Poverty and Itch, who sought only a Nest to abide in, and who Loved Swarms of every sort he met with. So that the Interest of his Party had more Force upon Erasmus on that occasion than that of Fame. Quod Hutteni colloquium deprecabar non in ullo metus tantum in cujusquis erat aliud quid- soon after by a Passionate Piece of Ulric Hutten. He (I) Answered it. Hutten had doubtless Replied, had he Lived long enough; but he Died in an Island (K) of the Lake of Zurich the 29th. of August 1523. He was a little Man, of a Weak and Sickly Constitution; but of great Courage, and somewhat too (L) Passionate. A Collection of his Poems was Published at Francfort in 1538 *. He is thought to be the Author (M) of many Libels. Part of his Library fell into the Hands of a Physician, who, as is said, Sold some thing of it to Frobenius. See the beginning of the second Book of Joachim Camerarius's Letters.

HUTTEN (Leonard) Professor of Divinity at Wittemberg, was Born in 1482. at Ulm, where his Father was Minister. He was so well Tutour'd in the Sciences, and made so great a Progress, that at 33. years of Age he was made Professor of Divinity in one of the most famous † Universities. He discharged all the Parts of his Office in such a manner, that he was accounted a very Laborious Man, and very fit to Teach ‡. He express'd an Ardent Zeal for Orthodoxy, being a most Rigid and Violent Jam amabulentiam & gloriam hominis nemo quamvis patiens ferre poterat.* You see then that our Hutten did not put Erasmus in any fear upon the Score of his being a good Lutheran, but upon that of his being a Bankrupt Officer, who would take up his Winter Quarters with him. There is no doubt but that his Visits that were attended with borrowing of Money, proved ungrateful to many, who were Profest Protestants.

(I) He Answered it.] This Answer is inscribed to Zuinglius, and Intituled Spongia Erasmi adversus aspergines Hutteni. Erasmus there sincerely Confesses, that he Requested Hutten not to come to see him, unless some important Reason obliged him to it; but he shews that his Request was so softened, and that afterwards he made so many Proposals to that Friend, that any reasonable Man would have been Content with them. He Writ to Mark Laurimus Dean of Bruges, that if Hutten had come to see him, he would not have refused to Discourse with him (g). He adds that the reason which hinder'd them from seeing one another, was, that Hutten could not be without a Stove, and that Erasmus could not endure one. By this Instance we see, how liable the most honest Men are not to say always in their Letters things as they know them. Hutten was desparately enraged against Erasmus, and heaped up many disobliging Reproaches. Erasmus justified himself the best he could. After Hutten's Death a Physician, Named Otho Brunfels, replied to Erasmus for him.

(g) Fuit hic Huttenus patrum dierum hospes; interim nec ille me adiit, nec ego illum; & tamen si me convenisset non repulissem hominem à colloquio. Erasm. Epist. 6. l. 23.

(K) He Died in an Island of the Lake of Zurich.] He was also Buried there, and after some years (b) a Gentleman of Franconia got this Distick Engraved on his Sepulcher.

Huttenus, vates carmine & ense potens.

The worst of all is, that he Died of the Pox. If Varillas (a) was the first that had said it, I should not be concerned for it: But I find this Particular in Gesner's Bibliothèque: and who after this can chuse but deplore the Extravagance of Man? Hutten running from Place to Place for Religion, Hutten Persecuted for his great Zeal, carries the Pox with him wherever he goes, and Dies of it at last. What a disagreeing Medly is this! He Published a Book in Latin in 1519. concerning the French Disease. At that time, he could Treat of it like a Master; for in all Appearance, he had not got that Distemper since his Abjuration of Popery. For the rest, Mr. Varillas reckons ill. He says that Hutten espous'd Luther's Interest five years before his Death, and two years after the Diet of Augsburg, where he opposed the League that the Court of Rome had a Mind to Form against the Turks. That Diet was held in 1518. Hutten then must have turn'd Lutheran in 1520. Now he lived but three years after that. Varillas's Remark that he was oblig'd to live Continently, because he had receiv'd Holy Orders, is not perhaps altogether false; for we find these Words in Melanchthon's Life. Intercesserat Hutteno cum Croto Rubiano singularis usus à prima adolescentia, quo autore vel certe adjutore reliquit ille contubernium Fuldanum, id quod pene puer magis disciplinæ quam religionis caussa datus esset.

(L) Somewhat too Passionate.] Gesner (b) observes that at the beginning of the Reformation, Hutten said and wrote many things boldly and freely against the Roman Catholicks, as also against the Princes and Magistrates of Towns. He embrac'd Capnio's Party against the Monks (c) with so much Violence, that after he had Attack'd that Faction with the Pen, he Assaulted it with the Sword. He sent News to Luther of the double War he had made with the Clergy. Hutten literas ad me dedit (d) ingenti spiritu æstuantes in Romanum Pontificem, scribens se jam & literis & armis in tyrannidem sacerdotalem rucre, motus quod pontifex sicas & venenum ei intentarit, ac Episcopo Moguntino mandarit, captum ac vinctum Romam mittere. Since Luther disapprov'd this Man's (e) Violence, we need not wonder that it gave Melanchthon some uneasiness: He esteem'd Hutten's Wit and Learning; but he was afraid of his Haughtiness, and of his Impetuous and Innovating Humour. Ut virum magni facere & admirari propter doctrinæ eruditionem & præstantiam ingenii, sic ab illius natura vehemente & excelso animo, & voluntate ad novas res propensa ——nonnihil timere Philippum Melanchthonem licuit animadvertere. Camerarius (f) who tells us this, adds, that Ulric Hutten was very Violent, and that by his Look and Discourse one might discover the Inclination he had to Cruelty. He applies to him what was said of Demosthenes; for he says that Hutten would have overturn'd all Europe, if his Strength could have seconded his Designs and Enterprizes. Judge of his Humour by this Specimen. Having (g) heard that the Carthusians had made use of his Printed Picture in the House of Office, he Fin'd them two thousand Pistols. This was to make 'em pay dear for the little consideration they had for the Laurel that Crown'd that Image. Varillas (h) says, that Luther caused it to be Plac'd in the Front of his Books. I have elsewhere related how Ulric Hutten threatened the Nuncio, and so I can easily believe that he writ to the Elector of Mentz, (k) If you burn my Books, I'll burn your Towns.

A Burlesque Satyr, Intituled Nemo, was Father'd upon Erasmus, but it was Hutten (o) that made it: He declared he was the Author of it, and was Troubled that he should be Rob'd of it. I omit the Titles of many other Books both in High Dutch and Latin. His Calvinista Aulico-Politicus, which was Printed at Wittemberg in the year 1615, shall be cited in the following Remark.

(B) What he said of the Martyrs of the Geneva Confession.] The Elector of Brandenburg had alledged amongst other things, in his Edict of Toleration, the Vexations and Punishments which the Calvinists had undergone from the Common Enemy; but our Hutterus said against it, that the Arians, the Anabaptists and the Anti-Trinitarians might make use of the same Argument to obtain a Toleration. He maintained, that the Calvinists had not suffered Death for believing that the Blood of JESUS CHRIST would save 'em, but for refusing to Obey the Pope, whom they called Anti-Christ. Scripserat quondam in Edicto Serenissimus Elector Brandeburgicus, non excludendos esse à Christiana communione Reformatos, qui idem sentiunt in fundamendo fidei, in Evangelio cum Lutheranis laborant, certant, luctantur, eoque nomine à communi hoste innumeros cruciatus sustinuerunt, sustinentque, quique etiam sanguinem pro confessione illa largissimè profuderunt. Cornua illi obvertere ausus Hutterus in Aulico-Politico cap. 2. pag. 176. &c. ubi regerit, à Papistis etiam Anapaptistas, Arianos, Antitrinitarios, aliosque supplicio affectos esse: causam supplicii nostrorum non fuisse, quòd crediderint, se per Christum servatum iri, sed quòd Romanum Pontificem non agnoverint Pastorem universalem, sed Antichristum, ejusque jugum detrectaverint ferre (x). The Swiss Divine, who supplies me with this Passage, Judiciously observes, that this Method of Disparaging the Martyrdom of the Calvinists might equally be employed against the Lutheran Martyrs. This he says, after having observed that a Divine of Strasburg makes use of the same Cavil as Hutterus. Gemella his effutivit Dannenhawerus, Argentinensis Theologus, Colleg. Decalog. p. 394. ubi Reformatorum Martyrium larvatum vocare, & cum Judæorum, Ethnicorum, Arianorum sub Athalarico Gothorum Principe religionis causa occisorum Martyrio comparare non eruluit. Certè pessimi tales etiam Lutheranæ Ecclesiæ Martyrii veri fulmen laudemque præcidunt (y). Can we sufficiently admire the Effects of Prepossession? Is it not a deplorable thing, that a Popish Missionary can object to the Protestants, that the Martyrdom of their Brethren is look'd upon as a false Martyrdom by some Lutheran Doctors. See the Remark H. of the Article Westphalus (Joachim). Note, that Bayle calls those Slanderers, who accuse the Lutherans of Reproaching the Calvinist Martyrs (b) the Martyrs of the Devil.

(C) He was forced to bear the Strokes of Obloquy.] He is compared in his Elogy, to the Prophets and Apostles, who were persecuted for the Truth, and has affirmed, that he answered Calumny with Silence and Contempt. I will not dispute these Matters, being not sufficiently acquainted with them; but I'll say in general, that there are some Doctors so passionate, so insolent, so full of themselves, that they get Enemies, not because they maintain Orthodoxy, but by reason of their rude way of maintaining it. Their Adversaries take their Revenge by Personal Reproaches, and touch the most vexatious Truths of them, and convict them of many scandalous Things; and they know not how to justify themselves. What must they do then? Why, they mightily boast of their Patience; they compare themselves to the Prophets and Apostles, and to JESUS CHRIST himself. 'Being persecuted, say the, like them 'for the Truth, we open not our Mouth, when 'the Enemies of the truth abuse us. Moliere should have inserted this in a Scene of his Tartuffe; for it must be well observed, that these Gentlemen are never silent, when they have Scandals to publish against their Neighbour, or when they can alledge any thing plausible for their Justification. Be it how it will, our Hutterus's Panegyrist crowns him with this fine Elogy. (c) Sicuti verò summis quibusque Viris non omnia omnino ex animi fluxêre sententia, sed cruces, calumniæ & persecutiones varias illos exercuerunt, ita Hutterus certissimo hoc fidelium Dei Servorum charactere neutiquam caruit, quippe quo ab omnipotente Deo, Prophetæ, Apostoli, & sinceri Ecclesiæ Doctores olim fuit signati—— Idem prorsus nostro fatum; quod æquo & patienti pertulit animo, magisque de abstergendis calumniis, suis antecessoribus impactis, quam famæ & existimationis propriæ vindicatione fuit sollicitus, haud ignorans, omnes injurias oblivione melius, quam commemoratione sanari, & inimicorum calumnias contemptu potius quam lingua esse vindicandas.

He was a Scholar of Marſilius Ficinus, and he made ſo great Proficiency by the Leſſons of this Learned Maſter, that he became one of the beſt Platoniſts of his Time, and an excellent Orator. He ſucceeded the ſame Ficinus in his Profeſſorſhip of Philoſopy, who judged him excellently qualified for it, even ſo far, as to believe, that Nature had produced him for that purpoſe. (A) He publiſhed many Books.] Theſe are the Titles of ſome of them: De pulchro libri tres. De amore libri tres. Paraphraſis in Politicum, & Theagenem Platonis, & in Ariſtotelem de cœlo & meteoris. Enarratio in Platonis ſympoſium. Oratio in funere Laurentii Medicei. Epiſtolæ variæ &c. An Edition of his Works in Folio, was printed at Baſil, in the Year 1563. Mention is made of it in Geſner's Bibliotheque, under Franciſcus Cataneus Jaccetius. The Catalogue of Oxford and Konig ſpeak of it only under the Word Cataneus. Ghilini calls this Author only Franceſco Catanio (e). He has paraphraſed what Poccianius ſaid of him, and adds nothing beſides.

(B) And he left Thirteen Sons.] I make no doubt that one of them was the Perſon I ſpeak of in the Article of Machiavel (f), and whoſe miſerable End has been deſcribed by Pierius Valerianus in this manner (g): Jacobus Jacettius juvenis & Græce & Latinè egregiè peritus, pangendi carminis auctor non illepidus Florentinam cathedram obtinebat; ſed infelici ſuo fidere conjurationis in Julii Cardinalis Medicei cædem certo die patrandam conſcius fuit; qua patefacta, captus ipſe, & tam nefandi ſceleris convictus Senatus Florentini judicio ſecuri percuſſus eſt. Paul Jovius, who gives him no other Title (h) but that of a Poet, is to be cenſured. I fancy that Brother Angelus (i) de Cataneis Diacetius, who after he had gone through all the Dignities of the Dominican Order, was made Biſhop of Fieſoli, in the Year 1566, was one of the Thirteen Sons of our Jaccetius. He died the 5th. of May, 1574. being Eighty one Years old (k). He is called in his Epitaph (l) Angelus Catanæus Diacetius.

(C) His true Name Diaccetо, has been very much altered.] See the Remark C. of the Article Machiavel, and note, that the Reaſon why I make Diaccetо his true Name, is becauſe I have found this Word in the Subſcription of a Letter (m), which our Jaccetius's Grandſon wrote to Varchi the 9th. of September, 1561, in ſending him (n) two Copies of a Book of his Grandfather. He had received four from Venice. The Edition pleaſed him as to the Character, but he found it uncorrect. Michael Poccianius (o) has not been altogether exact, having written that Name Franciſcus Catbaneus Diacetius. Note, that the Author of the Notes upon the Book, intituled, La Confeſſion de Sanci, informs me, that (p) Carolus Zenobii de Ghiacetо unus ex Decemviris Balia Florentinæ civitatis, ſigned in that Quality with J——Son of Coſmo de Medicis, in a Contract made at Florence, in 1453, which he ſaw amongſt the Archives of Lorrain. This ſhew, that the ancient Name of this Family was not Diaccetо. 'Tis very Probable that Diaccetо was made by joining the Article and the Name together. I have ſpoke in another Place (q) of the Life of one Paul Ghiacetti.

(D) Another Francis Cataneus] JACCETIUS, who is an Author.] Michael (r) Poccianius calls him Franciſcus Cathaneus Diacettius, and ſays, that he was Canon of the Cathedral of Florence, Apoſtolical Protonotary, Doctor of the Civil Law, and Biſhop of Fieſoli, and that amongſt other Works, he compoſed in Italian, the Life of JESUS CHRIST, that of the Holy Virgin, and of St. Dominick, and of ſome Biſhops of Fieſoli, ſeveral Sermons, and the Epiſtles and Goſpels for all the Year. Ughelli (s) calls him Franciſcus Cataneus Diacettius, and ſays, that he was the Succeſſor of Angelus de Cataneis Diacetius his Uncle, in the Biſhoprick of Fieſoli, in the Year 1570; that he ſate amongſt the Fathers of the Council of Trent; that he wrote ſome Tracts De authoritate Papæ & Concilii, de ſuperſtitione artis magicæ, &c. that he diſcharged all the Duties of a good Prelate, and died the 4th. of November 1595.

a good Family; and being a Learned Man, he quickly became acquainted with some Illustrious Persons. Some time after he went to Bayonne, to his good Friend, who had retired thither. They studied together (C), with an extraordinary Application, and got so far into the Esteem of the Bishop of Bayonne, that he procured a Canonship in his Cathedral for du Verger, and a Principality of a College for Jansenius §. The Bishop being raised to the Archbishoprick (D) of Tours, invited du Verger to Paris; and then Jansenius being parted from his Friend, and being not sure of the Protection of the new Prelate, left Bayonne, and returned to Louvain, where he was made Principal of the College of St. Pulcheria; a Post [which he disliked, because he was not at Leisure to apply himself to his Studies, which was also the Reason why he would not undertake to teach Philosophy ‡. He was admitted Doctor of Divinity in the Year 1617, and taken into the Number of the ordinary Professors, and he acquired such a Reputation, that the University (E) sent him twice into Spain upon Matters of Importance. The King his Master made him Professor of the Holy Scripture in 1630, in the University of Louvain; and Five Years after he preferred him to the Bishoprick of Ipres. Bourg, published a little Book (s) in the Year 1658, in which he said (f) 'that the Father of 'Cornelius Jansenius profess'd the Heresie of the 'Calvinists, tho' his Son being of Age, declared 'himself a Catholick. Father Labbe had published the same thing before him: (g) Princeps eorum extitit CORNELIUS JANSENIUS qui gente Hollandus, patria Leerdamensis, inter hæreticos educatus à puero, tum Lovanii, &c. Father Hazart renewed the same Calumny in a Flemish Book, intituled, the Triumph of the Popes of Rome, which he published at Antwerp, in 1681. His Father, says he, was a Calvinist; and as for himself, being grown, he made an outward shew of being a Catholick (h). When he found himself prosecuted for saying this, he alledged, amongst other Reasons, that he was not the Author of this Reproach, since he published it only after Moses du Bourg (i). It has been proved in the Cases which I quote, that this is a very false Reproach. Here is a Passage of Mr. Leydecker, which contains some Particulars, that are not in the Cases. (k) *Parentes habuit honestos, Pontificia Religioni addictos, licet Evangelica lux Belgio affunderetur, quibusque modica opes. (C) They studied together with an extraordinary Application.] (m) 'Twas at Mr. d'Hauranne's, 'who was afterwards Abbot of St. Cyran, that Jan'senius spent the Five or Six Years that he was at 'Bayonne, applying himself to the reading of the 'Holy Fathers and St. Austin, so assiduously, that 'appearing to be of no strong Constitution, Mr. 'Hauranne's Mother used to say to her Son, that he 'would kill that honest Fleming, by making him 'study so hard.

(D) Being raised to the Archbishoprick of Tours.] According to Mr. Leydecker (n) this Archbishoprick became vacant by the Cession of Sebastian Galigai (o) Brother of the Marquis d'Ancre: Vacante Cathedra per spontaneam Sebastiani Galigaji Florentini, infelicis Marchionis Ancrai fratris, cessionem.

(E) The University sent him twice into Spain.] His Enemies gave out a great many Lyes hereupon. They said, (p) that he fled from Spain, just as he was going to be taken by the Inquisition for venting his new Doctrine there. This is what Father Hazart has given out after Moses du Bourg. Here is the Answer that is to be found in the Cases (q).

'His (r) Ignorance of Mr. Jansenius's Affairs, 'plainly shews, that 'tis a Calumny forged at Pleasure. 'He speaks of his Spanish Voyage, as if he had 'made but one, whereas he has made two: (1) One 'in the Year 1624. and the other in 1625. This 'would have perplexed the Jesuit of Bourdeaux; 'for if he had fixt his Story to the first Voyage of 'Jansenius, the Falshood would have been visible, be'cause Jansenius would have taken care, not to return 'thither a second Time. And if he had fixed it to 'the Second, it would have been visible another 'Way; it being certain, that so unlucky an Acci'dent would have ruined all his Negociation, and 'that he would have returned in Disgrace to Lou'vain: instead of which it is most true, that he 'returned gloriously, having obtained of his Ca'tholick Majesty, all that the University of Lou'vain desired, to put a Stop to the Enterprises of 'the Jesuits. Lastly, An Author, who deserves so 'little Credit upon other Accounts, is not at all to 'be credited about a thing that is scarce credible, 'when in the same place he advances three other ma'nifest Falsities against the same Person. This is 'what this Jesuit of Bourdeaux has done; the 1st 'is, that Jansenius's Father was a Calvinist, &c. a 'Calumny, the Falsity whereof is unanswerably 'proved in the first and third Case. The 2d is, 'That Jansenius being returned to Louvain after the 'Excursion he had made into France, obtained by his 'Intrigues, under the Notion of a poor Dutch 'Catholick, a Pensioner's Place in a College, in 'which a Distribution of some Money was made for 'the Livelihood of such poor Scholars. An impu'dent Lye, confuted by (2) the publick Acts; (2) Fasti Acad. pag. 138. 'for as soon as he returned to Louvain in the Year '1617, he took his Degree of Doctor of Divinity, 'and was made President of the College of St. 'Pulcheria: Lovanium revocatus novo Collegio D. 'Pulcheriæ præficitur. The 3d. is an infamous Ca'lumny, viz. that this worthy Pensioner stole Money 'from the College to pay the Pension of the Abbot of S. 'Cyran's two Nephews. 1. The Abbot of S. Cyran had 'but one Nephew at Louvain. 2. If Jansenius was 'only Pensioner, how could he dispose of the Col'lege Money? 3. This pretended Theft is an hor'rid Slander, dispersed in many of the Jesuits Li'bels, of which they have been convicted in the 'Sixteenth Provincial Letter, in these Words; I 'will tell you, &c.

It's a common Saying, that there is no Fiction but is grounded upon some Truth. And this may be said of that of Moses du Bourg; for it appears by a Letter of Jansenius, that the Spanish Inquisition made some Informations against him after his Departure. The Words of his Letter are these (a): 'They 'write to me from Spain, that the Inquisition has 'been set on against a Doctor of Louvain, who had 'been in that Kingdom; and that they have applied 'themselves to a Doctor of Salamanca, in whose 'House he lodg'd, who is the first Doctor of that 'University, call'd Basil de Leon, to take Informa'tion against him as an Hollander, and consequent'ly an Heretick: but he answered them so much to 'the Advantage of this Doctor, as put them out of 'Countenance (b). I shall conclude this Remark with the Words of Valerius Andreas. (b) Brevi quoque tempore eam de se opinionem apud Academicos omnes excitavit, ut præ Jansenio alius magis idoneus non fuerit judicatus, qui nomine ejusdem Academiæ bis Legatus in Hispanias mitteretur. Ubi quâ prudentiâ ac dexteritate sese gesserit, tum apud Regem Catholicum, tum in Academiis Salmanticensi ac Vallisoletana, felicissimus utriusque Legationis eventus docuit. Consult Mr. Leydecker (d) about the Subject and Success of these Spanish Voyages.

and intituled Alexandri Patricii Armacani, Theologi, Mars Gallicus, ſeu de juſtitia armorum & fœderum Regis Galliæ libri duo. It contains the moſt malicious and odious Outcries, againſt the continual Services which France did to the Proteſtants of Holland and Germany, to the prejudice of the Catholick Religion. The Hollanders are there called Rebels, who injoy a Republican Liberty by an infamous Uſurpation. They have anſwered that Reproach a Hundred Times, and Mr. Leydecker has given it a ſolid Confutation (f). He tells us, that there was a Report (g) that Janſenius being conſulted by the Duke of Arſchot, and the Archbiſhop of Mechlen, after the Loſs of Boiſleduc, and Maeſtricht, adviſed them to ſhake off the Spaniſh Yoke, and to Canton in the way of the Swiſs. 'Twas diſcovered, that he had given that Counſel, and he was in great pain about it. Hereupon the Preſident Roſe ſhewed him an Expedient to come off: he adviſed him to write againſt France, and gave him the Plan of the Mars Gallicus (h). Mr. Leydecker alleges a Letter of the Nuncio Fabio Chigi. Et ne mentiri viderentur, literas produxêre Fabii Chigii, Nuntii Apoſtolici (qui deinde Alexander VII. fuit) ad F. Barberinum, Cardinalem, datas Coloniæ 25. Martii, 1641. ubi hæc ſcripta; Cardinalis Richelius admodum ſtomachatur in Janſenium, quod cum Roſæo Martem Gallicum conſcripſerit. Nimirum hæ literæ adhuc in Collegio S. Officii Romæ aſſervantur (i). The Jeſuits failed not to exaſperate the Court of France againſt the Followers of Janſenius, as being a Man who had defamed the Nation and their Monarchs, almoſt from the firſt to the laſt. Mr. Leydecker cites a long Paſſage out of a Book which he believes to be Father Annat's; but in all Probability it was written by Father Vavaſſeur (k). I will only let down ſo much of it as concerns the ungrateful neſs that Janſenius was reproached with. (w) Ante omnia Janſenio exprobrat ingratum in Galliam animum, quæ ipſi valetudinem, quam recipere non poſſet in patria, cœnereto & pingui cœlo, reſtituerat puro & ſalubri; quæ victum, cum egeret, præbuerat, tum domeſtico Præceptori Lutetiæ Pariſiorum, tum ludi publici Magiſtro Bajonæ; quæ notitiâ Virorum illuſtrium atque doctorum animum fecerat ad majora, aditumque & viam muniverat. Quin in Galliis, quod beneficii loco ſine dubio numeravit, magnam adeptus erat librorum Calviniſtarum copiam, quorum de fontibus hauſit Auguſtini interpretationem, & invenerat homines à Calviniſmi diſciplina non alienos, quibuſcum liberiores de Gratia ſermones contulerit.

Let us admire the Viciſſitude of human Affairs. Janſenius was rewarded with a Mitre for having confounded France upon her entring into Alliances with Proteſtant States; and at preſent (n) the Court of Spain would doubtleſs give a good Prelacy to a Doctor of Louvain, who ſhould write as ſtrong a Book for the Juſtification of ſuch a League, as that was which Janſenius wrote againſt France: ſo true it is, that one may attain to the ſame end by quite contrary Ways, and that what is good at one time (o) may become very bad in another. The Confutation of a Book may deſerve the Reward that was given for the Book it ſelf. What a pretty Scene would it be for unprejudiced People; ſhould they ſee a Doctor of Louvain made a Biſhop for Solidly Confuting our Cornelius's Mars Gallicus?

Naudé (p) makes him the Author of the Admonitio & Myſteria Politica, two Works, ſays he, that had wonderful Effects againſt the Deſigns of the Lewis XIII. I believe he is miſtaken.

(G) This Book——has rais'd great Diſturbances.] It has given Birth to innumerable other Books, ſome of which contain all that can be ſaid on both ſides upon the Subject, by Men of great Acuteneſs, Subtilty and Learning; but after all, a Man is not one Jot the wiſer than he was before; which will ever be the Fate of Diſputes of this Kind. The more they are handled, the more they are confounded, and give the Reader occaſion to ſay, Peiſſis probe, incertior ſum multo quam dudum (r). It has been ſaid, that the Doctrine of Grace is a Sea that has neither Shore nor Bottom. Perhaps it had been better to compare it with the Faro di Meſſina, in which there is always Danger of running into a Rock, by endeavouring to avoid another: Incidit in Scyllam cupiens vitare Charybdim. The whole Controverſie comes at laſt to this. Did Adam ſin freely? If you anſwer, Yes: Then it will be replied, that his Fall was not foreſeen: If you ſay no: Then it will follow that he was not culpable. You may write an Hundred Volumes upon either of theſe Conſequences, and at laſt you muſt be forc'd to own either, that an infallible Foreſight of a Contingent Event, is an unconceivable Myſtery; or that the Way how a Creature ſins, tho' it acts in a neceſſary Manner, is wholly incomprehenſible. I deſire no more: For to what purpoſe is it to write ſo many Books, ſince you muſt own one of theſe two incomprehenſible Myſteries?

(r) Terent. Phorm. act. 2. ſcen. 3.

(H) The ſhuffling and foul Play was never ſo notorious.] Thoſe that have never ſo little Penetration, ſee plainly that in the Diſpute about Liberty, there are but two Sides to be taken: one is to ſay, that all the Cauſes diſtinct from the Soul, which concur with her, leave her the Power of acting or not acting; the other is to ſay, that they determine her in ſuch a manner to act, that ſhe cannot do otherwiſe. The firſt Opinion is that of the Moliniſts; the other is, that of the Thomiſts, Janſeniſts, and Calviniſts. Here are three ſorts of People that oppugn Moliniſm, and who at the bottom muſt be of the ſame Mind; and yet the Thomiſts have contended might and main, that they were no Janſeniſts, and the Janſeniſts have maintain'd with equal Heat, that upon the Point of Liberty they were not Calviniſts. There are no Artifices or ill-grounded Diſtinctions, but what have been made uſe of to colour that Pretence; and all this with Deſign to avoid the miſchievous Conſequences they foreſaw, would follow their Confeſſion of any Conformity, either with the Janſeniſts or Calviniſts. On the other hand, there's no Sophiſtry but what the Moliniſts have made uſe of, to ſhew, that St. Auguſtin did not teach Janſeniſm, as being unwilling to own, that their Doctrine is contrary to that of this great Saint: Thus the Thomiſts refuſing to confeſs their Conformity with People called Heretichs, and the Moliniſts, to own themſelves contrary to a Doctor, who has been always reckoned Orthodox in his Opinions, have plaid an Hundred Tricks, without a grain of Sincerity in their Conduct.

(I) Engaged in Controverſie with the Proteſtants.] Here follows the Subſtance of that Diſpute. (a) The States-General made an Edict in 1629, by which they prohibited the publick Exerciſe of the Romiſh Religion in Boiſleduc, and appropriated the Eccleſiaſtical Revenues of the Mayoralty of that Town to the uſe of the Proteſtant Religion, which they cauſed to be preached there by Four Miniſters. The latter having notice that many virulent Slanders were ſecretly ſcatter'd againſt their Doctrine, publiſhed a Manifeſto to declare, that they taught nothing but the pure Goſpel, and to exhort their Adverſaries to propoſe in publick what they had to object. This was only anſwered in a Piece that (b) Janſenius was the Author of. Gisbert Voetius, one of the four Miniſters that preached in Boiſleduc, made ſome Remarks (c) upon this Work, which were confuted by a new Book of (d) Janſenius. The Author of the Remarks replied, and confuted his Adverſary in a great Book, publiſhed in the Year

His Book (e) was Printed at Antwerp in the Year 1636, and Refuted by Martin Schoockius Professor of History and Eloquence at Deventer, who Intituled his Answer desperatissima causa papatus. It was Printed in the year 1638. Mr. Leydecker says this was the end of that Dispute (f). But I find in the Bibliotheca of Valerius Andreas amongst Fromondus's Works, a Piece Intituled Sycophanta: epistola ad Gisbertum Voetium, Printed in 1640. And since the first Impression of this Article, I have seen a Letter, in which this Professor of Utrecht is tax'd with being mistaken. (†) *Falleris, ô Præclare, secus res habet. . . . . Jansenius had another War to maintain, which we may call a Protestant one. For Theodorus Simonis (g) a wavering Catholick, came to Louvain to desire him to explain some Doubts about the Infallibility of the Pope, the Adoration of the Eucharist, and some other Points. Jansenius, being hamper'd with this Man's Objections, told him one Day that he would no longer Dispute viva voce, but in Writing, perceiving he had to do with a Catholick, who would quickly go into Holland, and boast that he had vanquish'd him. Simonis, who had much ado to bring himself to Dispute in Writing, resolv'd upon it at last. But after each of 'em had writ twice upon those Subjects, Simonis found himself Besieg'd with Soldiers in his Lodgings, and threatned to be Punish'd as an Heretick. The Secretary of the Duke of Arschot, cryed out against him, and said there was Wood enough in his Master's Forest to Burn that Heretick. But he who Examin'd Simonis, in the Name of the Arch-Bishop of Mechlen, having reported that he had found him a good Catholick, and firmly resolv'd to continue so, the Prisoner was set at Liberty, and Jansenius was obliged to pay the Expence of the Soldiers, &c. Simonis two years after turn'd Protestant, and Publish'd a Book Intituled (b) de statu & religione propria papatus adversus Jansenium (i). I have lately Read that this Man having left Lutheranism to imbrace Popery, turn'd Lutheran again, and at last Socinian. He was made Principal of the Socinian College of Kisselin in Lithuania (k). He understood Greek very well, and put into that Language Comenius's Janua linguarum.

Mr. Leydecker (m) complains that in Moreri's Dictionary, the Harmony of the Gospels is ascrib'd to our Jansenius, whereas it ought to be Attributed to another Jansenius Bishop of Ghent. I have not found this in Moreri. (L) The Court of Rome proceeded against the Epitaph of this Bishop.] The 10th. of December 1655. (p) ' Francis de Robes (q) of the Family ' of the Counts of Annap, Bishop of Ipres, caus'd ' the Tomb-Stone of his Predecessor Cornelius Jansenius to be taken away silently by Night, on which ' were Written the Praises of his Virtue and Learning, and particularly of his Book Intituled Augustinus, importing that this most faithful Interpreter of St. Austin's most secret Thoughts, had employ'd upon that Work a Divine Wit, an undefatigable Labour, and all the time of his Life; and that the Church would receive the Fruit of it upon Earth, as he did the Reward of it in Heaven. ' Words that were injurious to the Bulls of Pope Urban the VIII. and Innocent X. who had Condemn'd that Book. The destruction of this Grave-Stone was made by an express Order of Pope Alexander VII. and with the Consent of the Arch-Duke Leopold Governor of the Low-Countries, notwithstanding the resistance of the Chapter; ' which went so far that one of the principal Canons made bold to say, that it was not in the ' Pope's or the King's Power to suppress this Epitaph: so much was Jansenius in the Affection of ' him and his Colleagues. See Mr. Leydecker who mentions this more (r) at large. I can scarce believe what he observes (s), that the Jesuit La Chaise advised to break the Stone on which Jansenius's Epitaph was Engraved; but that the Bishop of Ipres was contented to throw it into a Corner. I don't think that in the year 1655. Father la Chaise was in a Condition to advise such a thing. Let us add this curious Particular: ' (t) The last time ' the most Christian King was at Ipres, an Hospitaler Nun who was with him (v) in his last Sickness, and who spoke of him as of a Saint, related ' with Tears in her Eyes to some Lords of the ' Court, that she held him by the Arm when he ' wrote his Will, and she intreated them at the ' same time to beg of the King that he would cause ' the Injury to be repaired, which had been done ' to so Holy a Man in taking away his Tomb-' Stone.

'whom they have placed in the number of their Gods. The two Principal (B) are 'Amida and Xaca . . . . . They reckon a dozen Sects, or a dozen Religions in Ja-'pan; and every one is at Liberty to chooſe which he Pleaſes: which occaſions no 'Diviſions; becauſe, ſay they, Underſtandings have no Tye of Relation like Bodies. 'Amongſt theſe Sects there are three Principal. The firſt hopes not for a Life after 'this, and knows no other Subſtance, than what ſtrikes the Senſes . . . . The ſecond, 'which believe the Immortality of the Soul, and another Life, is followed by the 'beſt ſort of People, and is called the Sect of the Men of the moſt High God. The 'third is that of the Worſhippers of Xaca. The Bonzes may be Compared to our Monks *. Some Authors ſay †, that the moſt general Diviſion, that can be made of the Sects of the Japaneſe, is to Rank them under ſuch as make Profeſſion of ſticking to Appearance, and under others that ſeek Reality, which do's not ſtrike the Senſes, and which they call Truth. Thoſe that ſtick to Appearance (C) admit another Life after this, for the Eternal Recompence of good Men, and the Eternal Puniſhment of the Bad; but thoſe who ſeek the internal and inſenſible Reality, reject Heaven and Hell, and teach things (D) that have a great affinity with Spinoza's Opinion. They Symbolize with the Epicureans in taking from God the Government of the World as a thing contrary to the Supreme Tranquillity, which, according to them, is all his Felicity. Nay, they go farther than Epicurus; for they deprive God of Underſtanding and Reaſon. They fear doubtleſs that theſe Qualities would diſturb his Repoſe, as they Experience, that Reaſoning is attended with ſome Fatigue *. The Chriſtian Religion which Francis Xavier, and afterwards many other Miſſionaries, Preached to the Japaneſe, found no greater Obſtacles than what the Bonzes raiſed againſt it; not ſo much

World; but then Celibacy ill-obſerved, Cheats hid under the Appearances of a rigid Morality, the profit of Enterments, and the Aſſiſtances ſent to Souls ſeparated from the Body, would afford them a great many Compariſons. I am perſuaded that many People in Reading Mr. (a) Couſin's Extracts, could not chuſe but ſay inwardly to themſelves, Thus it is with us. 'Twould be a very curious thing to ſee an Account of the Weſt written by a Japaneſe, or a Chineſe, who had lived many years in the great Cities of Europe. They would pay us in our own Coin. The Miſſionaries, who go to the Indies, Publiſh Relations, in which they Particularize the Falſities and Frauds they have obſerved in the Worſhip of theſe Idolatrous Nations. But whilſt they Ridicule 'em for it, may they not fear that it ſhould be replied to them, (b) quid vides? mutato nomine de te fabula narratur; and that they ſhould be upbraided as they deſerve, who wink at their own Faults, and diſcover with the utmoſt Sagacity the Vices of others?

(B) The two Principal are Amida and Xaca.] (d) The firſt is repreſented under ſeveral Monſtrous Figures. In one of his Temples which is at Iedo, he is carried on a Horſe with ſeven Heads. The fineſt of his Temples is near Meaco, and is five hundred Foot in length. There are in it a thouſand Idols of Maſſy Gold. As for Saca or Xaca, the Bonzes tell a thouſand impertinent Stories of him. They ſay that he was Born eight hundred times in different Species, before he was Born of a Woman, and that when he was Born, he came out of his Mother's Sides, Eating his way with his Teeth. The truth is, that Xaca was a Sophiſter, who perſuaded People every thing he had a Mind to. His Mother when ſhe was Big with Child of him, Dream'd, that a White Elephant came out of her Mouth: For which reaſon the Elephants of that Colour are had in Veneration in the Indies, in China, and Tonquin, at Siam and Pegu. They are ſerved in Veſſels of Gold, and the great Lords go in Crouds to Viſit 'em, and Pay 'em the ſame Honours as they do to Kings. One of the three Principal Sects of the Japaneſe is that of the Worſhippers of Xaca. (e) They live in Common, Riſe at Midnight to Sing Hymns, and meet every Evening to hear the Diſcourſe, which their Superiors makes to them upon ſome Subject of Morality; then he gives them ſome Points to Meditate upon. Sometimes he Repreſents to them a Dying Man, and relates the Reproaches, that the Soul and Body make to one another in this laſt Moment. The Meditation laſts an hour. When it is over, every one gives the Superior an Account of the Thoughts which come into his Mind, and of the Reſolutions he has taken.

(C) Thoſe that ſtick to Appearance, admit another Life after this.] It appears that their Opinion is that of Amida, Xaca, and Fotoque. They ſay that in the four Cardinal Points of the World, there are certain Countries, where the Inhabitants are in a Plenary Satisfaction, which makes them injoy a Supreme Felicity; that Fotoque made all the Laws of Japan, and that they who obſerve them, ſhall no ſooner leave this Life, but they ſhall go into thoſe Places, where they ſhall be Born again, and Fotoque ſhall Transform them, and give 'em 32. Figures and 80 Qualities, with which they ſhall Live (f) Eternally in a perfect Beatitude; well ſatisfied with their Condition and very Joyful. The Women ſhall not be admitted into thoſe Countries; but thoſe who ſhall be Saved for having obſerved the Laws of Fotoque, ſhall be Transformed into Men: for without that, they could not receive the Reward of their good Life, they being (g) of their own Nature, ſay they, Unclean and Execrable. As for the Tranſgreſſors of Fotoque's Laws, they ſhall go from this Life into certain Infernal Places, and they ſhall ſuffer ſix ſorts of Puniſhments which ſhall never have an end. This is the general Doctrine of the Followers of Appearance. The other Sects ſay of it what they think fit, but theſe agree in this Center of Unity, and their Opinion is that of the Ignorant and the Vulgar: (h) Et quamvis de biſce rebus una quaque Japoniorum ſecta loquatur, ut vult, communi tamen conſenſu quicunque extrinſecam rerum faciem ſectantur, in hoc, quod diximus, conveniunt, & hanc opinionem rudes & vulgares homines amplectuntur. I borrow all this from the Jeſuit Poſſevin (i), who did not think himſelf obliged to Refute the Doctrines of this Sect; for ſince they Profeſs, ſays he, to ſtick only to Appearances, what they ſay, has no Reality nor Truth, 'tis at beſt but a Phantom or the Surface of Truth. The Bonzes themſelves manifeſtly Confeſs, that the whole Syſtem of Camus and Fotoque was Built or rather Forged in favour of the Ignorant, and of weak Minds: (k) Nam (ut ipſimet Bonzii, qui ſua ſententiæ Magiſtri & Doctores ſunt, apertè fatentur) totam de CAMI & FOTOQUE diſciplinam propter rudes & inſcios rerum homines, captu, & ingenio imbecillos, eſſe compoſitam, vel potius confictam, non quod aliquid eorum, quæ in ipſa docentur verum ſit. Poſſevin however confutes the Doctrines of this Sect in his (l) fifth Chapter.

(D) Reject Heaven and Hell, and Teach things that have ſome affinity with Spinoza's Opinion.] They neglect Externals and apply themſelves only to Meditations; they caſt off all Diſcipline that conſiſts in Words, adhering only to the Exerciſe, which they call SOQUXIN SOQUBUT, that is the Heart. They maintain that there is but one Prin-much by their Disputes and Arguments, as by a method usual with Ecclesiasticks; I mean, by having recourse to the Secular Power, and by their care † of Exciting the Kings and the People to the Maintenance of the Old Religion, and Persecuting the Followers of the New. It must however be Confessed, that the Japanese Priests entered into a Conference with the Christian Priests, and raised some Objections against 'em *, which shew they wanted no Wit. They could not hinder the Christian Religion from making great Progress in a little time; but at last they drove the Emperor to such Violences as wholly extirpated it in Japan, and very much enlarged (E) the Martyrology. Father Possevin has stoutly Censured the Institutes of the Japonese (F) Legislator.

Principle of all Things, and that this Principle is found every where, and that the Heart of Man, and the Internals of other Beings, do not differ from this common Principle, and return to it, when they are dissolved. It Exists, say they, from all Eternity, being one only Principle, clear Luminous, and uncapable of increase or Diminution: (m) it has no Figure, and does not Reason, it lives in Idleness and a perfect Repose. They teach, that they, who in this Life have very well known this Principle, shall obtain the perfect Glory of Fotoque and of his Successors; and that they who arrive not to this high Degree of Knowledge, must be Born several times, and go from Place to Place, but in the other World they shall be all absorbed in this common Principle of all Things. They say also, that Knowledge does not differ from Ignorance, that Good and Evil are not two Beings, and that the one is not separated from the other (†). Possevin reduces this System to these four Points. 1. That there is but one Principle of all Things, that this Principle is most perfect, that it is wise but understands nothing, and takes no notice of the Affairs of this World, since it lives in perfect Repose, and like a Man that is very attentive to one thing, and neglects all others. 2. That this Principle is in all particular Beings, and Communicates its Essence to them, so that they are the same thing with it, and return to it when they have an end. 3. That the Heart of Man does not differ from this common Principle of all Beings, and that when Men Die, their Hearts Perish, and are Consumed; but that the first Principle, which first gave them their Life, subsists still in them: from whence it follows, that there is neither Heaven nor Hell, Rewards nor Punishments after this Life. 4. That Man may in this World raise himself to the Condition and Supreme Majesty of the first Principle, for as much as by the force of Meditation he may perfectly know it, and so arrive to the Supreme Tranquillity which that Principle enjoys in it self; that this is all the good that Man can acquire, and that till he has obtained it by Meditation, and a perfect Knowledge, he is Tormented with perpetual Disquiet; he often passes from one Hell to another, and never finds Rest. 'Tis very certain, that there are here many things, which Spinoza has not Taught: but otherwise it is manifest, that he has taught as well as these Japonese Priests, that the first Principle of all Things, and of all Beings, which Compose the Universe, are but one and the same Substance; that all Things are God, and that God is all Things, in such a manner, that God and all Things that Exist, make but one and the same Being. One can't sufficiently admire that so Extravagant a Notion, and so full of Absurd Contradictions, should insinuate it self into the Souls of so many People so Remote from one another, and so different in their Humours, Education, Customs, and Genius. Possevin (a) brings many Arguments against the Hypothesis of the Bonzes, and Confutes it principally by the Contradictions it contains; and first he observes, that they have but very few Doctrines about the Nature of the first Principle; that they say nothing upon it with any Perspicuity, that they cannot resolve Questions, and Answer the Objections proposed to them, nor confirm their Opinions, and that their only shift is to say, that it do's not concern (‡) Men to enquire into the Nature and Power of the first Principle. (b) Omnia unico verbo putant se dissolvere, dicentes hominum non interesse hujus principii vim, & naturam perscrutari inquirendo aut disputando: quod totum manifeste sonat ea ignorationis profectum & natum. Note, that part of his Objections (c) oppugn also the System of Spinoza.

(a) Possev. ubi supra pag. 412. 413.

(‡) This is a gross Contradiction, which Possevin should have charged them with; for since they say that the greatest Happiness of Men proceeds from the perfect Knowlege they may have of the first Principle, it concerns them to inquire into the Nature of that first Principle.

(E) Very much enlarged the Martyrology.] Read the Ecclesiastical History of Japan, written by the Jesuit Francis Solier, and the History (d) of the Church of Japan, by the Abbot of T. 'This Abbot '(e) admires the depth of the Judgments of God, 'and wonders that he has permitted the Blood of 'so many Martyrs to be Shed, without making 'use of it (as in the first Ages of the Church) as of 'a Fruitful Seed for the Production of new Christians. Without taking the liberty of enquiring into the Reasons the Divine Wisdom may have for permitting at one time, what it do's not at another, it may be said that the Christianity of the XVI. Century had no pretence to hope for the same Favour and Protection of God, as the Christianity of the three first Centuries. The latter was a Gentle, Meek and Patient Religion, that recommended to Subjects Submission to their Sovereigns, and never aspired to raise it self to the Thrones by the way of Rebellion; but the Christianity which was Preached to the Infidels in the XVI. Century was no such thing: it was a Murthering and Sanguinary Religion, used to Slaughter for five or six hundred years. The Christians had contracted a very long Habit of Maintaining and Aggrandizing themselves, by putting to the Sword all those that resisted them. Fire, and Hanging, the dreadful Tribunal of the Inquisition, Crusades and Bulls Exciting Subjects to Rebel, Seditious Preachers, Conspiracies, and Assassinations of Princes, were the ordinary means they made use of against those that submitted not to their Orders. Could they promise to themselves the Benediction that Heaven granted to the Primitive Church, to the Gospel of Peace, Patience and Gentleness? The best Choice the Japanese could have made was to be Converted to the true God; but having not a sufficient Knowledge to renounce their false Religion, there remained nothing to chuse but an Active, or Passive Persecution. They could not preserve their Antient Government, nor their Antient Worship, but by ridding themselves of the Christians, who sooner or later would have Ruined both, and assoon as they had been capable of making War, would have Armed all their Proselytes, would have introduced into the Country, the Soldiers, and the Cruel Maxims of the Spaniards, and by Killing and Hanging, as in America, would have brought all Japan under their Yoke. Thus considering things only by Political Views, we shall be obliged to own, that the Persecutions the Christians suffered in that Country were a prudential means to prevent the overthrow of the Monarchy, and the Plundering of the State. The ingenuous Confession of a Spaniard justifies the precaution of those Infidels. 'It (f) 'gave a specious pretence to the Bonzes to Exercise 'their Hatred, and to Sollicite the Extirpation of 'the Christians. Being asked by the King of Tossa, 'how the King of Spain became Master of so great 'Tracts of Land in both the Hemispheres, he too 'honestly Answered, that he sent Monks to Preach 'the Gospel in Foreign Nations, and that after they 'had Converted a good number of Pagans, he sent 'his Troops, which joyning with the New Christians, subdued the Country. This Indiscretion cost 'the Christians dear.

Degree of injury done to God. He proves this by the Example of Rebellions; for he ſays, the greateſt Crime that can be committed againſt a Soveraign, is to take away his Power, and to Confer it on another. (g) Sicut nullum crimen in Regem ac Principem poteſt gravius admitti, quam eum è ſuo regno pellere, è regiæ dignitatis gradu dejicere, & alium in ſummum regiæ amplitudinis faſtigium evehere; ita ſumma eſt in Deum injuria, ſummum in eum ſcelus admittitur, cùm divinus honor, & cultus, qui ipſi ſoli debetur, in alium transfertur, ipſi detrahitur, alii tribuitur. The ſecond defect of thoſe Laws is, that whilſt they ſeverely forbid the Bonzes the uſe of Women, they allow Pederaſty; they forbid them the former as a Vile and Abominable thing, and approve the other Practice as Honeſt and Holy. (x) In Bonziis omnem cum fœminis concubitum, ut rem fœdam, turpem, & deteſtabilem damnant: at uſum puerorum permittunt, imo in eiſdem Bonziis coitum cum pueris approbant, ut rem honeſtam & ſanctam. Poſſevin ſhews by many Reaſons that Pederaſty is a moſt horrid Crime. The third Fault is, that forbidding to kill certain Beaſts Conſecrated to Camus and Fotoque, they permit Men to kill one another, and even to be their own Murtherers. They not only ſuppoſe it to be an Action acceptable to thoſe Deities, but alſo the true way to Deification; hence it is that great numbers of the Japaneſe kill themſelves, either caſting themſelves into the Water, or Burning, of Burying themſelves Alive, or throwing themſelves Headlong from the top of a Rock. Many alſo rip open their Bellies upon ſlight occaſions; and many Mothers kill their own Children. Poſſevin ſhews (a) the Sinfulneſs of ſuch a Conduct. The laſt Fault he Cenſures is, that the Laws of Japan declare, that by the Invocation of NAMUAMIDABUT, or by crying FORENGUELIO, Men expiate all ſorts of Sins without any need of Repentance. The Japaneſe, continues he, make no mention of ſatisfactory Pains, or good Works; they pretend that theſe things are Injurious to the Merit of XACA and AMIDA, who have been ſufficiently Afflicted for the Crimes of Men, and have fully Expiated them by their Sufferings. This Doctrine opens the way to Sin; for there being nothing eaſier than to make an Invocation, or a Cry, Men are ſure of eaſily avoiding all the Puniſhments they have reaſon to fear, after they have given up themſelves to the greateſt Crimes. Poſſevin (b) does plainly ſhew the Enormity of that Doctrine, and the pernicious Effects that reſult from it.

There is no Reader that can be afraid of being miſtaken in Condemning ſuch a Doctrine; but if he ventures to Affirm, that the Doctrine of the Bonzes is juſt ſuch as Poſſevin repreſents it, he may juſtly be afraid of making a raſh Judgment: For we ought never to Condemn others upon the Teſtimony of their Enemies; 'tis expedient to be informed, whether they own that their Doctrine has been faithfully Repreſented. It would not be a faithful Repreſentation of it, if one ſhould inſiſt upon the Literal Senſe of ſome Laws, without any regard to the Interpretations of the Doctors; For at this rate, the moſt reaſonable Religions might be charged with abundance of Abſurdities. There are ſome harſh things in the Scripture, which it would be wrong to conſider as the Laws of the Chriſtians; for they take 'em not in the Literal Senſe, they explain, and ſoften 'em by other Paſſages, and according to the Analogy of Faith. We ſhould know whether the Bonzes do not the ſame thing with reſpect to ſome Laws of their Legiſlators. I make no difficulty to believe what is ſaid of the Tricks and Hypocriſy of thoſe Idolatrous Prieſts; but I think it probable, that they cover their Doctrines as well as their Conduct with an outward ſeverity; and perhaps we ought to impute but to ſome of 'em, what Poſſevin charges upon the whole Body of their Sects. Some Monks have taught, that the moſt Wicked Wretches have been ſaved by the bare Invocation of the Holy Virgin. The Extravagance of thoſe, who talk of the Treaſure of Indulgences, and who ſay that the Merits of the Saints, and their Works of Supererogation ſupply the want of Penitence in many Men, would afford good Chapters for a Relation that a Japaneſe Traveller ſhould Publiſh. Were it not an unjuſt thing, to give out all this as to many Articles of the Chriſtian Faith? One more, I would know what the Bonzes would anſwer to this Queſtion; Do you teach what Poſſevin imputes to you? I ſhould be glad alſo to ſee a Hiſtory Written by them of the Eſtabliſhment of Chriſtianity in their Iſlands, and of its Extirpation. And if they ſhould Write it, after having Read thoſe of Francis Solier and the Abbot de T. it would deſerve better ſtill to be carefully peruſed.

(A) Lived in the XIIth. Century.] Mr. Simon, (c) makes him of that Age. Some (d) place his Death in the year 1105. Others ſay he lived in the XIIIth. Century; for they ſay he was Expelled from France with the other Jews, by King Philip the Fair. Now the Edict of that King againſt (g) the Jews is of the 22th. of July 1307. Mr. Hoornbeek ſuppoſes that this Rabbin was baniſhed from France at that time. He makes him to be a Native of Lunel in Languedoc, and obſerves, that it is a Town in which there have been always many Jews. 'Tis a groſs Fault; for Lunel in Languedoc was never an Epiſcopal See. Pope Gregory in that place, means Luna a City of Italy in Tuſcany. The Ruins of it are to be ſeen at the Mouth of the Magra. Its Epiſcopal See was Transferred to Sarzana by Pope Nicolas V. (‡).

(C) Famous for Romances.] The firſt, or one of the firſt which ſhe made (l), was to contain many Vo-

'change her Fortune. She was not altogether miſtaken in this: Having a great 'Genius, ſhe was quickly talked of, and People were Ambitious to be acquainted with 'her. Mr. de Ville-Dieu, a Gentleman well made, and in pretty good Circumſtances, 'was one of the firſt that knew Mrs. des Jardins: he Eſteemed and Loved her, and 'tho' ſhe was not Handſome, he Married her. But by ill Fortune he Died ſometime 'after. The poor Woman retired for Grief into a Nunnery; but when ſhe had a lit-'tle recovered from her Trouble, ſhe left it, and Married M. de la Chaſte for her 'ſecond Husband, whom ſhe Buried alſo. Being ſenſibly touched with this new 'Misfortune, ſhe utterly renounced Marriage, and reſolved to ſpend the reſt of her 'Days in Gallantry. She began to hearken to the Love-Diſcourſes of the Sparks, 'and Anſwered them in Verſes, and Letters, which have a fine and delicate turn. The Author who affords me this Narrative, has omitted (D) many things, and has not been exact in the Circumſtances of Time; for he will have it that ſhe did not begin to lend an Ear to Love-Diſcourſes, till after the Death of her two Husbands: But I am aſſured from many Hands, that this Date is very ill placed, and that this Woman's Gallantry was infinitely leſs than ever at the time he ſpeaks of. There was in the Spaniſh Netherlands one Mrs. des Jardins, Contemporary with this, whoſe Name and Picture have for ſome years together been placed in the Front of the Almanack. She that makes the Subject of this Article, Died in the Year 1683 ||.

JARRIGE (Peter) a Native of Tulle in Limouſin, one of the moſt famous Preachers among the Jeſuits, but (A) otherwiſe a very ill Man, did ſo Reſent the not obtaining in his Order the Imployments he thought he deſerved, that he reſolved to turn Proteſtant. He Communicated his Deſign to a Miniſter †, who ‡ contrived Expedients for his retiring into Holland, and he made his Abjuration in the Conſiſtory of the Church of Rochelle on Chriſtmas Day 1647. Being arrived at Leyden, he Preached before a numerous Congregation, concerning the Motives of his Converſion; and afterwards endeavoured to make People believe that he was no longer a Papiſt. The States § granted him a Penſion. But ? 'the Jeſuits made Informations againſt 'him with the utmoſt Fury, and uſed all poſſible means to Defame him. They 'got him Condemned by the Judge of Rochelle to be Hanged, and afterwards Burnt '.... But all this Hurly-Burly ſerved only to make Publick the Vexation this loſs 'gave 'em, and to give Jarrige, who was Violent and Revengeful, a Pretence to 'Revenge himſelf upon them. He did it by a Book Intituled Les Jeſuites mis ſur l'Echa-'faud, (The Jeſuits brought upon the Scaffold) in which he treated them in ſo Bloody a 'manner, that their Society never had ſuch a Mortification. He Publiſh'd alſo a particular Anſwer to Peter Beauſés, who had beſpattered him * in a Heinous manner. Volumes in 8*vo.* according to the cuſtom of that time. But ſhe did not carry it on ſo far as ſhe deſigned; and I have heard ſay the Reaſon of it was, becauſe it was known, that ſhe intended to repreſent under Fictitious Names and with ſome Diſguiſes, the Adventures of a great Lady, who had Under-Match'd her ſelf. She was threatned with the Reſentment of thoſe concerned, if ſhe carried on the Intrigue to the end of the Romance; whereupon ſhe went no farther. But ſhe did not Bury her Talent; on the contrary, having found out a new way of writing Romances, ſhe Publiſhed a great many, with very good Succeſs. She brought into Faſhion thoſe little Gallant Novels, which quickly ſhew the good or ill Succeſs of a ſoft Paſſion, and ſhe put out of requeſt thoſe tedious and vaſt Relations of Heroical, Warlike and Amorous Adventures, which had brought ſo much profit to the Printers of Caſſandra, Cleopatra, Cyrus, Clelia, &c. The new Reliſh ſhe Created does ſtill prevail; and tho' that ſort of Books quickly loſe the grace of Novelty, yet the firſt Romances, that ſhe Compoſed upon this new Model, are ſtill read with Pleaſure; as her Journal amoureux, her Annales Galantes, her Galanteries Grenadines, and many others. She Publiſhed in 1672. Les entiez de la Cour d'Auguſte; a Romance which a noble Lady thought (a) very pretty. That which is intituled (b) Les déſordres de l'amour, and another intituled (c) Portrait des foibleſſes humaines, are not inferiour to the foregoing. 'Tis an unhappy thing that Mrs. des Jardins ſhould have opened a way to a Liberty, that is daily more and more abuſed; which is, to Father ones Inventions and Love-Intrigues (d) upon the greateſt Men of the latter Ages, and to mix 'em with matters of Fact, that have ſome Foundation in Hiſtory. This mixture of Truth and Fiction is ſpread in abundance of new Books; it ſpoils the Judgment of young People, and makes one unwilling to believe what is really Credible. See the Note C of the Article Nidhard.

(D) Has omitted many things.] Since I obſerve this, it were expedient for me to ſupply thoſe things; but I am not in a proper Place to conſult thoſe who could inform me, and ſo I cannot repair the Fault, of which I give notice to my Reader. I may be excuſed: But Richelet cannot ſo well come off; for as he lived in Paris, and led no Sedentary Life, it was an eaſy thing for him to inform himſelf of the time that Mrs. des Jardins left the Country, and ſettled in the Capital City of the Kingdom. He might as eaſily have learn'd what Acquaintances ſhe firſt Contracted, what Patrons ſhe got, at what time, and with what Books ſhe firſt came out; what was the Date of her firſt Marriage and Widowhood, of her ſecond Marriage, and of the Death of her ſecond Husband; the Chronological Series of her Romances; the time of her Death, and many things of this Nature, of which he has not ſaid a Word; and yet you ſee in the running Title of his Book, The Lives of the French Authors. How can one call ſo a Narrative, in which ſo many Eſſential things are wanting? You'll tell me doubtleſs, that many Readers will not be Angry at thoſe Omiſſions; but this do's not juſtify the Writer. They would not have been diſpleaſed to find in his Book the things that he has forgotten. Abundance of other Readers would have been very glad to have ſeen 'em. He has not then taken the beſt Method; for 'tis much better to do what pleaſes many People and diſpleaſes no Body, than to do what diſpleaſes ſome, and do's not diſpleaſe others.

(A) But otherwiſe a very ill Man.] This is indiſputable from what he Confeſſes himſelf in his Retractation. So that I need not uſe the Ar-

The thing was Executed in 1650. Jarrige left Leyden, and went to the Jesuits of Antwerp, and immediately published (B) his Recantation; but 'tis not known what became of him afterwards. Many People believe that the Jesuits imprisoned him (C) for Life. This might be; but other Reasons may be given why such Argument which a very worthy Man enforced in Presence of many Protestants. He said, that a Man of Letters, as Jarrige was, and perpetually taken up with preaching, could not have remembred at Leyden all the little Adventures he displayed in his Jesuites mis sur l'Echafaud, and in his Answer to James Beaufe, unless he had put 'em down, as he heard of them, with the Names and Sirnames of the Persons, and with all the little Circumstances of Time and Places. Now this was a sign of a corrupt Mind, and the Character of an ill Man; for he had never been at the Pains of keeping such a Register, if he had not designed to lay up Arms for the Time to come, in case he should break with the Jesuits. He was thinking of Revenge, and of the means of making himself dreaded, even before he knew whether he should ever have occasion for them. There are some Men who keep even the least Notes of their Friends, and especially take great care of the Letters, which they might take Advantage of in case of a Rupture. They consider the Inconstancy of our Passions, and they Love (e), as if one Day they were to hate, and take their Measures accordingly. 'Tis certain, that those who keep with that Prospect the Letters of their Friends, their most free Conversations, and strictest Confidences, are dishonest Men. The Person I speak of, used this Comparison against Peter Jarrige's Diary. I will not vouch for this Thought; I relate it only as a meer Matter of Fact, every one may judge of it as he pleases. I have no occasion for it to comment upon my Text, as will appear from the following Remarks.

(B) Immediately published his Recantation.] He confest (f) that a virulent Passion of Rage had made him leave the Jesuits, and that there was (a) nothing in the cursed and scandalous Sermon he preached at Leyden, but what was truly speaking a Blasphemy, so much the more punishable in the Judgment of God, because his Conscience gave the Lye to his Words. He accused himself (b) of having cloathed his first and impudent Lye with Circumstances no less false than Criminal, namely, that God had for Sixteen Years before put into his Heart the first Foundations of the Work he had begun some Months before in his own Country, and which he so happily and satisfactorily accomplished in Holland. He confest (c) that by an excess of Malice, he had defamed many innocent Persons, to revenge himself of two Men whom he thought culpable; that upon the reading of the Sentence (d) by which he was condemned to die for a Religion, which he detested in his Heart--- Rage deprived him of his Judgment, and that not knowing what he did, he had done like those mad Dogs, who bite their Masters, without knowing them. Being therefore destitute of Reason, says he (e), and seized with a Spirit of Vengeance, I wrote a virulent Book against the Province of Guienne, from whence I came---------I used all manner of Artifices to bespatter their Reputation. Rhetorick is like Prospective Glasses, which make little Things appear great, and represent a Frog as big as an Ox. 'Twas sufficient for me to have some slight Foundation to build a great Crime upon; I did not care to speak Truth, provided I had some judicious subterfuge to cover my Lyes with. I industriously laboured upon a little matter, and by the Circumstances I added, I made a great Elephant of a little Fly. Those who know the little Accidents and of small Consequence, that happened in that holy Province, see better than others, that the desire of Revenge supplied me with a great deal of Art to magnify little Things, and with too much Invention to make 'em probable. The Reverend Father Ponthelier stoutly but modestly reproached me with it, when I was in the most violent Heat of my Anger, and received no other Answer from me but this, that since Father Rousseau and Father Beaufais had used a Thousand Tricks and Inventions to get me condemned to the Flames, it was very reasonable, that I should find Inventions to revenge my self, and that I should build upon a little Foundation heinous Accusations, as they had built theirs upon Appearances. I added, that they had not only written as I did, but that they had actually hanged and burnt me in Effigie---------(f) Like a revengeful Man, I took the wrong way to exercise my Resentment.---------If I met with any slight Occasion to gloss upon, I failed not to make my Conjectures pass for Proofs; and if it happened that any were suspected, right or wrong, I took those Suspicions for Truths, and endeavoured to make worthy Men pass for great Villains, who upon a serious Inquiry, would be found guilty of meer Indiscretion, or at most of an inconsiderable Fault. Any one that shall seriously and impartially examine my Discourse, will find, that I made specious and artful Preludes to make my Forgeries go down the better. I have said too much to be believed, and the Hereticks themselves, though for the time to come they will lay great Stress upon my Defamations, disapproved 'em in the Synod of Middleburg: And a Man must needs be as much incensed as I was, when I wrote that Book, to give Credit to my Contumelies. Certainly, if any thing did happen, those that were guilty were dismist from the Society, which having the Qualities of the great Ocean, cannot keep dead Carcasses in its Bosom. My Accusations are therefore unjust, having charged an Illustrious Order with the Faults of those they had purged out, as unworthy to live amongst the Saints, and to entertain the Thoughts of the Devil, amongst Angels. My Fury promoted me to discover the Evil, and to say nothing of the Remedies applied to it. I have indeed said in some Places, what some had done: but I did not add that they were immediately, and without any Delay, expelled as pestiferous Men. I made a Satyr to revenge my self, and not a Panegyrick to praise them. Those who know the Jesuits, will no doubt believe, that the Crimes of Regicide, Infanticide, Sodomy, and such other abominable Transgressions, are meer Forgeries---------(g) How often have I, against good Reasoning, made use of captious Reflections to draw a general Inference from a particular thing, and to ascribe to all the Society, what could have been verified but of one private Person, if I had been reduced to a judicial Testimony? What Stories have I not forged and altered, a Thousand Ways, in order to cut more sensibly, and to make deeper and more dangerous Wounds? If I would refute every thing in particular, or give a Reason of my Accusations, I should trouble you, dear Reader, with a Thousand Circumstances, which would render my Retractation very tedious and irreligious. It suffices then to say, that I retract that pernicious Book in general, and in all its Parts, without taking in the Things which I have said of Father Rousseau and Father Beaufais for my Justification and Defence. I beseech the equitable Readers to take this Book as one of my Declarations, and I entreat them through the merciful Bowels of Jesus Christ, never to read that, because it is Heretical, and never to cast their Eyes upon this, because it is a Work which an Evil Conscience has conceived, Melancholy has formed, and Revenge has produced.

(f) Pag. 71.

(g) Pag. 79.

I leave my Reader to judge, whether the Gentlemen of Port Royal have any good Reason for maintaining, that Peter Jarrige published an insufficient Recantation, and that he indeed accuses himself of having written his Book against the Jesuits with too much Passion, but that he does not disown, in particular, any of the scandalous Stories he had related. Those who answered Maimbourg's History of Calvinism, failed not (b) to take Advantage of this Reflection of the Gentlemen of Port-Royal.

(C) Imprison'd him for Life.] As he foresaw this would be said, or something worse, he affected to make it known, that the Jesuits had given him a very good Reception, and that they who would not believe it, might come and see him. Here's what he wrote to a Merchant. 'I know very well, 'that the Ministers and Gentlemen I have left, will 'say, that I'm dead or imprisoned; but do me this 'Favour, to desire those who shall come to Antwerp, 'to come and see me in the College, and I promise 'you, I will not only speak to them with Freedom, 'but, if they please, I will wait on them through 'the Town, and travel with them into the Catholick 'Territories (i). To which you may add this Pas-such a Man (D) should be seen no more. I am persuaded, that the Historian quoted by me, will not take it ill, if for the Instruction of the Publick, I rectify (E) his Account. In the Answers that were made to Jarrige's Retractation, it was said that his Morals

'I know very well, 'that the Hereticks measuring the Actions of o-'thers by their own, will spread false Reports, that 'I have been poisoned, or clapt up in a Dungeon, 'where I can only see the Light through a Hole; 'that the Reverend Father John Ponthelier, who 'was the principal Instrument God made use of to 'take me out of the Abyss, has seduced me, and 'cunningly conveyed me from the United Provin-'ces, where I was safe, to deliver me into the 'Hands of my Enemies, or to Death. But it con-'cerns all the Apostates of several Orders, who are 'still in the Mire of Error, and only kept in it, out 'of fear of Punishment, to know that these Stories 'are false, and that I am escaped out of the Clutch-'es of the Wolves, to enter into the Bosom of a 'merciful Pastor, who glories to carry the straying 'Sheep upon his Shoulders. Certainly, if I was 'used according to my Crimes, an Imprisonment of 'ten Years would not be sufficient to expiate them. 'But since I return into the Bosom of my Father 'voluntarily, and without constraint, where Sin has 'for two Years abounded, Grace at present doth 'much more abound. He affected to make it known, how many Securities had been granted him. 'I have obtained from his Majesty, said he '(l), one of the finest Patents of Pardon and Abso-'lution that ever was: So that I neither fear Bour-'deaux, for the Book, nor Rochelle, for the Sen-'tence of Death. I have received in the second 'Place, Letters of Assurance from our Holy Father 'the Pope, with Power to retire into any Catholick 'Town I please, in which he has commanded 'all Magistrates and Ecclesiasticks, to protect 'me, being contented that I should only wear the 'Habit of a Priest. I have received Thirdly, a 'Pass-Port from the Arch-Duke Leopold, through all 'his Territories. Fourthly, the General of the 'Society of Jesus, Francis Picolomini, has sent me a 'Patent to enter again among the Jesuits, where I 'am with an entire Abolition of my Fault, with-'out imposing upon me any Penance or Satisfacti-'on, except what I shall take upon my self: the 'same has given me other Patents to go into what 'Kingdom or Province of the World I please, so 'that I have the choice of all the Colleges of the 'Society: All this is signed with the Great Seals of 'his Office, and nothing is more Authentick. And 'to compleat my Happiness, Father Ponthelier, 'who has procured me all these Graces and Won-'ders, has leave to live with me as long as he pleas-'es, and he will never leave me till I am entirely 'satisfied; I can assure you of it. Besides, (which 'is a thing granted to no Body) I have the Choice 'of being a Secular Priest, or of remaining in the 'Society of the Jesuits; and I expect a Definitive 'Answer from Rome.

(D) Why such a Man should be seen no more.] His Recantation proved him to be the greatest Rogue upon the Earth; for in it he acknowledged, that to revenge himself of two Jesuits, he had defamed the whole Society with false Accusations (a) of Regicide, Infanticide, Sodomy, and such other abominable Crimes. When a Man owns himself a publick Calumniator upon such Crimes as these, the best thing he can do, is to conceal himself all the rest of his Days. If he has any Conscience he ought to confine himself to a place of Penitence as long as he lives; if he has none, and has any Sense of Honour left, he ought to shun all Company, and like Bellerophon (b) avoid the very Footsteps of Men. He ought then to practise what Balzac said he would do for a much lesser Reason. I would go, says he (c), and eat my Heart in the Deserts of Thebais, Ipse meum cor edens, hominum vestigia vitans.

(E) I rectify his Account.] Jarrige (d) 'was a 'turbulent and ambitious Man; and possibly he 'converted himself more out of Spite to see him-'self crossed in the Design he had to arrive to the 'Dignities of his Order, than out of any Zeal for 'the Truth. He made an Abjuration of the Ro-'mish Religion, in the Consistory of Rochelle, on 'Christmas-Day, after which he retired into Hol-'land. This was the first breach made in their 'Society, none of which, before this Man, was 'ever known to forsake the Catholick Religion. 'At least, if others have left it, there was no noise 'made about it, either because the Jesuits thought 'fit to be silent, or because the Proselytes were 'such as deserved no Complaints about 'em——— '(e). Some time after his Book was published, 'Jarrige disappeared, and the Jesuits boasted, that 'as he left their Order, only out of Spleen, he was 'returned to it out of Repentance; that he had 'shut himself up in one of their Houses, to hide 'himself from all worldly Commerce, and to 'do Penance all his Life. But because he was never 'seen afterwards, it was believed on the contrary, 'that the Jesuits had caused him to be carried off, 'and that they had secretly revenged themselves up-'on him, for the Displeasure he had given them by 'his Change. Indeed, it is not imaginable, that 'after they had made so much Noise for the Loss 'of him, they would not draw some Advantage 'from his Return, and produce him at least some-'times in the Provinces, where his Desertion was 'known, to lessen the Joy that the Protestants con-'ceived upon that Conquest. Besides, we have had 'since many other Experiments of what they can 'do against those who desert them, and we are not 'ignorant, that they know how to steal them a-'way from their safest Retreats, and make them ex-'piate with long Sufferings, the Crime of violating 'their Vows. I shall make three Remarks upon this Narrative.

Maximilian Philo* is the Author of it. Scaliger's Mistake is also to be found in the Catalogue of the Bodleian Library.

(i) Hasenmullerus, Historia Ordinis Jesuitici, pag. 127 edit. Vran. of. 1629.

The 1. will be short. This Author should not have expressed himself by a Possibly upon the Motives of Jarrige's Change. Mr. Spanheim was convinced of it (f) at the first Conversation he had with him, and his whole Retractation shews it.

My 2. Observation is, That it was not the first Breach made in the Society of the Jesuits, attended with Consequences that made a great Noise. In the XVI. Century, a Jesuit called Elias Hasenmullerus, left the Order to turn Lutheran. He was a Man who had curiously observed the Strength and Weakness of the Society; so that for fear of his publishing the History of it, the Jesuits did all that was possible to seize him. He had the good luck to avoid their Snares, by hiding himself sometimes in one place, and sometimes in another; but at last, to put himself out of the reach of their Conspiracies, he retired to Wittemberg in the Year 1587 (g), where he spent his time, in putting the last Hand to a History of the Jesuits, which he designed to publish. He died before he could do it: His Manuscript was printed sometime after by Polycarp Lyserus. 'Tis a very strong piece (h) against the Jesuits, and take it altogether, it is more provoking than the Books of Jarrige, though perhaps there are not so many particular Adventures in it. This Work was received with great Applauses. The Jesuits caused it to be refuted by James Gretserus, which occasioned many Books pro and con.

I have said, that perhaps Hasenmullerus does not tell so many Adventures as Jarrige; but 'tis certain, that in the Chapter of the Vow of Chastity, he relates some that are very scandalous; and doubtless to make the Impurities of which he accuses the Jesuits, the more abhorred, he has laid open many Precautions, with which he says they fortify themselves against this Sin. He says, they make use of Foods that mortifie and enervate the Flesh, and that they order Watchings, Fastings, Whippings, and Hair-Cloths to those that confess their Temptations. (i) In cibis & potu variis utuntur herbis & pharmacis, quibus natura vim enervant, & sobolem, ut ita dicam, mera viscera propria occidunt priusquam nascatur, & à Deo ordinatæ humanæ propagationis homines, & à Deo ordinatæ humanæ propagationis homines. Si qui fratres in confessionibus conqueruntur de illes. Si qui fratres in confessionibus conqueruntur de carnis infirmitate, flammis atque stimulis, eam ut excarnis infirmitate, flammis atque stimulis, eam ut exstinguant ordinant illis vigilias, jejunia, cilicia & stinguant ordinant illis vigilias, jejunia, cilicia & flagella quibus carnem suam doment, castigent, & flagella quibus carnem suam doment, castigent, & in servitutem, ut loquuntur, spiritus redigant. He adds, that there are some who study to raise and excite Morals (F) had not been edifying whilſt he appeared a Proteſtant. Konig calls him * Jarrichius, and will have him to have publiſhed the Jeſuit † upon the Scaffold, in the Year 1665; which implies three Faults. In the Catalogue of the Bodleian Library, he is confounded with another Jeſuit, whoſe Work is aſcribed to him, and whoſe Name was Peter Jarric.

JAVERSAC (N.) was one of the Authors that entered the Liſts during Balzac's great Quarrel with Father Goulu. He was a Native of a Town near Angouleſme, and he removed to Paris with a Book againſt ‡ Phyllarchus and § Narciſſus, both at once, under the Name of Ariſtarchus to Nicander. His Criticiſms are worth nothing in ſome Places; for inſtance, he maintains, it ought be ſaid Ruette, and not Ruelle; Livraire, and not Libraire, ſince they ſay in French, un Livre, and not un Libre. This new Author found himſelf attack'd in his Lodgings, and even in his Bed, with Sword and Piſtol; but as he was Young and Valiant, he took his Sword, and purſued his Enemy into the Street, and got a great Honour, for this Courageous Defence. Nevertheleſs, the very next Day this Adventure was ſung upon the Pont-Neuf, quite otherwiſe (A) than it happened. A Libel was publiſhed, intituled, La defaite du Paladin Javerſac par les alliez, & confederez du Prince des Feuilles ‖. I have heard a Man of great Wit ſay, that Balzac was the Author of that Piece, and that it is the beſt that came out upon that Diſpute. A Sacrilegious Calumny  was found in the Title of that Libel; for Father Goulu was charged in it with that Attempt, notwithſtanding the Sacredneſs of his Profeſſion. Javerſac declared him innocent of it, and imputed it only to Balzac ††, but diſcreet Perſons ‡‡ could neither accuſe Phyllarchus nor Narciſſus of it. That which is certain, is, that it has been publiſhed riſh in their Soul, a great Hatred for the Fair Sex. (k) Nonnullos vidi qui nihil voluerunt edere, quod a muliere coſtum ſcibeant. Alios dicentes audivi, quotres de fœmina cogito, toties ſtomachus meus & bilis commoventur & conturbantur. Alius dicebat, tædet pudetque me quod a muliere ſum in hanc lucem editus; dignus certe cui vacca fuiſſet genitrix. Alii nihil prorſus boni in tota mulieris ſubſtantia eſſe dicunt, ſique ex illis quidam cæteros in harum calumniarum palæſtra vincere conantur, illi ad mentionem mulieris expuunt, & in tabula maledicos & in ſexum fœmineum contumelioſos Mantuani verſus (quos tamen is non niſi de malis cecinit) deſcriptos ob oculos ponunt, ut ſic in ſeipſis majus in mulieres odium excitent. By this we ſee that all ſorts of Extravagancies may enter into the Mind, under a falſe Devotion; for what can be more abſurd, and more fooliſh, than thoſe Diſcourſes of thoſe People? My Stomach riſes, ſay they, and my Choler is ſtirr'd as often as I think of a Woman; I am ſorry and aſhamed, to owe my Birth to a Woman; I ſpit when I hear a Woman mentioned. I have not found in Hafenmullerus's Book, a Paſſage quoted by a Modern Author (l): he pretends to have read in it, that a Workman who was at work for the Jeſuits, tho' they gave him Meat and Drink enough, could not careſs his Wife; and yet when he laboured at other People's Houſes, even when he well performed his Nocturnal Duty, he drank nothing but Water: For which Reaſon his Wife would not ſuffer him to work for the Jeſuits any longer, and afterwards the Magiſtrates of Landsberg (†) did not permit any Body to buy their Beer. If it had that ill Quality, the Magiſtrates were to be praiſed for forbiding Laymen to drink it; for the Conjugal Duty is ſo privileged a Caſe, that many Caſuiſts ſubmit the Laws of the Church to it. They pretend, that when faſting hinders a Man from paying his Duty to his Wife, he is ipſo facto, diſpenced from it. See the Margin (m).

If the Converſion of the Jeſuit Hafenmullerus made a great Noiſe, that of the Jeſuit Reibing made more Noiſe ſtill (n). 'Tis he, who is thought to have contributed to bring the Duke of Newburg to the Roman Communion. See the Article Reibing. Thus you ſee two eminent Converſions of Jeſuits beſides that of Peter Jarrige. I ſay nothing of Daniel Peirol, Miniſter of the Church of Montauban, and Profeſſor in the Academy of the ſame Town. He had been a Jeſuit, and he wrote ſomething againſt Father Coton. I have found this in the 21ſt. Page of Gisbert Voetius's conf raternitas Mariana.

My III. Obſervation is, that Jarrige was not carried off: He retired voluntarily, being moved to it by the Suggeſtion of the Jeſuit Pontbelier. This appears by the Authentick Pieces that have been printed. Such is the Letter he wrote to the Merchant of Leyden, and much more his Recantation (o).

(F) That his Morals had not been edifying.] I have ſeen two Anſwers to his Retractation; one written by Ezekiel Daunois of Compiegne, a Miniſter of the Goſpel: The other by John Nicolai, of Luxemburg, a Member of the French Church at Amſterdam. In the Preface of this Second Anſwer, I have read, that Peter Jarrige endeavoured in vain to be admitted into the Miniſtry, before the Four Years of Trial were expired, which the Synods have appointed for thoſe who come from Popery. 'That touch, ſays he, fill'd you with Indignation after your laſt Rejection in the Synod of Harlem, where you was alſo accuſed, (your Conſcience knows whether it was wrongfully) of an Action as infamous as thoſe filthy Things, of which you accuſe the Jeſuits of your Province to put 'em upon the Scaffold. Now, though it was not then examined to the bottom, foraſmuch as the Witneſſes were not preſent; yet the Suſpicion remained, conſidering the great Knowledge and Experience you have expreſſed in your Book, of ſuch ſort of Impurities. The Letter which the Leyden Merchant wrote to him, will explain all this: theſe words are to be found in it. 'You may remember with what Spirit you was led, when you returned from the Synod of Middleburg, which you had in vain ſo vehemently ſollicited, to obtain an exception to the Order made againſt admitting to the Miniſtry (which you was fond of to cauſe a greater Scandal) thoſe that come from Popery, till after a Trial of Four Years. Being refus'd, you made your Preſumption, Pride and Vanity, conſpicuouſly appear; and in your way Home you happen'd to be at Night in the Cabin of the Veſſel, where were many Women, whom not being able to talk with but by Signs, you ſhewed them by Candle-Light your obſcene Parts, and made them ſet up a Cry againſt this villanous and abominable Prieſt, as they call'd you; which not only awaked a good Servant of God, who was there, but all the reſt of the Crew, who running at the Alarm, upon hearing the Women, talked of nothing but throwing you in the Water; which they would have done, had it not been for that good Man, who pacified them; but the Boatman proteſted that he would tell it in the place from whence you came,

Since the firſt Edition of this Dictionary, I have learned (B) ſome Circumſtances, which I will give an account of to my Readers.

JENISCHIUS (Paul) was born at Antwerp the 17th. of June, 1558, and died at Studgard the 18th. of December, 1647. He was a Learned Man, and underſtood many Languages. His Book, intituled, Theſaurus animarum, expoſed him to a grievous Perſecution: he was baniſhed, and his Baniſhment laſted above 50 Years. He bore it very patiently, and enjoyed an extraordinary good Health to the laſt Year of his Life, * eating well, ſleeping well, and ſpending his Time in Muſick, which he underſtood to Perfection, and in the Study of the Holy Scripture, and in Mechanicks. He had Nineteen Children, whereof Four only were living when he died. He was grievouſly Sick the laſt Year of his Life, and he died in acute Pains †. He has been unknown to the Bibliographers of the Low-Countries.

IGNATIUS, Founder of the Jeſuits. See LOYOLA.

ILLYRICUS (Matthias Flacius) one of the moſt Learned Divines of the Confeſſion of Augsburg, was born at Albona in Iſtria ‡ the 3d. of March 1520. He ſtudied Claſſical Learning at Venice, under Egnatius; and at Seventeen Years of Age, finding in himſelf a ſtrong Inclination for the Study of Divinity, he reſolved to become a Monk, becauſe he could not maintain himſelf in the Univerſities, and ſo the only way to ſatisfie his Inclination, was to ſtudy in a Monaſtery. He communicated his Deſign to a Provincial of the Franciſcans, a Relation of his Mother. But this Pro-him that publiſhed (a) La defaite du Paladin Javerſac. That Book ſays, that the Paladin was of Cognac, where he had pleaded ſome Cauſes; that after the Publication of his Book, there was a Conſpiracy to fall upon him in the open Street; but that they were forced to attack him in his Chamber, becauſe he kept it all Day long; that he was ſurprized aſleep in the Arms of his Landlord's Wife, on Thurſday the 11th. of Auguſt, 1628, at nine a Clock in the Morning, and awaked by a Salvo of Baſtinadoes, which laſted as long as it pleaſed the Aggreſſor, ſince Paladin wholly reſigned himſelf to Providence. The Concluſion of the Libel is, 'that the Friends of Phylarchus joining in this 'with thoſe of the contrary Party, have ſworn to 'root out as many Javerſac's as they can meet with, 'and to make it plain to bad Poets, that beſides the 'Golden, Braſen, and Iron Ages, ſo celebrated 'the Fables, there is ſtill a Wooden Age to come, 'which the ancient Poets have not mentioned, in 'in the Miſeries and Calamities whereof they 'ſhall have a greater Share than other Men. I make uſe of the Edition (b) of 1665. See the following Remark.

(a) 'Tis a Piece of 16 Pages, in 8. It has been reprinted in the Folio Edition of Balzac, with ſome other Pieces made for him.

(b) That is of the Folio Edition of Balzac's Works.

(B) I have learned ſome Circumſtances which I will give an account of. | Javerſac's Book was printed and reprinted in 1628, with this Title, Diſcours d'Ariſtarque à Nicandre, ſur le jugement des Eſprits de ce temps, & ſur les fautes de Phyllarque. The firſt thing to be met with in it, is an Advertiſement of the Printer, full of Lyes; for 'tis there given out, that they were forced to uſe all ſorts of Artifices to over-reach the Vigilance, wherewith the Author hinder'd the Publication of his Work. He did not love it ſo little as to be willing to expoſe it to the Rage of Envy. Afterwards you find an allufive Letter, which he writ to Mr. Bergeron, Councellor to the King, and Referendary in Chancery. As he ſuppoſes that Mr. Bergeron had raiſed Difficulties againſt the Licence, in order to deprive him of the Advantage of being the firſt that ſhould publiſh any thing about the Diſpute of Balzac and Goulu, and to give time to la Motte Aigron to be before him, he expreſſes a great Rage in that Letter. In the third Place, you ſee his Preface, wherein he mentions the great Efforts his Enemies had made to ſtop the Impreſſion of his Book. At laſt you find the Book itſelf. This is not the only Work that Javerſac has publiſhed. In the ſame Year 1628, came out the Diſcours d'Ariſtarque à Calidoxe ſur ce qui s'eſt paſſé entre lui & Balzac. The Impreſſion coſt him (c) a Hundred Crowns; and it was not poſſible for him to get it done at Paris, 'either with Licence or 'without it. He ſays, that his Father (d) 'had 'had many honourable Deputations, and ſome of 'the moſt important Poſts of the Aſſembly of the 'Proteſtants before the Rebellions——and (e) 'that he can prove, that his Anceſtors have acquired their Nobility by the right of Veterans, in 'many honourable Poſts of the Crown of Navarre. He ſays alſo (f), that he had offered to give Balzac Satisfaction, either as a Gentleman or a Philoſopher. He relates at large, the Misfortune that happen'd to him, of being aſſaulted in his Bed (a). He (b) did a little ward off the Blow of one of the Villains that came into his Chamber; but 'tis too honourable a thing for me, ſays he, not to confeſs that he ſtruck me in the Arm, ſaying, you was forbidden to write againſt Balzac. He adds (c) that his Landlady was wounded in her Little Finger; and (d) that he purſued them with Sword in Hand into the Street, and that two Hundred Witneſſes, who ſaw him in his Shirt upon the Threſhold, had ſaid it every where before him; that he made a Paſs at him who had ſtruck him, and that Fifty Perſons who ſaw his Sword bend to the Hilt, knew that this Rogue had a Coat of Mail. He obſerves (e), that two or three Days before, he had had the Honour to ſerve a Marquis in a Quarrel. Truly, I believe he was fitter to fight than to write Books, and that he would quickly have worſted Balzac in a Diſpute to be decided with Sword in Hand. He uſes againſt him ſome ſtrong (f) Rhodomantades; but he expreſſes ſome fear, that his Adverſary (g) would accuſe him of ſome youthful mad Pranks in Love. We muſt remember, that he never ſuſpected Father Goulu to be the Cauſe of that Inſult. I know not, ſays he (h), why Balzac is afraid of me, if he is not guilty; and ſince he thinks to clear himſelf ſo well every where from that Crime, by throwing it upon Phylarchus, who has ſhewed himſelf much more cenſorious. I had ſo many convincing Proofs againſt Balzac, and ſo good an Opinion of Phylarchus's Honeſty, that I could not ſuſpect him in the leaſt. My Book, I think, gave him more Diſturbance than my Perſon.

Provincial (A) who was inclined to the Proteſtant Religion, adviſed him to go into Germany, and not to ſhut up himſelf in a Convent. Flacius followed his Advice, and went to Baſil (B) in the year 1539. He ſtaid there ſome Months, and then he went to Tubingen, and from thence to Wittemberg in the year 1541, and became a Diſciple of Luther and Melanchthon. He maintained himſelf by teaching Greek and Hebrew. Having Communicated to Pomeranus, and afterwards to Luther, the Temptations that Tormented him, about Sin, the Wrath of God, and Predeſtination, publick Prayers were put up for him, and Scriptural Comforts were Adminiſtred to him, ſo that this went off. He receiv'd a thouſand Tokens of Kindneſs and Liberality from Melanchthon. They Married him, and gave him a publick Employment in the Univerſity ß in the year 1544. The War having diſpers'd the Scholars in Saxony, he remov'd to Brunſwick, where he made himſelf famous by his Lectures: He went and Re-aſſum'd his firſt Imployment at Wittemberg, in the year 1547, and a little after he Violently oppos'd the Interim, and all the Cautions that Melanchthon was for; and that he might have more Liberty to declaim againſt Popery, he retir'd to Magdeburg ɣ, which was then put to the Ban of the Empire. He Publiſh'd ſeveral Books there, but the moſt conſiderable of his Labours was doubtleſs that Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory call'd the Centuries of Magdeburg, which he had the chief Direction of. He accepted the Imployment that was offer'd him in the year 1557. in the new Univerſity of Jena, where he was a Profeſſor for five years; after which, not being able to agree with Victorinus (C) Strigelius his Collegue, he retired to Ratisbonne, where he went on Publiſhing many Books. He was invited into Brabant, with ſome others in the year 1567, to Model ſome Churches after the Augsburg Confeſſion: But the Perſecution diſpers'd all theſe Churches ſoon after, ſo that he remov'd from thence to Strasburg, and then to Francfort, where he found a great Declenſion of his Glory; for he was forſaken by moſt of his Adherents, becauſe he was accus'd of Manicheiſm, under pretence that he taught, that Sin was not an Accident, but the very Subſtance of the Soul †. He Died at Francfort the 11th. of March 1575 ζ. He was a Man that had excellent Talents, a vaſt Wit, a great deal of Learning, and a mighty Zeal againſt Popery; but his Turbulent, Furious, and Quarrelſome Temper, ſpoil'd all his good Qualities, and occaſion'd a thouſand Diſorders in the Proteſtant Church. He made no ſcruple to Declare, that Princes were to be kept in awe, by the fear of Inſurrections *. There was no Reaſon to lament his Death; for Diviſions which are always Scandalous, were then very Pernicious, becauſe of the Advantages which the Church of Rome drew from them, to inſult the growing Reformation. Some have ſaid, that the only good thing ⸸ he did was to Die. But this is overdoing things. (A) This Provincial, who was inclined to the Proteſtant Religion.] He deſerves a Place in the Proteſtant Martyrology, ſince after he had been Impriſon'd twenty years becauſe he was ſuſpected of Hereſy, he was thrown into the Sea. He was call'd Baldus Lupatinus. See the Margin (a).

(B) And went to Baſil in the year 1539.] He was therefore nineteen years Old. Verheiden is therefore miſtaken (b) in ſaying, that Illyricus made a Journey to Baſil at ſeventeen years of Age. Mr. Teiſſier has followed (c) Verheiden.

(C) Not being able to agree with Victorinus Strigelius.] They differ'd about the Converſion of Man, and the Power of Free-Will. They Diſputed upon it before the Dukes of Saxony at Weimar (d). They went into two Extreams. Strigelius inclin'd to the ſide of thoſe who were call'd Adiaphoriſts, and Synergiſts, who aſcrib'd a great Power to Free-Will, and pretended that Original Sin did only ſlightly (e) touch the Soul. Flacius on the contrary maintain'd, that this Sin was the very Subſtance of the Soul. The Diſpute laſted thirteen Seſſions: It was Publiſh'd with a Preface of Muſæus, who was one of Flacius's Followers (f). We have here a viſible Effect of the deſire of Contradicting others; which is a Paſſion that commonly carries Men of a lively Wit beyond all Bounds. Flacius not being † able to content himſelf with a Moderate Oppoſition, ſet himſelf at the greateſt diſtance poſſible from his Antagoniſt; and ſeeing him maintain that the Soul was not Wounded by Original Sin, but in its Accidental Faculties, he undertook to prove, that the very Subſtance of the Soul is Corrupted, whence it followed that Sin is the Subſtance of the Soul. Flacius had never thought of that Doctrine, if his Collegue had not taught the Contrary. But if the Diſpute which aroſe betwixt theſe two Profeſſors, ſhews what the Spirit of Contradiction, and the ἐμφυτον τῆς ἀνθρώπου, can do, it ſhews alſo how fit the Peripatetick Philoſophy is to foment the Diviſions of Divinity. For Illyricus's Doctrine would have offended no Body, if they had believed, as the new Philoſophers do, that there are no Accidents diſtinct from Subſtances, but that for Example, Pain is nothing elſe but the Soul it ſelf, as it is Modified in ſuch a manner: which being granted, it is plain that Illyricus's Doctrine is moſt true. Sin is not a diſtinct Being from a ſinful Soul, and Virtue is not a diſtinct Being from a Virtuous Soul. I don't apprehend how the Divines, who ſuppoſe a real Diſtinction between the Soul and its Modifications, can ſay there happens a change in Man, when he paſſes from a State of Innocence, to that of Guilt, and from a State of Sin, to that of Grace. According to theſe Divines, when Man Sins, a new Entity, diſtinct from the Soul, is produced, which being joyned with the Soul, Compoſes together with it a Whole, which contains two Beings really diſtinct from one another, one of which is called Subſtance, and the other Accident. I maintain, that this Conjunction does not change the Soul, and that it continues to be preciſely what it was before. Mix as much as you pleaſe Grains of Wheat: with Grains of Barly, you'll never make them ceaſe to be Wheat: and in all Natural and Artificial Mixtures, it is true, that the Compounds become capable of a new Action; but each part of them, as it is diſtinct from every other, retains preciſely the ſame Nature it had before. In like manner, if the Soul was really diſtinct from its Sin, that is to ſay, from the Sin to which it ſhould be joined, it would not paſs into another State. A Soul once Innocent, would always be ſo. See what the (g) Nominaliſts ſay againſt thoſe, who teach that Modes are really diſtinct from Subſtances.

vantage. He got from thence an Antient Maſs Book (D), which he Printed in the year 1557. This will give us an opportunity of diſcuſſing many things. Thoſe Libraries afforded him vaſt Collections, which have been ſerviceable to many People. I

(D) He got from thence an Antient Maſs Book.] Here is the Title of this Work Printed at Strasburg by Chriſtopher Mylius, in the year 1557. Miſſa latina, quæ olim ante Romanam circa ſeptingenteſimum Domini annum in uſu fuit, bona fide ex vetuſto authenticoque Codice deſcripta à Matthia Flacio Illyrico. So Mr. Colomies (b) gives it, and poſſibly he had it from (i) du Peyrat. He adds a great many Curious things about this Maſs. He ſays, that the Lutherans believing it to be contrary to the Faith and Practice of the Catholicks, expreſſed upon all occaſions how glad they were of that Diſcovery; that the Catholicks on their Part, without any ſtrict Examination of this Miſſal, Prohibited it in (k) their Indexes; ——That the Lutherans coming to examine this Miſſal with more care, and finding it not favourable to them, ſuppreſs'd all the Copies they could find, ſo that it is grown extreamly ſcarce, and that the Catholicks taking Advantage of (l) that Retractation, have ſince caus'd it to be Reprinted, notwithſtanding the Prohibition of the Pope and the King of Spain. I make no doubt that he took from du Peyrat what he ſays of the Lutherans about the Suppreſſion of the Copies; in which I think he has been too Credulous: for du Peyrat gives no other Reaſon for what he imputes to the Lutherans, but the ſcarcity of the Copies of this Miſſal. I confeſs he quotes a Paſſage of Wicelius, in which Illyricus is ſaid to have been ſuch a Fool as to ſupply the Catholicks with Arms againſt his own Sect, by the Impreſſion of this Miſſal. But this makes much more againſt du Peyrat than for him. And indeed Wicelius does not ſay that the Lutherans mended their Fault by the Suppreſſion of the Copies; and yet if du Peyrat was in the right, they had been already Suppreſs'd by them, when Wicelius Publiſh'd his Book, which was in 1564. Now du Peyrat's Proof is taken from the ſilence of Caſſander and Pamelius his Contemporary about Illyricus's Miſſal in their Liturgical Books. Nevertheleſs, ſays he (a), they have curiouſly inquired into every thing that related to that Matter, and they had a great Credit in Germany——to get all the Books that might be of ſome uſe to them. He therefore Argues thus: If the Lutherans had not deſtroyed the Copies of the Miſſal, Publiſh'd by Illyricus, Caſſander would have mention'd this Maſs; for he would doubtleſs have ſeen a Copy of it. But he has made no mention of it; therefore it is certain the Lutherans had deſtroy'd them. Note that Caſſander's Book about Liturgies was Printed ſome years (b) before that of Wicelius. We ſhall ſee below, that Caſſander's ſilence is a very bad Proof of the ſcarcity of thoſe Copies, and that it is not a ſign that this Maſs was unknown to him. At preſent I ſhall only obſerve, that Wicelius's Reproach is a Proof againſt du Peyrat. But let us ſee what he Alledges (c).

' (d) Flavius Illyricus having Printed it in the ' year 1557. at Strasburg by Inadvertency, not conſidering what he did, and the Lutherans and o' ther German Hereticks being ſenſible of the Pre' judice this Antient Miſſal did to their New Opi' nions, took up all the Copies they could meet with, ' and ſuppreſſed them, that it might not come to ' the Knowledge of the Catholicks, and be uſed ' againſt them, being entirely contrary to the Sects ' of Luther and Calvin. George Wicelius (i) an ' old Diſciple of Luther, who at laſt forſook ' him, and returned into the Pale of the Church, ' ſpeaking of Flavius Illyricus in his Defence of the ' Eccleſiaſtical Liturgy, Printed in the year 1564. ' ſeven years after that Gallican Miſſal was Pub' liſhed, falls upon Flacius Illyricus on Account of ' that Latin Maſs, ſaying that a Blind Man may ' clearly ſee, that by Printing it, he ignorantly and ' imprudently engaged againſt the Sects of Luther ' and Calvin, and greatly obliged the Catholicks. ' Wicelius's Words are theſe: Matthias Flavius Illyri' cus edidit repertam Miſſam Latinam, non trium' phans tamen de Theſauro tanto adverſus Catholicos, ' quam vel cæcutienti homini appareat totum illud ' quod edidit, contra Lutheri, Calvinique ſectas edi' diſſe, ſed & Catholicis nobis rem longe gratiſſimam ' feciſſe; quid enim ibi niſi Miſſam Latinam, quæ ' hodie in uſu generali eſt, inſciens, imprudenſque ' defendit? Tantùm abeſt, ut ſuo, ſectæque more ' oppugnet; locupletior eſt illa quidem, pluſque pre' cum continet, ſed omninò tamen eadem cum uſitatâ, ' cujus etiam dicta, factaque omnia paſſim ſequitur, ' ut diverſam eſſe confirmare nemo audeat. This ' undoubtedly was the Reaſon why Flavius Illyricus ' and his Adherents of Germany being ſenſible of ' the Fault they had Committed, Burnt or other' wiſe Suppreſt this Latin or Gallican Maſs, fearing ' they ſhould be Laugh'd at by every Body. That ' which confirms me in this Opinion is, that tho' ' it was Printed at Strasburg in the year 1557, ' George Caſſander who Died but in February 1566, ' (e) and Pamelius his Contemporary——make ' no mention of it. Du Peyrat repeats the ſame thing at the 623. Page. I maintain, ſays he, that ſince Caſſander and Pamelius, who have been moſt curious in ſearching out all ſorts of Liturgies, have never ſeen this, tho' it was Printed in their Life time, eight or nine years (e) before the Death of either of them, and ſince it is ſcarce to be met with at this Day in France and Germany; that the Lutherans and Calviniſts Burnt it aſſoon as it ſaw the Light, to hinder the Catholicks from making uſe of it againſt them, as of a ſharp Knife coming from them to cut their Throats, and juſtify their blind Obſtinacy againſt the Antient and true Doctrine of the Catholick, Apoſtolick and Roman Church. Let us now ſee whether Caſſanders's ſilence proves any thing.

Colomies, who Confutes Cardinal Bona, ſhould have known that du Peyrat had deceived the Cardinal. Therefore his Cenſure ſhould have been Levelled firſt of all againſt du Peyrat: However here are Colomies's Words. ' (f) Cardinal Bona is mi' ſtaken in believing that Caſſander never ſaw the ' Miſſal Publiſhed by Illyricus: Beſides that in a ' Collection of Antient Prayers made by Caſſander, ' there are ſom.. that are alſo in Illyricus's Miſſal; ' Fr. Baudouin a famous Civilian, Writing to Caſ' ſander from Francfort in the year 1557. that is, ' the ſame year that this Miſſal was Printed, uſes ' theſe Words: Francofordiam reverſus, reperi Illy' rici ad me literas cum libello de Miſſa ad Palatinum ' noſtrum. (He means Otho Elector Palatin, to ' whom this Book was Dedicated.) Rogat ille ' meum judicium de ſuis Miſſa antiquitatibus. Ego ' id ad te nunc refero, & libellum ipſum mitto, de ' quo quid ſentire debeamus familiariter nos moneas, ' ut de qua re tam multi multa confuſè balbutiunt, ' rectè & diſtinctè reſpondere aliquando poſſimus. I have a better Reaſon than this, to prove that Illyricus's Miſſal was not unknown to George Caſſander; and that which is very remarkable, is that du Peyrat ſupplies me with it. The Marginal Note (g), which he has put in the 622. Page, informs me, that mention is made of this Miſſal at the end of a Book Printed in 1561, and Intituled, De officio pii ac publicæ tranquillitatis vere amantis viri &c. Now 'tis certain Caſſander was the Author of this Book. If du Peyrat had known this, he would not have affirmed that this Author never ſaw Flacius's Miſſal. By this we ſee that he uſed a very bad Argument, as to what concerns Caſſander, to prove that the Copies of this Miſſal were grown very ſcarce. But will ſome ſay, it is certain that they grew ſcarce, and that Caſſander makes no mention of that Miſſal in his Book of Liturgies. I Anſwer as to the laſt Point, that perhaps this Book of Caſſander was out of the Preſs, before the Author receiv'd Illyricus's Book. The Bibliotheque of Valerius Andreas ſhews, that this Book of Caſſander was Printed in the year 1558; it may be ſaid ſo in the Title Page, tho' the Book had been made Publick in the Autumn of 1557. a time in which perhaps Caſſander had not receiv'd Illyricus's Book Publiſhed the ſame year. Upon the other Point, I ſhall only ſay, that there are many Works of Illyricus as hard to come by as his Gallican Maſs, and yet no Body went about to Suppreſs them. There are many other Cauſes of the ſcarcity of a Book, beſides the care of gathering up all the Copies to throw 'em into the Fire.

(E) I mean the Memoirs which he gathered to compile his Catalogus Teſtium.] The worſt of it is, that he is Accuſed of having ſtolen ſome Manuſcripts. Let us hear Melchior Adam (b). Tertium locum facile obtinet Martyrologium illud, quod hac occaſione compilatum ferunt. Contexuit Abbas Joannes Trithemius Catalogum auctorum. Hunc cum vidiſſet Flacius, temperare ſibi non potuit, quin diſſimulatâ perſonâ & habitu aliquot in Germaniâ Monaſteriorum bibliothecas perluſtraret: quos commode poſſet Hiſtoricos clam auferret: atque iſto adminiculo librum qui Catalogus teſtium veritatis indigitatur, conſcriberet. The Catholick Writers have not failed to take Advantage of that Remark. Egregium ſcilicet opus, ſays Spondanus (i), quod ex furto & ſacrilegio impii transfugæ confectum eſt, ut mirum videri non debeat, ſi tot mendaciis & falſiloquiis ſcateat à patre omnis nequitiæ & immunditiæ eructatis. See in the 120 Page of Colomiés's Opuſcules, what is ſaid of Lindenbroch. But Spondanus goes too faſt, when he concludes from a Man's ſtealing Manuſcripts, that he falſifies 'em afterwards, and Publiſhes them with a thouſand Alterations; he is not well Grounded in ſuch a Conſequence. Beſides, he is miſtaken when he ſuppoſes that Illyricus Publiſhed his Catalogus Teſtium veritatis, only to oppoſe William Eiſengreinius's Book. 'Tis juſt the contrary; Eiſengreinius Publiſhed his Catalogus Teſtium veritatis in oppoſition to that of Illyricus. This is plain from the Dates of the Impreſſions. Illyricus's Catalogue, Printed at Baſil in the year 1556. was Re-printed at Straſburg in the year 1562. That of Eiſengreinius was Printed at Dillingen in 1565. Which Confutes the following Paſſage. (k) Nec vero tam illud æmulatione Trithemii, cujus opus omninò diverſum eſt, ſuum concinnaſſe putamus; quam turpiori flagitio ad obſcurandum illud, quod Gulielmus Eiſengreinius itidem Germanus Catholicus ediderat eodem Titulo Catalogi Teſtium veritatis, quo patrum & Eccleſiaſticorum omnium qui ad eam uſque diem hæreſes expugnaverant, non parvo labore teſtimonia pro veritate fidei Catholicæ protulerat. In cujus invidiam, ſimul & ut fucum faceret imperitis, Flacius commentarium ſuum eodem titulo edidit ſed abſque † nomine auctoris, fabulis & mendaciis refertum. Note, that this Work of Illyricus was very much inlarged by Simon Goulart of Senlis, in the Editions of 1597, and 1608.

But he is juſtly complained of (b) for having taken the Liberty to change the Method of it, and to add and leave out what he pleaſed, without ſhewing what was his and what Illyricus's. This perhaps was the Reaſon why a Lutheran procured a new Edition of the Catalogus Teſtium veritatis, altogether like that of Illyricus, except that he prefixed to it what Learned Men have ſaid in Praiſe or Diſpraiſe of it. This New Edition came out at Francfort in the year 1666. in 4to, without the Name of John Conrad Dietericus, who procured it; but it was Publiſhed with his Name in 1672 (c). I muſt obſerve, that Melchior Adam has not well Abridged the Author he quotes: I have conſulted the Original ſince the firſt Edition of this Dictionary, and I have found in Keckerman a Circumſtance, which ſhould not have been ſuppreſſed. Illyricus having learn'd from John Trithemius's Book, that many Authors, who lived in the darkneſs of Popery, had left ſome Monuments of its Corruption, reſolved to render uſeleſs the care that was taken to conceal the Books of thoſe Authors. The Paſſage of Keckerman runs thus: Cæterum quod attinet ad infidioſos occultatores Hiſtoriarum, certum eſt in Bibliotheca Vaticanâ, & aliis Bibliothecis Italiæ, in primis autem in Bibliothecis Monaſteriorum, clam ſervari multos Hiſtoricos ſuperiorum ſæculorum, qui de fraudibus Pontificum, deque abuſibus Eccleſiæ Romanæ, & constante conſervatione veræ doctrinæ, etiam ſub mediis tenebris Papatus ſcripſerunt: id quod manifeſtè patet ex Catalogo autorum, edito ab Abbate Johanne Trithemio, qui iſtos autores ex Bibliothecis ante annos paulò plus centum collegit; quem catalogum cum vidiſſet Matthias Flacius, temperare ſibi non potuit, quin diſſimulatâ perſonâ & habitu aliquot in Germaniâ Monaſteriorum Bibliothecas perluſtraret, earumque arte eluſerit, quos commodè poſſet Hiſtoricos clam auferret, atque adeò eximium iſtum librum, qui dicitur Catalogus Teſtium veritatis, iſto adminiculo conſcriberet (d).

(F) That ſometimes he diſguiſed his Name.] 'Tis ſaid that Achilles Gaſſarus, who Publiſhed a Book of Ofridus a Monk (e) of Weiſſemburg, is the ſame with Flacius Illyricus. This Book is an Harmony of the four Goſpels, in German Verſe. It was Dedicated to Solomon and Luitbert, Archbiſhops of Mentz, and to Lewis King of the Eaſtern France (f). Mr. Wharton, who pretends (g) that Illyricus Publiſhed it under the Name of Achilles Gaſſarus, will give me leave to inform my Readers, that there was in the XVIth. Century a German Phyſician, called Achilles Gaſſarus, who Publiſhed ſome Books (h) when Illyricus was a School-Boy.

(G) Moreri is much in the wrong to place him under the Letter T.] Mr. Teiſſier was the occaſion of it, by theſe Words of the 471 Page of his firſt Volume. The Name of Matthias Flacius was Trancowitz. He cites Verheiden Effigies: But Verheiden do's not ſay it. Let us ſee what the curious Mr. Colomiés has Diſcover'd upon this Subject. ' (i) ' I muſt ſet down the true Name of Illyricus, which ' is Francowitz, as Bucholcerus the Son ſhews it at ' the 831 Page of his Chronology, or rather of the ' Continuation of his Father's, Printed at Gorlitz in ' 1599. Verum & integrum, ſays he, Flacii nomen ' ego ex certis autoribus cognovi eſſe tale: Matthias ' Francowitzius, cognomento Flacius gente Illyricus, ' patria Albonenſis. Konig (k) calls him alſo Francowitzius; but Quenſtedt (l) Names him Trancowizium.

(H) Spondanus has committed a great Fault ſpeaking of the Centuries of Magdeburg.] He ſays (m) that they began to be Publiſhed in the year 1560, and that the fourth Tome was the firſt that came out. This is very falſe; for the three firſt Centuries were Printed before the fourth. The Catalogue of the Library of Francfort Publiſhed in the year 1604, by Beeman, (n) mentions the year 1559, for the three firſt Centuries, and the year 1560, for the fourth. Draudius (o) places likewiſe the Edition of the three firſt in 1559. Sagittarius ſays, that according to his Copy, the three firſt Centuries were Printed in 1562, the fourth in 1560, the fifth and ſixth in 1562, the ſeventh and eighth in 1564, the ninth in 1565, the tenth and eleventh in 1567, the twelfth in 1569, and the thirteenth, which is alſo the laſt, in 1574. 'Tis very probable that Spondanus's Edition was like that of Mr. Sagittarius, that is, that neither of 'em had the firſt Edition of the three firſt Centuries: But this do's not excuſe Spondanus, for if he had Read the Preface of the firſt, he would have ſeen that the Centuriators complain of a Satyr, in which their Work was ill ſpoken of, tho' nothing had been Publiſhed of what they had Written. De ſumptibus vero profitemur, ſay they, *nos pauciſſimos habere, qui annuatim aliquid conferunt: Nec pro laborum conditione operarii ſatis ſuſtentantur, ſicut ipſimet optimi teſtes ſunt: imo niſi Deus nobis quoſdam Mecænates adhuc excitarit (quod tamen ne fiat, multi invidi ſtrenuè laborant) neque progredi ſatis expedite poterimus; neque forte totum Opus, ut eſt inſtitutum, abſolvere. this Fault of Spondanus has added so many others (l) to it, that it is hard to conceive how a Man of Sense could be guilty of so many Blunders. I must not forget to say, that the Clavis sacræ Scripturæ is one of Illyricus's best Books. See what Mr. Simon says of it in his Critical History * of the Old Testament. multo auro Germanico sit constatum. Non vidit sceleratus iste fœtus Opus, & tamen non veretur canino, aut viperino potius dente arrodere. Deinde non habet cognitas rationes nostras iste conviciator ac criminator: & tamen ut Semei, nos falsè irridet, ac mentitur splendide. Nam quam pauci, & quam parce dent, quam frugaliter alantur hujus instituti operarii, pozerat iste irrisor explorare, non à profugis, sceleratis, pollutis, mendacibus, quibus gubernationis nostra ratio ne nota quidem est, sed à nobis ipsis. This long Passage may serve to two Purposes; for besides that it is an Argument against the false Date of the Centuries, it informs us, what Account ought to be made of these Words of Spondanus; Quod opus vocatum est ab aliis Evangelicis Aureum, non quidem in laudem, sed ironice, propterea quod multo principum quorundam Germaniæ, & civitatum auro, ostiatim emendicato, sit editum. He says, that the other Protestants called these Centuries a Golden Work, by way of ridicule, and to signifie that it had been compiled at the Expence of the German Princes; but these Protestants dwindle into an Anonymous Author, who published a Piece (p) under the false Name of the Students of Wittemberg. See in Mr. Sagittarius (q) several Extracts of the Epistles Dedicatory of the Centuries, designed to shew that it was not without Reason that Illyricus, Wigandus, Judex, Faber, and the other Assistants in that Undertaking, demanded the Encouragement of the Publick. Note, that the Third Century was enlarged, when it was reprinted (r) at Basil. Accesserunt castigationes & additiones locorum aliquot in prima editione depravatorum vel omissorum (s). Observe also, that the Four first Centuries, and part of the Fifth, were composed at Magdeburg; that the Fifth was compleated at Jena; that the Sixth was made in the Exile of Illyricus, Wigandus, and Judex; that the Seventh was written in the Country of Mecklenburg, and the rest in the Town of Wismar, in the same Country (t).

I had written all this, before I found a Copy of the first Editions of those Centuries; for the Edition of Basil 1624, in three Volumes in Folio, procured by Lewis Lucius, being more esteemed than any other, every Body will have it, and so it is hard to find the others in private Libraries. At last, I have been able to consult the Edition, which the Centuriators caused to be made at Basil, by Oporinus; but because the Copy of the three first Centuries, which was lent me, has been bound more than once, I could not find in it the Date of the Impression. I imagine that the last Leaf was torn off before the last Binding, and 'twas probably in that Leaf, that Oporinus placed the Date (a) 1559. However, this Copy of the three first Centuries is in Italick Letters, and has no Additions nor Corrections. But we have seen that the Edition, which Sagittarius made use of, which is that of 1562, contains some Additions and Corrections. 'Tis not therefore the first, nor that which I have at present in my Hands. Note, that the Copy of the Fourth Century, printed by Oporinus, in 1560, is in Roman Characters.

(l) Varillas has added to this Fault of Spondanus many others.] Melanchthon, says he (b), was scarce dead, when the Centuriators of Magdeburg began to publish their Work upon Ecclesiastical History with the Fourth Volume. This is his first Fault. 'This Volume, continues he, is indeed the 'best of the Thirteen in the Opinion of the Lutherans, or the most tolerable according to the Catholicks. I challenge him to prove that. (c) 'There were at first but Four Ministers of Magdeburg concerned in it, Matthias Flacius, John Wigandus, Matthew Judex, and Basil Faber; but afterwards the most Learned Lutherans put their Hand to it, though we only know the Names of Four others; viz. Nicolas Gal, Celestin Hutter, Gaspar Nidpruc, Counsellor of State to the Emperor, and Baptist (d) Hoincel. Consult Mr. Sagittarius, and he will inform you (e) that Andrew Corvin, Thomas Holthuter, Pancratius Veltheck, Nicolas Amsdorf, Nicolas Gallus, Martin Cofius, Ebeling Almannus, Ambrose Hudfeld, David Cicelerus, Gaspar Leunculus, William Radensis, Nicolas Brumeller, Bernard Niger, Peter Schrader, and Conrad Agrius had a Share in this Work. So that Varillas Names three Persons, who do not appear in this List, and falsly supposes, that we only know the Names of Eight Centuriators. I have seen indeed in Mr. Sagittarius, the Names of John Baptist Heinzelius and Gaspar Nidpruc, Counsellor to the Emperor; but he does not say, that these two Persons had a Hand in the Centuries, but (f) only, that they countenanced Mark Wagner, who went from Library to Library, in quest of Materials. This Wagner did great Service to the Centuriators: he visited the Libraries of Germany and Denmark, and that of Edinburg in Scotland, &c. He had a very particular Talent for this sort of Enquiries, and they gave him a very glorious Testimonial (g), in which they acknowledged his Faithfulness, Diligence, and Exactness. This Testimonial was dated the 30th. of September 1557, and imports, amongst other things, that he had made several Voyages (h) with Illyricus, to collect Materials, and that having shewn his Capacity, he was thought able to continue his Travels alone, and that they had committed that Trust to him with Letters of Recommendation, wherein they desired Learned and Pious Persons to communicate to him such Manuscripts and Monuments, as he could draw any Advantage from. Heshusius, was one of those who signed this Testimonial. Varillas affirms, 'that the Authors of the 'other Sects, sprung from that of Luther, criticised the Centuries several Ways, and published 'many Extracts of the Errors, which they pretended had crept into them. No Body, that I know of, has mentioned those Extracts. Varillas would have been very much puzzl'd, had he been obliged to give Proofs of what he said. Conrad Brunus, whole Invective against the Centuries was confuted by Illyricus in 1560, was a Roman Catholick. Eisengrenius, who wrote against them, was so too. Let us see some other Faults of Varillas. Illyricus, 'says he (i), undertook the Year following 1561, 'in Thuringia, in the Town of Weimar, a publick 'Disputation against the famous Victorinus Strigel. He is mistaken both as to the time (k) of this Dispute, and the Name of Illyricus's (l) Antagonist. (m) 'The Catholicks observed, that more Heretics had sprung from that of Luther in less than 'Fifty Years, than there had ever been from our 'Saviour's Time to Luther. This Hyperbole, which he took from Spondanus, but not without lessening it, is very Childish. (n) Et videas hinc etiam quam fecundus fuerit Lutherus, qui plures protulerit pestiferarum hæresum auctores, quam ab orbis ortu fuerint ante in universo mundo. You will find in Moreri, that the List of the principal Hereticks from the first Century to Luther amounts to 183. Whereas we can scarce find Ten or Twelve Schisms in the first Fifty Years of Lutheranism. Varillas goes on (o). 'It was probably with a Design to escape for some 'time the Persecution which Flacius expected from 'his Friends, because of his Outrage at Weimar, 'that he disguised himself, and went incognito into 'all the Libraries of the German Monasteries: 'He chose (r) the most scarce Books he could find, 'and made Extracts of others. The Author 'of his Life says, that he did it out of Emulation 'for Trithemius, and to compose in his Imitation, 'a Collection of those who had written Books. 'But the thing will not appear probable to one, that 'will be at the Pains to compare those two Works 'together, since they are in nothing alike. That 'of Trithemius, is, properly speaking, a Table of 'Ecclesiastical Authors, and of Books composed by 'them; whereas that of Flacius is a Collection of 'Passages, which seem to be contrary to the Catholick Religion, and to favour the Rigid Lutherans. There are many Faults in these Words; for in the first Place, Illyricus visited the Libraries before the Year

INCHOFER (Melchior) a German Jeſuit, born at Vienna in the Year 1584, was admitted into the Society at Rome in 1607. He had already ſignalized himſelf in the Study of the Civil-Law. He taught Philoſophy, Mathematicks and Divinity a long time at Meſſina; and there publiſhed a Book in 1630 (A), which brought him into Trouble. He was obliged to go to Rome to anſwer the Complaints that were made againſt him in the Congregation of the Index. His Judges were well ſatisfied with the Reaſons he alledged in his Juſtification, and only enjoyn'd him to change the Title 1560. He did it to collect Materials for his Catalogus teſtium veritatis. Melchior Adam, the only Author, cited by Spondanus and Varillas, declares it in expreſs Words. Now that Catalogue was printed (p) in the Year 1556. Therefore, &c. in the 2d. Place it is falſe, that Melchior Adam ſays, that Illyricus undertook ſuch a Work out of Emulation for Trithemius, and to compoſe in his Imitation, a Collection of thoſe who had written Books. If Melchior Adam had ſaid ſo, he would have been very much miſtaken, and conſequently Spondanus (q) would have ſaid a thing which is really falſe. See in the Note F, how the reading of Trithemius's Book, contributed to Illyricus's Deſign. In the 3d. Place, Varillas ſpeaks of Trithemius's Book, and of that of Illyricus, in ſuch a manner, as ſhews that he knew neither of 'em; for Trithemius does not confine himſelf to Eccleſiaſtical Authors, nor the other to the Paſſages that ſeem to Countenance rigid Lutheraniſm. Varillas ſuppoſes (r) that Illyricus's Jealouſie of William Eiſingrem a Catholick Divine, who had writ a Book, intituled, The Catalogue of thoſe, who have given Teſtimony to the Truth, determined him to undertake the ſame Task for his Sect. 'Tis juſt the contrary, as we have ſeen (f) above. Laſtly, Varillas (t) ſays he printed this 'Book, without putting his Name to it, either be-'cauſe he would not fall out with the other Sects, 'who he knew would not like it, or becauſe he ſup-'poſed it would be well enough known in the 'World, that he was the Author of the Book, 'though he did not name himſelf. There is no ſuch Thing. He put his Name to that Book, and had no Reaſon to fear, that the other Proteſtants would diſapprove his Compilation.

There is another thing, which deſerves to be cenſured: it concerns the Epiſtle Dedicatory to Queen Elizabeth. Varillas (v) affirms, 'that it 'did more Spite than Honour to that Princeſs, and 'that there are few Examples of ſo extravagant a 'miſs-timing in the Hiſtory of Men of Letters, 'tho' they are otherwiſe accuſed of not being al-'ways the beſt bred. The Centuriators, who ſign-'ed the Epiſtle Dedicatory, could not be ignorant of 'a thing ſo notorious, that Elizabeth was a Calvi-'niſt in her Doctrine, tho' ſhe was a Lutheran, as 'to the Diſcipline; and yet they inſerted in the 'ſame Epiſtle, by which they courted this Queen's 'Protection, a Satyr againſt the Calviniſts. They 'accuſed 'em of rendering, as much as in them lay, 'the Teſtament of Jeſus Chriſt uſeleſs, by Reaſons 'borrowed from Philoſophy; of rejecting the real 'Preſence, and Communion of the Body and Blood 'of that holy Saviour, againſt his own Words, tho' 'moſt perſpicuous; and of endeavouring to dazzle 'thoſe, who read the Goſpel, by confounding with 'ſubtle and ſtudied Interpretations, the natural 'Sence of Abundance of Paſſages, ſo evident of 'themſelves, as to need no Explanation. They 'proved afterwards unanſwerably in this Tome, 'and the 12 following, that the Church had always 'believed that Preſence; and whoever will be at the 'Pains of reading them, will immediately obſerve, 'that tho' thoſe who paid them for their Labour, 'had deſired them to write with leſs Nicety and 'more Moderation upon that Point, that they 'might not oppoſe the Accommodation, which was 'then negotiating afreſh betwixt the Lutherans 'and Zuinglians; they had ſo little Complaiſance for 'their Mæcenas's, that they treated no Point with 'greater Vehemence and Heat than that. Theſe 'things were all forged in the Brains of that Hiſto-'rian. He has added this Romance of his own In-'vention, to an incident Remark of Spondanus, and 'tis very certain, he ſaid this without any Authority 'for it, and without having read the Epiſtle Dedica-'tory, which he cenſured. There was no Incivility, 'or Impudence in the Conduct of the Centuriators. 'They did not as yet know, how the Queen of Eng-'land would determine her ſelf; they only knew that 'ſhe laboured to eſtabliſh a good Form of Religion. 'They praiſed her, and congratulated her for it, and 'powerfully exhorted her to apply her ſelf to it, by a 'Total Suppreſſion of the Evils, which the Follow-'ers of Antichriſt had brought in (a). Ad te igitur 'nunc Regina potentiſſima & ſereniſſima, convertimur. 'Audimus enim, te poſt accepta Regia ſceptra, etiam 'de præcipuo fine ac munere tui officii, ſocietatis ac vi-'ta totius omnium ſubditorum tuorum cogitare. Ita-'que non tantum latis acclamationibus Regiæ tuæ dig-'nitati gratulamur: ſed toto etiam pectore patrem Do-'mini noſtri JESU CRISTI invocamus, ac 'rogamus, ut——Sed quia non ſatis eſt bene cæ-'piſſe, hortamur etiam te, illuſtriſſima & potentiſſima 'Regina, ut totis viribus in id opus incumbas, ut Re-'ligio pura, integra, inviolata in toto regno tuo inſ-'tauretur, omnibus Antichriſti crudelitatibus, vulne-'ribus, peſtibus ac carcinomatis rectè curatis, atque 'ſublatis. Debes enim hunc honorem Deo conditori 'ac redemptori tuo, debes tibi ipſi, debes ſubdi-'tis tuis. It was not improper that the Divines of the Confeſſion of Augsburg ſhould add to this a Word of Advice about the Doctrine of the real Preſence; which they did in this manner: (b) Illud verò etiam non prætereundum eſt, cum jam variæ paſſim graſſentur quaſi factiones opinionum, inter quæ aliqui etiam teſtamentum Domini planè philo-'ſophicis rationibus ita evacuant, ut corpus & ſan-'guinem Chriſti, quod ad præſentiam & communicati-'onem, juxta clariſſima, evidentiſſima, veraciſſima & 'potentiſſima verba ipſius CHRISTI, prorſus removeant, miraque verborum perplexitate fucum faciant: 'in primis videndum tibi eſt, ut & articuli fidei ſine 'phariſaico fermento, & Sacramenta à Chriſto inſtituta 'citra omnem adulterationem inſtaurentur: id quod te 'facturam eſſe, omnes pii ſperant, ſummiſque votis à te 'contendunt. When Varillas ſuppoſes that they could not be ignorant of ſo notorious a thing, as Queen Elizabeth's being a Calviniſt in her Opinions, he betrays his own Ignorance; he do's not conſider, that they wrote their Epiſtle Dedicatory, at a time, in which it was not yet known upon what Foot the Engliſh Reformation would be eſtabliſhed. I know indeed, that their Volume bears the Date of the Year 1560, and that Queen Elizabeth's Reformation was eſtabliſhed in 1559. But every Body knows, that the Bookſellers put the Date of the Year following to the Books that come out towards the end of Auguſt. I believe therefore, that this Epiſtle Dedicatory, which has no Date, was ſent in 1559 to Oporinus, the Bookſeller of Baſil, before it was known in Germany, what Eccleſiaſtical Regulations Queen Elizabeth had made; however, it could not appear at that time, that this Princeſs had declared for Calviniſm with reſpect to the real Preſence. Read theſe Words of Doctor Burnet (c): 'Some Proteſtant Divines were named, to reviſe 'the Liturgy of Edward. The only conſiderable 'Change they made in it, was in the Article of the 'Euchariſt. The Deſign was to prepare an Office 'for the Communion, whoſe Expreſſions ſhould be 'ſo well contrived, that by avoiding the Condem-'nation of the Corporeal Preſence, all the Engliſh 'might be united in one and the ſame Church; 'moſt People were imbued with that Doctrine. So 'the Queen charged the Divines to ſay nothing that 'might abſolutely condemn it, but to leave it unde-'cided, as a Speculative Opinion, which every one 'was at Liberty to embrace or Reject. To this end, 'they left out of Edward's Liturgy, the Rubrick, 'which explained for what Reaſons the Church of 'England ordained, &c.

INNOCENT VIII. created Pope in the Year 1484, was of Genoa, and called John Baptiſt Cibo. Authors are not agreed about the Illuſtrious neſs (A) or the Obſcurity of his Family; but 'tis acknowledged that he was ſent to the Court of Naples in his Youth, and that he ſerved King Alphonſo. He was afterwards one of Cardinal Bologna's Domeſticks at Rome, which I think was of ſome uſe to him, in order to be promoted to the Biſhoprick of Savona *. Pope Sixtus IV. who was much his Friend, beſtowed on him the Biſhoprick of Melfi, and afterwards a Cardinal's Cap. Edition was made at Viterbo, in the Year 1633. He obtained leave to ſtrike out, and to add what he ſhould think fit. (d) S. Congregatio non ſolum permiſit eidem dictum opus de novo edere, mutato tamen juſſu de cauſis titulo in hunc modum, Conjectatic, &c. & quibuſdam magis explicatis——ſed etiam demendi & addendi ſi quæ viderentur, liberam & amplam facultatem permiſit. The meaning of it is, that provided it be not affirmed in too Dogmatical a manner, that the Holy Virgin writ to the Inhabitants of Meſſina the Letter that goes by her Name, one may be allowed to believe it, and to perſuade others of it. A German Writer (e) obſerves, that Baronius and Theophilus Raynaud are not of Inchofer's Opinion concerning this Letter. I will not diſpute it as to Baronius; for tho' that Annaliſt does not ſpeak particularly of the pretended Letter received by the Meſſineſe, he declares in general, that all the Letters the Holy Virgin is ſaid to have written to ſome Towns, ought to be reckoned Apocryphal. (f) Traduntur & alia ab ipſa ad alias ſcriptæ civitates, quas cunctas cum careant Eccleſiæ auctoritate, monuiſſe in Apocryphorum claſſem rejiciendas eſſe omnes facile judicabunt. But as for Theophilus Raynaud, he ought not to be cited upon this Subject; for he only ſpeaks of the Letter, which 'tis ſaid the Holy Virgin wrote to St. Ignatius, and of his pretended Anſwers (g). The German Author is not more happy in quoting Rivet (h), who without making any mention of the Letter of Meſſina, is contented to reject the Story of the Epiſtolary Correſpondance between the Holy Virgin and Ignatius.

(B) The Works we have of him.] I don't repeat what concerns his Book relating to the pretended Letter of the Holy Virgin to the Inhabitants of Meſſina. His other Writings are, Tractatus Sylepticus in quo quid de terræ ſoliſque motu vel ſtatione ſecundum ſacram Scripturam & SS. Patres ſentiendum, quave certitudine alterutra ſententia tenenda ſit, oſtenditur, Rome 1633. in 4to. De ſacra Latinitate, hoc eſt de variis linguæ Latinæ myſteriis, ex origine, progreſſu, fine, cæteraque inſtituti ſui ratione ad Evangelii prædicationem, Latinæ Eccleſiæ exaltationem, Romanique Imperii majeſtatem ſpectantibus, Meſſina, 1635. in 4to. and Munich, 1638, in 8vo. Hiſtoria trium Magorum, Rome 1639. Annalium Eccleſiaſticorum Regni Hungariæ Tomus I. Rome, 1644. in Folio. The Funeral Oration of Nicolas Ricardi, a Dominican, Maſter of the Sacred Palace. He (i) publiſhed ſome other Books, to which he did not put his Name.

(C) Intituled Monarchia Solipſorum.] The Author of this Satyr calls himſelf Lucius Cornelius Europæus. It was printed in Holland in 1648, juxta exemplar Venetum, as the Title imports; there is added to it a Key to the feigned Names. The Edition of Venice 1651, aſcribes (a) this Work to Melchior Inchofer. Chriſtopher Pellerus relating this Conjecture, ſays likewiſe, that this German Jeſuit went to Rome after his writing this Book, and returned no more. (b) Monarchia Solipſorum quam perhibent ſcripſiſſe quemdam patrem ex Societate N. Inchoferum Germanum, poſtea Romam profectum nunquam reverſum. He is miſtaken as to that Journey to Rome, for Inchofer had quitted Germany long before he wrote that Satyr. He did not write it till after he had digeſted many Diſcontents in the Order, the Habit whereof he took at Rome, at 23 Years of Age. This Paſſage of Pellerus has occaſion'd Konig to make (c) two Authors of one. He ſpeaks of Melchior Inchofer, and Nicolas Inchofer. He ſays of the firſt part of what Alegambe ſays of him, and aſcribes the Monarchia Solipſorum to the other. He cites Chriſtopher Pellerus, but he makes him ſay more than he ſays, viz. that this piece was compoſed in 1638. If Konig had obſerved, that for want of knowing of a Man's Chriſtian Name, an N is put inſtead of it, he would not have forged a pretended Nicolas Inchofferus upon Chriſtopher Pellerus's Teſtimony. He obſerves, that others aſcribe this Work to Scioppius. 'Tis certain, that Otto Tabor, a German Civilian, believed Scioppius might be the Author of it; but he has not affirmed it. Lucius Cornelius Europæus, ſays he (d), ſive is ſit Gaſpar Scioppius, ſive quis alius ex genere Scriptorum ſatyricorum, in Monarchia quam dicit Solipſorum Leonis Allatio dedicata. &c. Deckherrius (e) neither rejecting Pellerus's (f), nor Tabor's Conjecture, propoſes another without any ground for it. He believes, that Gabriel Barrius Lermans a Gentleman of Languedoc, might be the Author of the Monarchia Solipſorum. I ſhall ſet down two Paſſages of Mr. Arnauld, one of which will ſolve our Doubts, and the other teach us Inchofer's Deſign, and the meaning of the Word Solipſi. The Monarchia Solipſorum, ſays Mr. Arnauld (g), ſhould be Scioppius's Work, becauſe it was printed in Germany with ſome Books that are undoubtedly that Author's. And yet IT IS CERTAIN that this Monarchia Solipſorum is the Work of a German Jeſuit, called Melchior Inchofer. And we know where there is an Original Letter of a Spaniſh Jeſuit, who acknowledges it, and makes great Complaints of it. The other Paſſage is this (k). 'Tis well known, ſays Mr. Arnauld, ſpeaking to the Jeſuits, that it is your Character to be zealous to do good, provided you can do it alone, and that no Body may ſhare the Glory of it with you; and if you would be ſincere, you would confeſs, that one of your Society, who wrote the Monarchia Solipſorum, knew you very well. See the Theſes of Gisbert Voetius (i).

There went about a pretended Letter of Innocent XII. to the Emperor in the Year 1696, in which the Pope calls the Society of the Jeſuits Monarchiam Monopanthorum. Upon which Father Papebroch made this Reflection: Perſitan quali poteſtate ſint omnia velint eſſe & æſtimari Jeſuitæ, ſcilicet tendendo ad vetus ſcommia ſatyrici cujuſdam commenti quo ſcripſerit anonymus aliquis Monarchiam Solipſorum, veluti ſit anonymus aliquis Monarchiam Solipſorum, velut ſit anonymus aliquis Monarchiam Solipſorum, velut ſit anonymus aliquis Monarchiam Solipſorum, *velut Liberality and (B) Courtlineſs procured him the Cardinalſhip, by the Intereſt of Donna Olympia: But they cannot deny that he appeared very Remote from a Voluptuous Life. He was of a Rigid Morality, and look'd upon as a Devout Man. He was much more favourable to the Janſeniſts than his Predeceſſors had been; which was the Reaſon why the Janſeniſts (C) more Zealouſly adhered to the Cauſe of the Popes, than they had done before. He Offended abundance of People by the Suppreſſion of an Office of the Immaculate Conception, and by that of many Indulgences. There was no Body in France, beſides the Janſeniſts, that was Edified with this. They (D) diſperſed thoſe two Decrees, and added ſome Notes to them. I do not believe that every Body approved his forbidding to Honour the Name and Bones of Innocent XI's. hatred againſt France, proceeded from an Affront, a French Man offer'd him in the War; an Affront, that Benedict Odeſcalchi left Unpuniſhed, but Revenged it upon the whole Nation, when he was Pope.

(B) His Liberality and Courtlineſs.] See the Mercure Galant (e); in which you'll find that our Benedict Odeſcalchi, the Son of a Rich Banker of Como, Played with Donna Olympia, and loſt his Money on purpoſe, in Complaiſance to this Lady. This puts me in mind of a Paſſage in the Menagiana. (f) Pope Innocent XI. was the Son of a 'Banker, he was Elected on St. Matthews Day. 'Peſquin ſaid, Invenerunt hominem ſedentem in telonio.

The following Words are to be found in a little Book Printed at Avignon for John Bramereau in the year 1652. with this Title la juſte balance des Cardinaux vivans. 'After the Death of Urban VIII. 'Odeſchalchi began to make his Court to Donna 'Olympia, (g) Niece to Pope Innocent X. and ha- 'ving Treated her ſeveral times, ſhe began Zea- 'louſly to Eſpouſe his Intereſt; and eſpecially for 'a thing, which this Prelate did, that is worthy 'to be taken notice of. Going to ſee her in the 'beginning of the Pontificate of her Uncle (h) 'Innocent X. it happened that a Goldſmith came 'to ſhew her a Noble and Rich Cheſt of Silver 'Drawers, which he had to Sell; Donna Olympia 'having taken a view of it in the preſence of 'Odeſchalchi, and many Lords, who heard the 'Anſwer that ſhe made, that it was a noble Piece 'of Plate, but that being a poor Widow, ſhe could 'not lay out ſo much Money, retired into her Cham- 'ber. Immediately Odeſchalchi called the Gold- 'ſmith, asked for the Price of the Cheſt, and Bar- 'gained with him for 8000 Crowns; after which 'without ſaying any more, he Ordered it to be pre- 'ſented in his Name to Donna Olympia, who ſeeing 'ſuch a Preſent, was perfectly Aſtoniſhed at ſo 'extraordinary a Generoſity. Upon which ſhe 'went to the Pope, and beg'd the Office of Clerk 'of the Chamber, as a pure Gift to this Prelate, 'and afterwards a Cardinal's Cap, which he ob- 'tained likewiſe by the Mediation of Cardinal 'Palotta. I ſet down theſe Words according to the Copy, which has been Communicated to me (i). I have Read the ſame Book in Italian: Intituled La giuſta ſtatera de' Porporati, and Printed at Geneva in 1650. I have conſulted it, and not only found in it the Original of what you have juſt now Read, but alſo that our Benedict Odeſcalchi had made his Court to Don Barberini, to be promoted to the Office of Clerk of the Chamber; that he had paid the Requiſite Sums, and yet had not obtain'd his end; that he was a Perſon (k) of an indifferent Capacity, and that tho' he had made great Expences, he was a Rich and Magnificent Cardinal; that whilſt he was a Biſhop, he loved Walks, Plays, and Feaſts, but that he lived a very retired Life after he became a Cardinal.

(C) That the Janſeniſts more Zealouſly Adhered to the Cauſe of the Popes.] This is what Mr. Talon taxes 'em with in the famous Plea he made againſt Innocent XI. the 23. of January 1688. (l) A ſtrange thing! ſays he, that the Pope, whoſe Principal care ought to be to preſerve the Purity of the Faith, and to hinder the Progreſs of new Opinions, has not ceaſed ever ſince he came to St. Peter's Chair, to keep up a Correſpondence with all thoſe who had Publickly Declared themſelves Janſenius's Diſciples, whoſe Doctrine his Predeceſſors have Condemned. He has loaded them with his Favours; he has given them Commendations; he has Declared himſelf their Protector: and that dangerous Faction, which has omitted nothing theſe thirty years to leſſen the Authority of all Eccleſiaſtical and Secular Powers, that were not favourable to them, at preſent erect Altars to the Pope, becauſe he upholds, and foments their Cabal; which would have troubled again the Peace of the Church, if the foreſight and indefatigable Pains of a Prince, whom Heaven has raiſed up to be the Shield, and the Defender of the Faith, had not put a ſtop to it. I do not believe that any Janſeniſt did ever Write in Defence of the four Propoſitions, decided by the Clergy of France, in the year 1682, againſt which the Favourers of the Ultra-mountain Doctrines made ſuch Out-cries, and Publiſhed ſo many Books. If the ſame thing had happened in the Pontificate of Innocent X. or of Alexander VII. 'tis certain the Janſeniſts would have written a hundred Volumes in Defence of the Deciſions of the Clergy, and in Confutation of the Ultra mountains. Humane Nature diſcovers it ſelf every where: The Rule of Conduct changes according to the Times, and as we find our ſelves diſpoſed towards other Men. Out of gratitude to a Benefactor, Men are tender of thoſe Doctrines, which they would have Condemn'd out of Reſentment againſt an Oppreſſor.

(D) They diſperſed thoſe two Decrees.] The one was made at Rome the 17*th.* of February 1678. and imports the Condemnation of the Book Intituled, Officio dell' immacolata concettione della Santiſſima Vergine noſtra Signora, approvato dal ſommo Pontefice Paolo V. il quale à chi devotamente lo recitarà concede indulgenza di cento giorni, come appariſce nel ſuo breve dato in Roma li x. Luglio M DC XV. in Milano per Franceſco Vigone. The other was made at Rome the 17*th.* of March 1678. which ſuppreſs abundance of indulgences. The Janſeniſts cauſed thoſe two Decrees to be ſecretly Printed in France, and added ſome Rules to them, by which their uſefulneſs might be diſcovered. They conſiſt of a Collection of Paſſages. I ſhall ſet down the Reflection of a Jeſuit upon the Janſeniſts Zeal for thoſe Decrees, and the little Account they make of the Conſtitutions of the Popes againſt Janſenius. '(a) Some years ago a ſmall Italian Book Printed 'at Milan, was put in the Index at Rome; in which 'Book the Office of the immaculate Conception of 'the Mother of God was to be found. The Prohibi- 'tion did not concern the Office of the Conception, 'which is known and Authoriz'd long ago in the 'Church, and which beſides has been lately ap- 'proved by Innocent XI. but this Decree reſpected 'other things, which were Falſly and Raſhly ſaid, 'and Printed in the ſame Book: And beſides it 'was only for Italy, and not for the reſt of the 'World, where that Book was not like to appear. 'Nevertheleſs this Decree was ſeen immediately, 'Printed in Latin and French, by the care of ſome 'of the Party with a Rhapſody of uſeleſs Paſſages, 'to make a conſiderable Libel of it. It was di- 'ſperſed all over France and the Low-Countries 'with as much Zeal, as if it had been a Canon of 'a general Council, upon a Capital point of Reli- 'gion: And 'tis well known to what exceſs the 'indiſcreet Zeal of ſome of their Directors went. 'Thus you ſee how far theſe Gentlemen can carry 'when they pleaſe their Submiſſion to the Orders 'of the Church. Would not one believe after this, 'that the Pope (b) needed only Prohibit the Ver- 'ſion of Mons, to hinder them from diſperſing and 'crying it up in the World? And was not there 'Reaſon to expect they would do as much for his 'new Decree in favour of the Office of the Concep- 'tion, as they had done for the former, which I have 'been ſpeaking of? But we ſhould have been very 'much miſtaken in our hopes of it: They have 'other (DΔ) His forbidding to honour the Name and Bones of Antony Cala.] A Veneration had been a long time paid to this Man in the Kingdom of Naples, on the ſcore of his being a Holy Hermit: But Innocent XI. in 1680. Commanded all this Worſhip to be Aboliſhed, and Antony Cala's Bones to be carried into the Common Church-Yard, to be there confounded with others, and never to be taken up again. (E) In Point of Revenge.] The Court of France under Lewis XIV. and the Court of Rome under Innocent XI. were acted with the ſame Spirit of Haughtineſs and Obſtinacy, whereby they afforded all Europe a long Spectacle. They ſtrived on both ſides to carry Revenge as far as ever they could; but at laſt the World was forced to yield to the Church. The Pope has ſhewn that it is not for nothing that he calls himſelf the Vicegerent of God on Earth; of God I ſay, who reſerves Vengeance to himſelf, and who has Declared (d) that it is he to whom it belongs, and that he will pay it. The Pope, as the Vicegerent of the God of Vengeance, has admirably maintained the Rights of his Deputation. I will not adopt the Thoughts of thoſe Satyrical Wits, who pretend that in point of Revenge, the Layety are Fools in Compariſon of the Clergy; but we have ſcarce ſeen any Quarrels between the Church and the World, in which the Popes have not at laſt had the better of it. If I well remember, the Protection that was granted by Innocent XI. to ſome Biſhops of France, Perſecuted for not conſenting to the Extenſion of the Regale, was the firſt ſtep (e) that provoked the Court of France; becauſe the Briefs of Innocent XI. (f) in favour of thoſe Biſhops, were expreſſed in very ſtrong and vigorous Terms. This Haughtineſs put the Court of France upon the moſt effectual ways to vex him. The Clergy declared (g) their Opinion about the Authority of the Church, and formed four Propoſitions thereupon, which reduced the Power of the Pope, to ſuch Bounds as were very Odious to the Court of Rome. This was not at the bottom a new Doctrine; the Clergy decided nothing but what was conform to the Maxims of the Gallican Church, and what the Sorbonne had Taught a hundred times; ſo that one might have thought that another Pope would not have taken exceptions at it, and that Innocent XI. would perhaps diſſemble his Reſentment: but to put him under a neceſſity of Confeſſing that he had received a very great Affront, the Deciſions of the Clergy were propoſed by Royal Authority, as a Doctrine that no Body was allowed to oppoſe, and which was to be maintained by all thoſe, who would take their Licentiate's, and Doctor's Degree. They Studied all the Formalities, that might give the greateſt Luſtre to the King's Declarations upon this Affair. Theſe Doctrines were maintained by the Rector of the Univerſity of Paris, in a Diſputation preſided by the Archbiſhop of Paris, and in which the Reſpondent was inveſted with all the Marks of his Rectorſhip, that it might appear, that it was the whole Body of the Univerſity, repreſented by their Head, that maintained theſe Deciſions. The Theſis was poſted upon the Door of the Nuncio's Houſe, notwithſtanding the Oppoſitions he threatned to make againſt it. The Pope expreſs'd his Reſentment againſt the Clergy; he Anſwered harſhly the Letter he had received from 'em, and would never grant his Bulls to thoſe who aſſiſted at the Aſſembly of 1682. He Aboliſhed the Privileges of the Embaſſador of France, like thoſe of others, and would never receive the Marquis de Lavardin, who was ſent Embaſſador to him (h): France did then a very bold thing. This Embaſſador (i) entred Rome almoſt by main Force, and having taken Poſſeſſion of his Quarters, he ſet a Guard about him, as if it had been a Fortified Town. The Pope without being Aſtoniſh'd, Reveng'd himſelf by a ſurpriſing Blow: He caſt an Interdict upon the Church of St. Lewis, becauſe the Marquis de Lavardin had been admitted into it, and Excommunicated this Embaſſador, and Obſtinately refus'd to Acknowlege him.

Things were at this paſs, when his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty perceiving that the continuation of theſe Differences, would be Prejudicial to him, (k) ſecretly diſpatch'd a truſty Man to whom he gave a Letter of his own Writing as a Credential to his Holineſs. This Man was to diſcover to the Pope the moſt ſecret Intentions of the King. But the Pope would neither receive the Letter nor give him any Audience. Hereupon the King writ a Letter to Cardinal d' Etrée, which was Communicated to the Cardinals. He complained in it of the Pope's Conduct, and ſhewed in Particular, the Prejudice that Europe and the Church might ſuffer, from what the Pope had already done againſt Cardinal Furſtemberg. He aſcribed to this Partiality the Movements that were formed againſt King James, in favour of the Proteſtant Religion, &c. This Letter diſperſed at Rome was perhaps a new Motive, which induced the Pope to Countenance more and more Prince Clement of Bavaria, to the Prejudice of Cardinal Furſtemberg. Now by the Excluſion of this Cardinal, he Reveng'd himſelf a Hundred-fold, for all the Affronts he had receiv'd. He depriv'd the King of France of being the Arbitrator of Peace and War, and involved him neceſſarily in a War, with the greateſt part of Europe. He quickly ſaw the effect of this Conduct; and if he liv'd not long after ſo terrible a Revenge, he liv'd long enough to have the Satisfaction of ſeeing France Attack'd by ſo many Enemies, that according to the general Conjectures, ſhe was to ſink the very firſt Campagne. 'Tis plain therefore that the Church did obtain the Victory over the World, in this long Diſpute. If Alexander the Great had been a Catholick, he would have had much ado to draw out of the Popes Mouth (l) what he did from the Prieſteſs of Delphi, My Son, thou art Invincible.

(F) Have been more uſeful to the Catholick Religion.] Thoſe, who don't love this Pope, ſay, that he was well enough acquainted with the general Affairs to know, that in the State they were in when Cardinal Furſtemberg demanded the Electorate of Cologne, he might have ſaved the King of England, and enabled France to Execute all her Projects; for with the aſſiſtance of ſuch a Cardinal, who would have been poſſeſt of his Predeceſſor's States, ſhe would have ty'd the Arms of the Princes of Germany, that were ill Affected to her. She experienced it, in the year 1684, when ſhe deſired a Truce. Now 'tis certain that the Victories of this Crown, would have extended the Catholick Religion; and ſtrangely weakned the Proteſtant; Whence comes it then that the Pope was ſo contrary to that Cardinal? 'Tis, ſay they, becauſe he hated the King of France, and choſe rather to renounce the Advantages of the Catholick Religion, than the Pleaſure of croſſing his Enemy, or the ſweetneſs of Revenge. Theſe ſame Perſons ſay, that he knew very well there was an Alliance forming, of which the Proteſtants would be the chief Managers, and which might be able in its turn to oppreſs the Catholick Religion, almoſt all over Europe; and that the moſt effectual means to prevent this League, was to put the whole Succeſſion of the late Elector of Cologne into the Hands of a Cardinal, who would never join with Heretical Princes. Why then was Innocent XI. ſo contrary to the Intereſt of this Cardinal? Becauſe, ſay they, he was overjoy'd to expoſe the French Monarchy to the greateſt Dangers; and provided he could Revenge himſelf of the Court of France, he car'd but little for the loſſes of the Popedom. This is what is ſaid by his Enemies: But it is not too much to be relied on; their Paſſion ought to make their Conjectures ſuſpected. 'Tis perhaps much more reaſonable to ſay, that being very intent upon the Reformation of Manners, and Pious Exerciſes, he was neither capable of knowing what was uſeful to his Religion, nor of preferring the Profitable before the honeſt Part. Now he believed he was bound in Justice to prefer the Duke of Bavaria's Brother before the Cardinal Candidate. Some apply to Innocent the XI. what was said of Hadrian VI: he was an honest Man; (†) but did not understand Politicks. 'Twas the good Fortune of the Protestants, that in the year 1688. the See of Rome was Possess'd by a Pope who did not well understand his own Interests, or who was too stiff to take Advantage of the present Junctures, to the Prejudice of his Passions.

I find in the Valesiana a Passage which deserves to be (K) set down here at length. I

(†) See Hadrian VI. Remark P.

But after all, who can assure us, that Innocent XI. did not in some Respects behave himself like a good Politician? Has the Court of Rome nothing to fear from the too great Power of Princes, that are most Violent against the Sects separated from her Communion? Did not Sixtus V. who so well understood Politicks, choose rather to Countenance Henry the IV. and Queen Elizabeth, than to suffer the King of Spain (a) to grow too Powerful. Who can affirm that Innocent XI, was not moved by some such Spring, when he enter'd upon Measures so contrary to the Interests of France, and so useful to the Protestants? One thing seems very certain, that an Anonymous Author of a little Book (b) Intituled The Extravagant Reproach, in which is shewn, that the Pope can't without Folly be Reproach'd, with the ruin of the Catholick Religion in England, has no Reason to call this Reproach a Folly.

(G) Will contribute much to his Canonization.] 'Tis not long since (c) the Novelists of Holland, have Publish'd in their Monthly Accounts, that many Miracles were wrought at this Pope's Tomb, and that 'tis a great Mortification to the Court of France; and that probably the Enemies of that Crown, will endeavour out of spite to get this Pope Canoniz'd. 'Tis commonly a Piece of Prudence to take the strongest side: But that Maxim is sometimes False. There are some Princes, who owe their Elevation only to their nice Policy of Declaring themselves betimes Irreconcileable Enemies to a Potent State, which terrifies all its Neighbours; for all those that are afraid of this Power, Countenance this Declar'd Enemy, and gratify him as far as they can in all his desires: And we need not go so high, as the Ages of Paganism, to find some Princes, who have Irrecoverably lost themselves, by preferring the Alliance of the most Potent of their Neighbours, before that of others (d). A private Person that falls from a Prosperous State into Misfortune, does not find about him, that Multitude of Friends who Encompass'd him before: They forsake him, and leave him to himself.

Soveraigns find it quite contrary: For if they grow too Potent, they find no more Allies; every Body forsakes and Confederates against them. 'Tis certain that Innocent XI. Purchas'd a great many Friends and Admirers, meerly for his thwarting as much as he could the Designs of the Court of France. This will keep his Memory sweet, and make his pretended Miracles more easily go down.

(H) He was not Learned.] 'Tis said, he wanted that his Secretary should explain to him in Italian what they wrote for him in Latin. See the Menagiana, wherein are these Words. (f) Page 52. of the 1. Dutch Edition. I think the Printers have left out some Words in the Italian.

(I) Says a great deal in a few Words.] This is the beginning of it: (g) We have learn'd, from your Letter of the 13*th. of this Month, the decease of our Holy Father* Innocent XI. and we have just Reason to believe that it has pleas'd the Divine Majesty to take him out of the World at a time when all the Re-united Forces of Heresy, seem to Conspire against the Ruin of our Religion, to which the Division of the Catholick Princes, contributes not a little. This is to say in a few Words, which have a great Air of Moderation, that the wants of the Church requiring a Pope that should lay her Interests to Heart, God had remov'd Innocent XI. out of the World, who was ill-affected to the Church or unable to Labour for her Good.

(g) The Letter is Dated from Versailles the 24. of August 1689. It is to be found at length in the Mercure Historique & Politique of October 1689. p 1020.

(K) Deserves to be set down here at length.] 'Tis pity (h) said the Learn'd Adrian Valois, 'that 'Innocent XI. suffer'd himself to be prevailed upon, 'as he was by the Enemies of France. If he had 'been seconded by People as well Affected as himself, what Advantages might he not have procur'd to the Christian Religion? What would he 'not have Re-establish'd? What would he not 'have Reform'd? What promising hopes did not he 'give by his Abolishing the Office of the Immaculate Conception as Clement IX. had done that of 'the Slavery? What would he not have done, if 'he had heard of the Impertinent Devotion of that 'Monk, which M——— spoke of t'other Day? 'Would he not have Rigidly Condemned the Superiors, who suffer one of their Visionaries to Print '(i) Orisons, Addressed to all the Parts of the 'Body of the Holy Virgin? Are not Religion, 'Modesty and good Sense, Wounded by such an 'Extravagance? Innocent XI. would not have 'stopt there: He would have Reform'd the Luxury 'and Fineries of Women. How many Husbands 'would have been oblig'd to him, had his Design 'taken Effect? I am assur'd also from good Hands 'that he would have Abolish'd the Privileg'd Altars as a very great abuse. And indeed can some 'Indulgences granted to an Altar, make the Mass 'better? Or does the Blood of Christ, which is 'of Infinite Worth, want any Accession of Merits 'to be more acceptable to God, and more effectual for 'those that are Pray'd for? The Mendicant Friars 'have invented these Things, to bring Custom to 'their Churches.

DIGRESSION concerning the Reformation of Luxury.

What Mr. Valois says concerning the Design of Reforming the Luxury and Fineries of Women, puts me in mind of the great Zeal Innocent XI. express'd against those who shew'd their Breasts. (k) 'This Pope finding he was not able to prevail with 'the fair Sex, by the many powerful means he us'd, 'not to shew their Breasts and their Arms, and knowing withal that the Terror which seiz'd all Italy, 'when the Turks Besieg'd Vienna, did not put a stop 'to that Disorder, had recourse to the last Remedy; 'Namely, Excommunication. He Publish'd an 'Order the 30*th.* of November 1683. which Enjoined all Maids and Women to cover their Shoulders, and Breasts up to their Necks, and their Arms down to their Hands, with some Thick and not Transparent Stuff, upon Pain of being so fully Excommunicated ipso facto, if they did not Obey in six Days time, that except at the last Hour no one but the Pope could Absolve them; for it was 'Declared that the Confessors who should presume to Absolve 'em from that Excommunication should incur it themselves, and should be liable to such Spiritual and Temporal Punishments as his Holiness should think fit to inflict upon them: which Temporal Punishments, the Fathers, Husbands, Masters, and other Heads of Families, by whose Permission or Connivance their Daughters and Wives Act contrary to his Ordinance, shall likewise undergo. I don't know what was the Success of these terrible Menaces; but I believe that as they were renew'd from time to time (a) under the Predecessors of Innocent XI, there was occasion to renew them some time after. 'Tis the fate of these Sumptuary Laws: Luxury and the desire of setting off ones Beauty, quickly elude the wisest Regulations: We may say of this Disorder, what a grave Historian has observed with respect to Astrologers; they (b) were always commanded to depart Rome, but they never would

JOACHIM, Husband (A) of S. Anne, and Father of the Holy Virgin. His Marriage was a long time unfruitful, by reason of which his Oblations were rejected by the High-Priest Issachar, who cruelly upbraided him for his Infecundity. Joachim was so confounded to see himself treated in this manner by the High-Priest, that he durst return to him no more. He went and concealed himself in the Country, amongst his Shepherds, and was there comforted by an Angel, who came to tell him, that he should have a Daughter by his Wife Anne, that should be called Mary. This Angel went immediately to tell the same News to Anne, who was lamenting and weeping, not knowing what was become of her Husband. This Angelical News was no doubt very acceptable to her; for she (B) was very much discontented at her having no Children. Many believe, that a bare Kiss of her Husband impregnated her; but others affirm, that the common (C) way was made use of. That which is admirable, would go away. King Lewis XIV. has lately (c) put out fine Edicts against Luxury: if he can command Obedience upon that Head, 'twill be a more admirable thing, than the Power he has had to lessen very considerably in his Kingdom the Madness of Duelling. The Novellists have told us lately, that the Advocates of the Parliament of Paris, have ingaged to see this Reformation of Profuseness observ'd in their own Houses. Time will inform us, whether by the concurrent Authority of the Sovereign and the Husbands, the Reformation will be established for a Continuance. These Gentlemen have been told (d) that as part of their (e) thanks set up most for Women of Quality, would perhaps, have a great Repugnance to retrench any thing from their sumptuous Habits, Furnitures, Coaches, &c. as all from the superfluous Number of their Women, Imbroiderers, Tapestry Workers, and Footmen, which they have in their Service; it had been resolved to oppose a Licentiousness so little confident with the State and Quality of those Ladies——— (f) The King's Intention being, that they should obey and reform themselves at soonest, without any Distinction of Birth and Quality, and that they should begin immediately, by not suffering their Train to be burn up. 'Tis added, that (g) two famous Advocates were charged to communicate this Order to their Brethren, and that the latter being overjoy'd, express'd their Acknowledgment for it, and unanimously resolved to thank the first President for procuring a Regulation so just, so necessary, and so worthy of the King's Wisdom, and to assure him at the same time, that they would cause it to be observed in their own Houses, with the utmost Exactness; they all looking upon it as the most effectual Means to free 'em from infinite Discontent, and to prevent the Fruits of their laborious Imployments from continuing to be sacrificed to the extravagant Ambition of their Wives. 'Tis very likely that they spoke as they meant; for indeed their fine, noble, and profitable Employments, are attended with great Toil. They sometimes (h) envy the Happiness of a Countryman, who can sleep all Night. Is it not reasonable, that they should desire that a Gain, which costs them so many Watchings, should not be squandered away by superfluous Expences, and that the Royal Authority should inable them to remedy it; for otherwise they could never accomplish it.

(A) Joachim, Husband of St. Anne.] Here is his Genealogy: Levi of the Tribe of David, was the Father of Panther; Panther was the Father of Barpanther, who was the Father of Joachim (n). Some have said, that Joachim did not descend from David, but from the Tribe of Levi, and that he was a Priest. The Manichees grounded an Objection upon this, which St. Austin (o) has examined.

(B) For she was very much discontented at her having no Children.] She found her self deprived of a certain Honour that was paid to Mothers according to the Laws; upon which she had Recourse to extraordinary Prayers, that she might partake of that Honour: She entered into the Holy of Holies, and made earnest Supplications to God, representing, that she had done nothing against the Law, and therefore ought not to be excluded from the Priviledges which the Law gave to Women, who had Children. Her Prayer was heard; God giving her to understand, that she should bear a Child (p). St. Gregory Nyssenus relates this Story, which he read in an Apocryphal Work. They who know that none entered into the Holy of Holies, but the High-Priest himself, and that he was not permitted to enter into it but once a Year, need not have the Falsity of this Story represented to 'em. If St. Anne prepared her self on one Hand, her Husband did no less on the other; for he fasted Forty Days upon a Mountain, in order to obtain of God the desired Posterity (q). admirable, is, that though we know nothing for certain of (D) the Name, Qualities, and History of the Father and Mother of the Holy Virgin, yet all this that I have mention'd, has been asserted, and Feasts have been consecrated to (E) St. Joachim, and his Wife. (b) See his Words in the foregoing Remark.

(D) Though we know nothing for certain of the Name, Qualities, &c.] St. Epiphanius, who flourished in the Year 370, is the most ancient Author, that tells us the Names of the Holy Virgin's Father and Mother. 'Tis true, that he pretends to have received from the Tradition and History of the Virgin Mary, what he says concerning the Prayers of Joachim and St. Anne, and the Revelation (b) of the Angel; but does not he himself confess, that there went about very absurd Traditions concerning the Birth of Mary? Does he not quote a Book upon this matter, in which were abominable Things (c)? Does he not say, that the Reason assigned there of Zachary's losing his Speech in the Temple, was because he had seen a Man made like an Ass? He was preparing to go out, and to say, Woe be to you, what Deity do you worship? But that Deity, to hinder him, made him Speechless: when he had recovered the use of his Speech, and revealed what he saw, he was killed. St. Epiphanius adds, that it was found in the same Book, that the Reason why the Legislator had ordered the High-Priest to wear little Bells, was this: That this Deity might have time to hide himself, that he might not discover his Figure of an Ass; so that to prevent being surprised, the Sound of the Bells was to give him warning, that the High-Priest was coming. I am sensible that all Traditions don't deserve to be rejected like these; but however, we have no solid Reason to assure us, that those which St. Epiphanius has espoused, had any good Foundation. This is is so true, that St. Austin makes no Scruple to take those Traditions which made Joachim, the Holy Virgin's Father, a Priest, for uncertain and Apocryphal. (d) Quod de generatione Mariæ Faustus posuit quod patrem habuerit ex tribu Levi sacerdotem quendam nomine Joachim, quia Canonicum non est, non me constringit. He adds, that 'twas possible for one and the same Person to descend from two Tribes, and concludes, that if he was obliged to pay any Deference to Apocryphal Writings, he would thus resolve the Objection of the Manichee: Hoc ego potius vel tale aliquid crederem, si illius apocryphæ scripturæ ubi Joachim pater Mariæ legitur, auctoritate detinerer, quam mentiri Evangelium in quo scriptum est, &c.

Would you have any other Proofs of the Uncertainty of these Traditions, do but consider Baronius's Conduct: he has rejected part of the Things that are said concerning the Father and Mother of the Holy Virgin; he says in express Words, that the Book father'd upon St. Jerome, is the Work of an unknown and ignorant Person, who was incapable of avoiding manifest Falsities. (e) Non tantum eam Hieronymi non esse dixerimus, sed auctoris planè ut ignoti, sic prorsus imperiti, qui in ea condenda & conscribenda non novit apertè vitare mendacia, dum ait illis temporibus quibus ea acciderunt fuisse Isachar summum pontificem. He declares, that though that Book has many Truths in it, he will not build upon it (f). He therefore overturns one part of the Foundation. You may see how Casaubon overturns the other: he shews, that the Book de Nativitate S. Mariæ, falsly attributed to St. Jerome, was written by a Manichee, and abounds with impious and impertinent Things. (g) A pestilentissimo hæretico profectum, postremo magarum & impietatum esse plenum. He wonders that the Jesuit Christopher de Castro durst declare for such a Book, the Imposture whereof was so well known to Erasmus, Melchior Canus, Sixtus Senensis and Baronius. He cites a Passage out of it, which suppises me with a strong Proof. (h) Illud liberè dico quod fidelium neminem negaturum puto; sive hæc vera sunt, sive ab aliquo conficta sacrosanctæ S. Mariæ maculæ præcessisse; maxima consecuta fuisse; & ideirco salva fide, ab iis qui Deum facere ista posse credunt sine periculo animæ suæ credi & legi posse. These are not the Words of the Manichean (i) Seleucus, the Author of the Book, but of the Latin Translator; and 'tis worth while to observe, that he confesses there are many Falsities in the Book he translates. (k) Impietas istius Pseudobisvnymi excusari salvo pudore non potest: nam quum fateatur, Seleucum, sive Leucium de doctrina Apostolorum multa esse mentitum; ea tamen defendit, quæ sunt ab eodem hæretico scripta de virtutibus & miraculis eorum. Poterat-ne hic planus apertius ostendere, nullam sibi esse curam veritatis, neque ullum se inter falsum & verum statuere discrimen? Addit de eo ipso libro quem vertebat: ita & his multa non vera de corde suo confingit. Do we need any more towards a full Conviction of the uncertainty of all these Traditions. That which St. Gregory Nyssenus alledges, is palpably false (l). As to Nicephorus Callistus, Germanus Patriarch of Constantinople, John Damascen, &c. they deserve no Credit, because they lived in an Age too remote from the Fountain-Head, to have these Traditions uncorrupted. Besides every one knows, that Nicephorus is a fabulous and (m) unjudicious Writer. We are not obliged to believe that he has rightly quoted Hippolytus Bishop of Porto. However, what he cites out of him, contains some Falsities, as Casaubon shews. See the Bibliotheque Universelle (n). Rivet has reason to think it strange, that Mountague should have acknowledged the Truth of the Narratives which Bernardinus de Busto, Pelbartus de Temeswar, Costerus and such like Writers have adopted concerning our St Joachim (o).

JOB, whose Patience has been described in one of the Canonical Books of the old Testament. Not to repeat what we find in Moreri, I content my self with removing some Errors. 'Tis a Mistake to affirm, that the Turks have (A) a great Veneration for the Sepulchre of this Holy Man, the first (B) Judge of Solomon's Court. 'Tis a scandalous Impudence to say, that Job's Distemper was (C) the Pox. I confess, that in the Church of Rome, he is (D) the Patron of those who have the Pox; but this does not prove the other Supposition. He was worshipt in that Church before (E) the Pox was known in Europe. Tertullian is in an Error, to say, that Job left no Posterity. There is more Reason for pretending, that Jodelle was + the first Frenchman, who gave in his Language Tragedy and Comedy in the ancient Form. He had an incredible Faculty (A) of making Verses, and was Master of several other Arts. He was an Orator, understood Architecture, Painting, and Sculpture, and was well skill'd in managing Arms. ferior to that of his Wife. She is the Patroness of an Order of Nuns, called the Daughters of St. Joseph (r), and there is much talk of her Miracles. The Village of Ker-Anne, in the Diocese of Vannes in Bretagne, is very famous upon that Account, and especially, since an old Image of this Saint has been dug up, which had been long hid under Ground. It was revealed to a Labourer in the Year 1625, where this Image was to be found. As soon as it was retrieved, it performed Abundance of Miracles. They were quickly in a Condition to build her a fine Church; the Alms of Devout Souls, who flocked thither from all Parts, furnished enough for the Expence. The Bishop of Vannes procured from Rome the necessary Indulgences for those that should visit this Image; and gave the Direction of this new Church to the Reformed Carmelites, and permitted Brother Hugh, of St. Francis, one of 'em, to publish the Miracles which had been lately wrought in those Parts (f).

(A) That the Turks have a great Veneration for the Sepulcher of Job.] Here is a Passage of Sir Paul Ricaut (a). 'Tis the Custom of the Turks, 'as often as there is a new Emperor, to conduct him 'with all imaginable Pomp, to the place of 'the Suburbs of Constantinople, which they 'call Job, where there is an ancient Sepulchre of a 'certain Prophet, or Holy Man, whom the Turks, 'who have no Knowledge of Antiquity or History, 'pretend to be the same Job, who for so many 'Ages has been a Pattern of Constancy and Patience. The French Translator makes an Observation upon these Words, that deserves to be mentioned. 'I believe, says he (b), that some Turks, 'unacquainted with History and Chronology, may 'take the Sepulchre of Job, which is under 'the Walls of Constantinople, for that of the Holy Man, whose History is related in the old Testament; but the Mahometan Historians tell us 'themselves, that this Sepulchre was built for another Job, who was a Mahometan, and one of 'the Companions of Mahomet. He was killed at 'the Siege of Constantinople, which was attacked 'by Jezid the Son of the Calif Moavias, in the '52d. Year of the Hegira, or the 672d. of Jesus 'Christ. This is what Elmacinus observes in his 'History of the Saracens, chap. 7. Book 1, and tho' 'Elmacinus was a Christian, yet he only relates 'what he found in the Mahometan Historians, 'which he owns to have abridged. One of the most Learned Rabbies of the XVIIth. Century has been in the same Error with these ignorant Turks; for he affirms (c) 'that the Mahometans 'have still a great Veneration for the Sepulchre of 'Job, which is at Constantinople——(d). Doubtless he did not know that it is the Sepulchre of a different Job from that of the Old Testament, and he 'was so ridiculous as to believe, that all the Mahometans took it for the Sepulcher of this Holy Man.

For Busbequius does not 'say that the Turks believe Job to be the first Judge of 'Solomon's Court, and Alexander to be the General 'of his Army; but only that they understand Chronology and History so little, that if such a thing 'should come into their Heads, they would make no 'Scruple to affirm, that Job was the first Judge of 'Solomon's Court, and Alexander the Great the General of his Army. There's a great deal of difference 'betwixt these two things. See Busbequius, Epist. 1. Sir Paul Ricaut's Error has already crept into some Books (g).

Je croirois volontiers que David fit Salomon l'avoient aussi.* Note, that it might be lord, that Job had this Distemper, without having deserved it by any Act of Impunity.

(E) He was worshipt—— before the Pox was known.] The same Molanus cautions us against the Omission of Agrippa's Error, who ventures to say, that the Pox was the cause of Job's Canonization. Before this, says Molanus, there was at Verona a Church, and a Feast appointed for this Holy Man, who from Charlemagne's time has been inserted in the Martyrology. (a) *Circumdat eum H. His Friends publiſhed a Collection of his Works the following Year *. It has been wrongfully ſaid (C), that he died with Hunger, as a Puniſhment for his Impieties, and he has been falſly cried down as an Atheiſt, becauſe in a Carnival Sport his Friends (D) ſacrificed a Goat to him. I dare not give Credit to what I have read in 'living, teſtify, that their longeſt and moſt difficult 'Tragedy or Comedy has not taken him up above 'ten Mornings: nay, the Comedy intituled, Eu- 'gene, was made at four Sittings. He has been 'ſeen in his Youth to compoſe and write in one 'Night for a Wager, Five hundred good Latin Verſes, on a Subject given him upon the Spot. All 'his Sonnets, even thoſe that were meerly accidental, were made by him as he was walking, and a-'muſing himſelf with other Things, ſo ſuddenly, 'that when he pronounced 'em, People thought 'he had not yet began 'em. We need not wonder then at his numerous Productions. 'Tis ſaid, that he compoſed about Ten Thouſand Verſes (o) upon the Paſſage of the Rubico. If his Friends had publiſhed all his Pieces, how many Thouſands of Verſes would they have amounted to? He made all ſorts of Verſes (p), Elegies, Odes, Sonnets, Songs, Inſcriptions, and Canticles. He made a Poem (q) againſt the Sin of Sodomy.

(B) His Birth gave him that Authority.] He was a Gentleman who had a Lordſhip; for he took the Title of Seigneur du Lymodin (r). I believe 'twas a Patrimonial Eſtate.

(C) That he died with Hunger, as a Puniſhment for his Impieties.] Voetius (a) relates, that upon his reading in Honſdorf's Theatrum, that Stephen Jodelle an Epicurean and an Atheiſt, ſpent all his Eſtate, and died (b) of Hunger, he carefully inquired whether the thing was true; but that his Library could give him no Light into it, which obliged him to conſult Mr. Rivet. By which Means he found, that there was no Track of Atheiſm to be ſeen in Jodelle's Works; but on the contrary, many Signs of Orthodoxy; and that poſſibly, the Accuſation of Impiety, which was charg'd upon him, had no other Foundation than the Sacrifice of a Goat (c), which was offered to Jodelle, as being the Head of the Tragick Poets; which was only a meer Sport, if we will believe the Author of Ronſard's Life. Nevertheleſs, Rivet durſt not determine whether for that one Action Jodelle do's not deſerve to be reckon'd an Atheiſt. Voetius acquieſces in that Judgment: he grants with his Friend, that if there be no more authentick Proofs of Jodelle's Atheiſm, one can't affirm that he was guilty of it; but in the mean time he will not acquit him, and leaves it as a diſputable thing. In medio relinquit (Rivetus) an ob idem factum Atheus ſit dicendus, niſi aliunde alia authentica teſtimonia ſuppetant. In cujus ſententia & nos acquieſcimus (d). It is not likely that the Compiler Honſdorf goes upon this pretended Sacrifice: he gives Jodelle the Character of a Debauchee, who had ſquander'd his Eſtate. 'Tis therefore upon an Habitual Sin that he goes, and not upon the Farce of a pretended Sacrifice; a thing done but once, and which is as imputable to the other Wits of whom Honſdorf ſays not a Word, as to Jodelle. We may therefore ſay, that this Compiler of Examples of the Divine Juſtice, is groſly miſtaken; and yet we have ſeen two famous Divines, who equal his Accuſation, tho' deſtitute of all ſorts of proof, to the Teſtimonies of Orthodoxy, that appear in the Books of the accuſed: they fancy themſelves equitable enough, provided they neither condemn nor acquit him. How little do they follow theſe Maxims, Quilibet præſumitur bonus donec probetur malus. Actore non probante abſolvitur reus? We muſt take notice, that Honſdorf's Tranſcribers, or thoſe whom he has tranſcribed, be they never ſo numerous, don't amount altogether to the Authority of a ſingle Witneſs, while they quote no body, or only cite one another (e). Note, that I don't pretend to deny that Jodelle died poor. I don't know but Gentillet was the firſt Original of all thoſe Compilers, who have mention'd Jodelle, as an Inſtance of divine Vengeance upon infamous Men. 'We might alledge, ſays he (g), 'infinite 'Examples of the Judgments and Vengeance of 'God, exerciſed againſt Atheiſts, Deſpiſers of God 'and Religion, even of our own time; as for in-'ſtance, the Tragick Poet Jodelle, who made a true 'Tragical End; for having eaten up his Patrimony 'like an Epicure, he died miſerably of Hunger. I have found part of theſe Words in a Book printed at Morges in the Year 1581, intituled, Punitions & jugemens de Dieu, &c. and in a Book (h) printed in 1586, and written by John Chaſſanion of Moniſtrol in Vellay, with this Title, Memorable Hiſtories of the great and wonderful Puniſhments and Judgments of God, &c.

(D) Sacrifice'd a Goat to him.] Claudius Binet (i) tells us, how this Farce was acted. 'They (k) blamed him, amongſt other Things, for having ſa-'crified a Goat to Jodelle in the Village of Her-'cueil (l): but he gives a ſufficient Anſwer to that 'head of Accuſation, which is this. Jodelle cauſed the Tragedy of Cleopatra to be acted before 'the King, which every Body ſo applauded, that 'ſome Days after, when the whole Club of the Poets 'were together in this Village, to paſs away the 'time, and enjoy themſelves in the licentious Days 'of the Carnaval, every one of them made ſome 'Verſes in Imitation of the Bacchanalia of the An-'cients. A Goat happen'd to go in the Street, 'which gave 'em an Oportunity to play the Fools, 'as well becauſe he was formerly ſacrificed to Bac-'chus, as becauſe they had a mind to offer him to 'Jodelle, as a Recompence for his Tragedy, accor-'ding to the antient Cuſtom, to which the Chri-'ſtians themſelves, and eſpecially the Poets, have 'recourſe now and then, not out of any Belief, 'but by way of Alluſion: and that which gave 'occaſion to believe ſomething of it, was the Ver-'ſes and Pranks of thoſe Poets, that were publiſhed, 'particulary the Dithyrambicks of Bertrand Ber-'ger a Dithyrambick Poet, in which were theſe 'Verſes—— All this was but Fiction and Maſque-'rade. Perhaps the Reader will not be diſpleaſed to find here Ronſard's Anſwer, which Binet has only pointed at. Here it is.

JOHN (SAINT) the Evangeliſt. Not to mention here what is to be found in Moreri, or in Mr. de Tillemont †, I ſhall only ſay 1. That in St. Auſtin's time, there went about (A) a lamentable Tradition concerning the condition St. John was in. 2. That there is nothing more Abſurd than what has (B) been ſaid againſt the Author of the Tranſlation of the New Teſtament of Mons, under the falſe pretence, that De- Stories that were ſpread concerning Jodelle's Goat; and becauſe Ronſard ſet up for a Perſecutor, (for he Wrote againſt the Proteſtants, and fell up upon 'em at the head of the Militia,) they upbraided him with the Ceremony of the Goat, putting the worſt Conſtruction upon it. They call'd it a Pagan Sacrifice, and maintain'd, that the Goat had been Sacrificed to a falſe God. It was a Calumny, but they were not the Inventers of it. I ſhall quote Scaliger, who ſays, that a Prieſt gave Birth to that Impoſture; and 'tis to be obſerved, that he has rejected this pretended Sacrifice as a Fable. I know not whether he remember'd, that ſome Miniſters had accuſed Ronſard of it; but I know very well, that he believed his Adverſary Scioppius had brought him upon the Stage. Theſe are his Words.

'(n) Aſt illud, quod adjiciemus, omnia portenta 'amphitheatrica ſuperat. Pariſienſes illos amicos tuos 'imitaris, quos Dionyſia agitaſſe, & hircum immo-'laſſe fama eſt. Dionyſia agitare, dicit eſſe hircum 'immolare. Hujus enim inſimulati ſunt illi, de 'quibus nunc agitur. Veſpillonis filius, qui nun-'quam Lutetiæ fuit, in media Suburra habitans Ro-'mæ, unde hoc mendacium expiſcari potuit, niſi à 'quibus reliqua portenta didicit? Quos putat Dio-'nyſia agitaſſe, vel hircum immolaſſe, ut illi per-'ſuaſerunt qui verum dicere, etiam ſi velint, non 'poſſint, ii ſunt, Petrus Ronſardus, M. Antonius 'Muretus, Janus Baiſius, Remigius Bellaqueus, Ste-'phanus Jodellus, Nicol. Denifortus, Joan. Aura-'tus, alii, omnes poëtæ, præter Patoletum, qui in 'hiſtoriis conſcribendis omne ſtudium ſuum collo-'carat. Si illi 'docti viri viverent, fur non inultum tuliſſet. Porro 'tam impudentis calumniæ auctor fuit ſacrificulus 'Gentiliaci vici, in quo illi doctiſſimi viri de con-'ſtituto coierant, ut de ſymbolis eſſent. Totum 'drama exponerem, ſi opus eſſet, ut Joſephus me 'docuit, qui illud ad unguem tenet. All goes well hitherto; I wiſh what follows was as juſt. (o) Sed ponamus verum eſſe. Quid hæc ad Joſephum, qui tuno puer Burdigalæ primis rudimentis Latini ſermonis inſtiabatur? Hoc modo oporteret omnes, qui Muretum norunt, Dionyſia agitaſſe, hoc eſt, majorem partem eorum, qui hodie Romæ agunt. Quanta invidia Joſephum premerent, ſi verum crimen haberent, quod illi objicerent, quum aliorum facta, eaque falſa illi exprobrentur? The heat of the Diſpute diſturb'd Scaliger's Head; he goes about to clear himſelf from a thing he was not Accus'd of; he complains of being Calumniated when he is not, and ſo he himſelf becomes a (a) Slanderer. When 'tis ſaid that a Man imitates the Faults of his good Friends, 'tis not preſumed that he was with them in a certain Place, where they have committed ſome Crime; on the contrary it is ſuppoſed he was not with them, for if he had been, he would be call'd an Accomplice, and not an Imitator. It is not therefore true (b) that Scioppius involved Scaliger in Jodelle's buſineſs, and conſequently Scaliger ſhould not have complain'd of it, nor Alledged his being in another Place.

(E) What I have Read in Beza's Life.] I find in it, that Stephen Jodelle, one of the French Pleiad, made a Stanza upon Beza's being ſtruck with the Plague whilſt he was Tranſlating the Pſalms. The Stanza runs thus:

Beze fut lors de la peſte accueilli
Qu'il retoucheit cette harpe immortelle.
Mais pourquoi fut Beze d'elle aſſailli?
Beze aſſailloit la peſte à tous mortelle.

Antony la Faie, who wrote (c) the Life of this Miniſter, gives Jodelle the Surname of Modilius. Stephanus Jodellus Modilinus, ſays he, non poſtremus inter poëtas Pleiadis Gallicæ &c. One may eaſily perceive that Modilinus was put in for Limodinus, a Title belonging to Jodelle, becauſe of his (d) Lordſhip. But becauſe this Stanza is aſcribed to one Stephen de Modelin in many Editions of the Pſalms, where 'tis plac'd with the Epitaph of Clement Marot, Compos'd by the ſame Modelin, I queſtion whether it be Jodelle's. For ſuch a Poet ſhould not have been call'd Stephen de Modelin. On ſuch occaſions as theſe, 'tis not uſual to make a Man known by an Anagram. But I have a ſtronger Reaſon than this. Beza was at Lauſanne when he was Seiz'd with the Plague; and was then look'd upon in France as an Apoſtate. The Perſecution was terrible againſt the Reform'd: Can we then believe that a Poet, who Profeſs'd himſelf a Catholick, would have Compos'd an obliging Stanza, in Beza's Praiſe, ſo agreeable to the Taſte and Style of the Reformers? That which is certain is, that the opinion of Antony la Faie has been followed by Andrew Rivet (e) and Jeremiah de Pours (f).

(A) A lamentable Tradition concerning the Condition of St. John.] '(n) Never was any People 'ſo Credulous about Traditions as the Aſiarchs, and 'in particular the Epheſians. St. Auſtin relates upon 'this Subject a very particular Thing, which 'plainly ſhews the exceſs of their Credulity, and 'the Folly of their Traditions. He ſays, that 'ſome Epheſians (i) or ſome Perſons that came 'from Epheſus, Men of great Senſe and Merit, 'and who were not Creatulous, non levibus homi-'nibus, had aſſured him, that St. John was not 'Dead; that indeed he was Buried at Epheſus, but 'that he was in his Grave as a Man that Sleeps in 'his Bed; and that as we ſee the Bed-Cloaths move 'up and down, according as a Man in his Sleep 'Breaths, ſo the Earth of the Grave wherein St. 'John was Buried, was ſeen to riſe and fall in ſuch 'like Intervals. Can any thing be more Impertinent than ſuch a Story. I have juſt now Read that (o) Mr. de Tillemont is blamed for relating this Story, and many others like it. There would be Reaſon to blame him, if he did relate it as a Truth; but this he does not do (p). 'Tis a Fault then to Cenſure him; for a Collection of Errors is a moſt uſeful part of Hiſtory. I confeſs, he ſeems to believe the Story (q) of the Manna of our Apoſtle's Grave.

(B) What has been ſaid againſt.] I begin with the Greek Text: (r) Καὶ ἀπ' ἐκείνης τῆς ὥρας ἐλάβετο αὐτὴν ὁ μαθητὴς εἰς τὰ ἴδια, that is to ſay, according to the Verſion of Mons, and from that Hour the Diſciple took her into his Houſe. See how the Tranſlation of this Paſſage has been Criticiſed: (ſ) 'Tis cer-'tain that St. John, who had Embraced the Sto-'of the Goſpel-Poverty, had no Houſe to receive 'the Mother of God; and tho' he ſhould have had 'one, there are many Reaſons of Decency and Ho-'neſty, which eaſily perſuade us, that the Virgin 'would not have thought it proper to retire thither. 'This Conduct might alſo have had ill Conſequences 'in the times to come; for Scandalous Cler[gy] Men 'would have been glad to juſtify themſelves by ſo 'noble an Example of the Cohabitation of the Young-'eſt and Chaſteſt of all the Apoſtles, with the moſt 'Modeſt and Innocent of all Virgins. And this 'Apprehenſion is not groundleſs; for St. Epipha-'nius, who ſeems to approve the Thought of the 'Mons Tranſlation, had the ſame fear, and he aſ-'ſures us that ſome Libertins had already pretended 'to cover their Scandalous Conduct with the Ex-'ample of the Virgin's Abode with St. John. In 'the 78th. Herely, where he ſpeaks of this A-'bode, l'croit, ſays he, ne hoc ipſum, quod dicimus, 'fraudi ſit aliquibus, ut ad continentiæ ſpe-'ciem, quas ubique feminas, &c.

(C) That what has been Anſwered——deſerves to be Mentioned.] For it contains General and very Inſtructive Principles, for ſuch as will judge of Things according to their true Differences. I do not inſiſt upon the Anſwer which Relates to the Objection of the Evangelical Poverty; I only ſet down the Confutation of the other Point. 'Tis very ſtrange, ſays Mr. Arnauld (t), that Mr. Mallet has not ſeen what has been obſerved by the Interpreters of the Scripture, upon a Subject which might have appeared much more Scandalous. 'Tis that of the Apoſtles carrying with them a Chriſtian Woman to take care of their Subſiſtence. Nevertheleſs St. Paul 1 Cor. 15. 5. ſays (v) that they had that Power, and made uſe of it: Whereupon Eſtius makes this moſt judicious Reflection, which ſhews the true Principles, by which we ought to judge of this kind of Things, which Mr. Mallet ſhould have known before he undertook to Subject the Virgin to his falſe Rules of Decorum. ' If you aſk, ſays this Learned Divine, how the Apoſtles could without Scandal take ' along with them Women that were not their Wives. ' I Anſwer that this Cuſtom was ſo well Eſtabliſhed ' among the Jews, that our Saviour himſelf did not ' think it amiſs to do it. This was not Practiced except by Women, whoſe Chaſtity and Piety ' were ſo well known and experienced, as to leave no ' room for any ill Suſpicion. To which it may be ' added, that the Apoſtles led ſo Edifying a Life, ' and had obtained ſuch a Reputation of Holineſs, ' that tho' theſe Women attended them, no one durſt ' make an ill Judgment of them, as the Jews never ' ſuſpected any thing of that Nature, with reſpect ' to our Saviour, as much Diſpoſed as they were to ' Slander and Calumny. Nothing can be more Reaſonable, and 'tis indeed by this we ought to judge that a thing which might give offence, when it is not attended with favourable Circumſtances, that leave no room for evil Suſpicions, is truly Edifying when 'tis attended with thoſe Circumſtances. Now when will the conſideration of an experienced Holineſs be able to ſtop the Mouth of Calumny, and even to prevent Suſpicions in the ſhalloweſt Minds, and thoſe that are moſt apt to be Prepoſſeſt by the leaſt Appearances, if the Veneration which the Faithful have always had for the Mother of Jeſus Chriſt, and for his moſt dear Diſciple had not had the Power to make every body Look upon their Living together, in Conſequence of the Command received from their Dying Saviour, as a moſt Holy and moſt Innocent thing—— Mr. Mallet (w) is the firſt and only Man who has had ſo mean a Notion of the Holineſs of the Virgin, and of the Opinion the Church has entertained of her, as to imagine, that being above 50 years of Age, ſhe could not Live with an Apoſtle, without ſtaining her Reputation, and that it was an Example of dangerous Conſequence, as being likely to Authorize the ſuſpected Cohabitations of Women and Eccleſiaſticks, which are forbidden by the Canons. For thus far he carries his Extravagant Imaginations againſt the Honour of the Virgin. But if the Authors of thoſe Canons had been ſo exceſſive in their Suſpicions, as this Cenſurer of the Virgin and St. John, why did they except out of their Prohibitions, ſuch Perſons as Mothers, Siſters and Nieces? Is it becauſe they thought Inceſts were abſolutely impoſſible? No certainly: But becauſe being guided by the Spirit of God, and knowing that in Point of general Laws, all Exceſs ought to be avoided, and a wiſe Moderation obſerved, which obliges to overlook what ſeldom or never happens, they judged on the one Hand, that there was no need of great Virtue to avoid being Tempted with the ſight of thoſe Perſons, becauſe Natural Modeſty is Ordinarily ſufficient to prevent the Motions of an impure Affection upon their Account; And on the other Hand, that the Proneneſs of Men to judge ill of their Neighbours, doth not commonly go ſo far, as to impute to them ſuch black Crimes, without very evident Proofs: ſo that they did not believe, that upon theſe occaſions, there was any ground to fear any ſuch thing, or to ſuſpect it.

(D) His making much of a Partridge.] A Huntſman was Aſtoniſhed to ſee this great Apoſtle ſo Venerable for his Age and Virtue, ſtoop to ſuch an Amuſement. The Apoſtle aſked him whether he always kept his Bow bent. He Anſwered that would be the way to make it uſeleſs. If, replied St. John, you unbend your Bow to prevent its being uſeleſs, ſo do I with my Mind for the ſame Reaſon. I don't believe that this Story is very certain; but I fancy that they who never heard of it will not be diſpleaſed to know that ſuch a thing is related of S. John. The Author of the Tract De Indicra dictione has inſerted it in his Work. His Pleaſes being Nervous, will not be unacceptable to the learned Readers. (a) *Nec malus, ut opinor, interpres Chriſti conſiliorum & voluntatum Joannes diſcipulus, qui ad leves luſus atque oblectamenta puerorum deſcendit ipſe jam ſenior, atque exemplo præiret, quatenus interjungere, & ex quotidianis occupationibus reficere ac recreare mentem liceret. Hunc, manſuefactæ perdici blande & ſuaviter alludentem, quidam cum arcu & ſagittis venator offendit. Quod cum facere cum vehementer miraretur, hominem id ætatis, ſpectatum & cognitum diuturna virtute: ſenſit Joannes, & interrogavit, an illum ipſum, quem gereret, arcum haberet ſemper intentum. Cui ille, Nequaquam vero, inquit: flaccefcat enim arcus, & molliatur intentione perpetua, inutiliſque fiat. (E) The Marriage in Cana——to be his.] The Curious and Learned Thomaſius will ſupply me with all the Materials of this Remark. I ſhould be glad to have the Theſis which he cauſed to be maintain'd (b) about St. John's Glaſs: But I have only the (c) Preface of it, from which I learn a Cuſtom that I was Ignorant of; which is that at great Entertainments, they fill out to the Gueſts a Glaſs of Wine, which they call the Glaſs or Cup of St. John. This is not without ſome Mixture of Superſtition, which has derived its Original from a Legend, wherein we find that St. John having ſwallowed Poiſon by the Order of Ariſtodemus found no Inconvenience by it. This is the Reaſon doubtleſs, why the Painters repreſent him with a Cup in his Hand. I proceed to the Marriage of Cana.

The Legendaries ſuppoſe. 1. That St. John the Evangeliſt, and Mary Magdalen were the two Betrothed Perſons (d). 2. That both of them agreed not to Conſummate the Marriage, but to engage themſelves to a perpetual Virginity. 3. That as ſoon as St. John ſaw the Miracle of Water converted into Wine, he Conſecrated himſelf to the Service of Jeſus Chriſt, and left his Bride (e). 4. That Jeſus Chriſt went on purpoſe to the Wedding to prevent the Accompliſhment of the Marriage (f). One thing Perplexes 'em, which is that the Virginity of St. John could not arrive to the higheſt Degree of Perfection, if he had a deſign to Marry; for perfect Virginity requires that a Man ſhould always have reſolved to contain himſelf. Videbatur (virginitatis) laudem hac fabula non tollere quidem, labefactare tamen, aut in gradum inferiorem detrudere, cùm ea demùm numeris omnibus abſoluta perhibeatur virginitas, quam perpetua incorruptionis nunquam corrupta meditatio pariat (g). In Anſwer to this difficulty, they ſay amongſt other things, that the Divine Providence directed the thing ſo, to heighten the Glory of St. John's Virginity; ſince thereby it became altogether like that of the Holy Virgin, and was Conſecrated, being joined with Marriage, which is one of the ſeven Sacraments (h). Quin ergò potius ita cogitemus, decuiſſe, ut eodem virginitatis gradu collocaretur Apoſtolus, quo Virgo mater, quæ ipſi erat à Chriſto morituro commendanda? Quid, quod ita demùm conſecrari virginitas cenſenda eſt, ſi cum cæremoniâ matrimonii

JONAS, One of the Jewiſh Prophets. Since moſt of the things relating to him may be found in two other † Dictionaries, I will only inſiſt upon a few Particulars. Some Rabbins ᵉ have been ſo ſilly as to ſay, that being firſt ſwallow'd by a Male Fiſh, he was afterwards Diſcharged into the Body of a Female. Not finding himſelf preſs'd in his firſt Priſon, ſay they, he had no Recourſe to the Invocation of God; upon which the Male Fiſh had Orders to Diſgorge him into the Stomach of a Female, which ʏ was Big. He there perceiv'd himſelf in too ſtrait a Lodging, and pronounc'd the noble Canticle, which he * has left us, and which appeas'd the Wrath of Heaven. They who Confute this Story with this Argument, that a Whale that was Impregnated would not have preſs'd Jonas, unleſs he had Lodg'd (A) in her Womb, make but a weak Objection. We have ſeen ‡ in another Place that the Heathen Poets have given out an Event of their Hercules ſomewhat reſembling this. They ſtole it from the Sacred Story, and Falſified it, according to their Fancy. This is at leaſt the common opinion of our † Authors. The Antient Fathers thought it ſtrange that the Heathens ſhould Reject this Hiſtory (B) of Jonas, after having Adopted niali conjungatur? Neque enim virginitas, ſed conjugium eſt in numero ſacramentorum. I muſt not forget to ſay that Baronius and Molanus reject theſe Traditions of the Legendaries. Thomaſius Reports their Words (i), and ſays probably enough, that Abdias's Book was the firſt Original of theſe Idle Tales. That Suppoſititious Abdias affirms us that JESUS CHRIST thrice diſſuaded St. John from Marrying. In two Prefaces upon the Goſpel of that Apoſtle, 'tis only ſaid in general, that JESUS CHRIST diſſuaded him from it: Theſe Prefaces (k) are falſly Aſcribed, one to St. Jerom, and the other to St. Auſtin. As there never were bolder Authors than the Compilers of the Lives of Saints, they have reſolved to be more Deciſive than the Authors of theſe two Prefaces; and to that end they have ſuppoſed the Time and the Place, that is to ſay, the Wedding at Cana, where JESUS CHRIST freed his Diſciple from the Conjugal Bond. Thomaſius does in no ways Diſpute the Virginity of this Apoſtle; it is Grounded upon a pretty good Tradition, teſtified by St. Jerom, St. Auſtin, St. Epiphanius, &c. But Baronius was in the wrong to cite Ignatius, who only ſpeaks (l) of St. John the Baptiſt.

(B) The Antient Fathers thought it ſtrange that the Heathens ſhould reject——after having Adopted the Fable of Hercules.] Here is a fine Paſſage of Theophilactus. (n) Devoratur ergo à cete Jonas, treſque dies ac totidem noctes in eo permanet vates: quæ res omnem excedere fidem audientibus videtur, maxime iis qui ex Græcorum ſcholis ſapientesque doctrina, ad hanc hiſtoriam accedunt. Quos equidem non ſatis demirari poſſum qui fiat quod hæc non intelligant, cum ſuis ipſorum alis capiantur. Apud ipſos enim nonnihil tale de Hercule narratur: nempe quod & ipſe à balæna devoratus, incolumis remanſerit, niſi quod tantummodo depilatus redierit, idque ob ingenitum & internum bellua calorem. Aut igitur noſtra ſuſcipiant, aut ſua rejiciant. I doubt not but Theophilactus would have found many Grecians, who would have taken him at his Word with all their Heart. The Philoſophers and Learned Men of Greece would have Anſwer'd: We accept of your Terms; you would either have us reject the Story of Hercules, or Adopt that of Jonas: we reject them both. But becauſe abundance of Heathens would have Condemn'd this Alternative, and maintain'd that in believing what the Poets ſaid of Hercules, they might ſtill Laugh at the Jewiſh Story of Jonas; 'tis certain that Theophilactus's Thought is very Solid, and admirably ſhews the fooliſh Prejudices of the Heathens. I proceed to St. Auſtin. He had (o) a great love for a Heathen, and writ many Letters to him, ſome of which remain'd unanſwer'd. This Silence made him think that (p) the other was no longer willing to keep Correſpondence with him. Wherefore deſiring to anſwer ſome Difficulties, which this Heathen had Propos'd to the Prieſt Deogratias, he wrote directly to this Prieſt. By this Anſwer we ſee that the Pagans made themſelves very Merry with the Hiſtory of Jonas. (q) Poſtrema quæſtio propoſita eſt de Jona, nec ipſa quæ ex (r) Porphyrio, ſed tanquam ex ore inſultione paganorum. The Method of St. Auſtin's refuting this Objection of his Friend, has a very handſom turn. Either, ſays he, we muſt deny all the Miracles of God, or Acknowledge we have no reaſon to Reject this. Should we believe the Reſurrection of JESUS CHRIST, if we were afraid (s) of the Raillieries of the Infidels? And ſince our Friend has not ſuppos'd any Doubts about our admitting the Reſurrection of Lazarus and JESUS CHRIST, I very much wonder he ſhould look upon the Adventure of Jonas as incredible. Is it eaſier to raiſe a Dead Man from the Grave (t) than to preſerve a Man Alive in the Belly of a great Fiſh? Will it be ſaid that the Digeſtive Faculty of the Stomach can't be Suſpended? But they would urge us with a more conſiderable Objection, if they ſhould Alledge the three Men who receiv'd no harm in the Furnace of Babylon. If they will Reject alſo that Suſpenſion of the Fire's Activity, and all the other Miracles of Scripture, we muſt have Recourſe to another Confutation. For the Infidels ought not to form doubts about one particular Fact, but they muſt either believe or Reject in general all the Facts of the ſame Nature, even thoſe that appear ſtill more Incredible. They would not be ſo nice with reſpect to Apuleius, or Apollonius Tyaneus; they would not Laugh at the Hiſtory of Jonas, but on the contrary cry it up, if what we ſay of him was aſcribed to the Power of either of thoſe Heathens. I don't give a verbal Tranſlation, but only a general Notion of St. Auſtin's Reaſons; and therefore for the ſake of thoſe who underſtand the Latin Tongue, I will ſet down the main part of the Original. (a) *Sed habent revera, quod non credant in divino miraculo, vaporem ventris, quo cibi madeſcunt, potuiſſe ita temperari, ut vitam hominis conſervaret! Quanto incredibilius ergo proponerent, tres illos viros, ab impio Rege in caminum miſſos, deambulaſſe in medio ignis illæſos? Quapropter ſi nulla iſti divina miracula volunt credere, aliâ diſputatione refellendi ſunt. Adopted the Fable of Hercules. Thoſe who ſay that this Prophet came out of (C) the Fiſh's Belly in the Port of Ninive, are but little skilled in Geography; nor is it probable that he came out of it upon the Coaſt (D) of the Euxine or (E) of the Red Sea. 'Tis much more credible he was caſt upon the dry Land near the City of Joppa where he took Shipping. Some confirm this Conjecture by the Fable of Andromeda; for they pretend † that Jonas's Adventure laid a Foundation for the Poetical Narrations concerning Andromeda's being expoſed to the Fury of a Sea-Monſter, which happened near * Joppe. See the Margin †. Here is another idle Story of the Rabbins. They ſay ‡ that the Fiſh which ſwallowed Jonas had ſeven Eyes, which ſerved as ſo many Windows for the Prophet to ſee all that was in the Sea, and amongſt other things, the way which the Iſraelites took in Croſſing the Red Sea. Thoſe who take him for the Young Man (F) who was ſent by Eliſha to Jehu, to give him the Royal Unction, deſerve not to be heard. In St. Jerome's time the Tomb of Jonas was ſtill ſhewn in the place of his Birth †. Mr. Simon ‖ Affirms that the Turks have Built a very fine Moſque to the Honour of Jonas, in which there is a Miraculous Lamp, that Burns continually without any Oil or other Liquor, if we will give credit to their Fooleries. He ſays that this Moſque is in a little Village, built to the Honour and under the Name of this Prophet.

of Confounding the Heathens, will perhaps Appear to ſeveral Perſons more Solid, than that which St. Auguſtin made uſe of in another Book, where having ſaid that thoſe who Laugh'd at the Story of Jonas, did not queſtion the truth of what is ſaid of Arion, he propoſes this Difficulty, whether what is ſaid of Jonas be not more incredible. Yes, ſubtleſs, Anſwers he; becauſe it is more Miraculous: And it is more Miraculous, becauſe it manifeſts a greater Power. (b) Verum illud noſtrum de Jona incredibilius eſt: plane incredibilius, quia mirabilius. Immo ideo mirabilius, quia potentius. Theſe are witty Conceits, will ſome ſay, and pretty Thoughts, but not good Arguments: For from hence it would follow, that the more impoſſible a thing appears to be, the more credible it is. The Fable of Arion was this, that, in order to ſave his Life, he was forc'd to caſt himſelf out of the Ship in which he was returning from Italy into Greece, and that he fell upon a Dolphin which carried him to the Shore. I don't ſay this in favour of thoſe who have never heard of it, for there are ſcarce any ſuch Perſons; but in favour of thouſands of People who don't remember it, and would be ſorry, not to ſee at one View the difference betwixt the Adventure of Arion and that of the Prophet Jonas.

Let us Reflect a little upon the partial Conduct with which St. Auſtin upbraids the Heathens. It affords an Inſtance of one of the moſt Ridiculous Effects of Preposſeſſion. The managers of the Pagan Religion had Fed the Minds of the People with abundance of Fables for many Ages, and they would not ſuffer 'em to Examine whether they were poſſible, or to call 'em incredible. But when the Chriſtian Miracles were propoſed to 'em, they ſet up for Philoſophers, they alledged Impoſſibilities, they made uſe of all ſuch Arguments as might be Oppoſed to the current of a fooliſh Credulity, and Ridicul'd the Believers. What Inconſiſtency, and Partiality is this! The Chriſtian Communions diſcover one againſt the other ſomewhat of this Spirit. If the Greek Church boaſts of ſome Miracle, which ſhews that Neſtorius's Schiſm is diſpleaſing to God; the Neſtorians leave no Stone unturn'd to Repulſe that Attack. But as to the Prodigies, that are proper to Convict the Greek Church of Injuſtice, they blindly believe 'em without Examination, and think it very ſtrange, that their Adverſaries ſhould make any ſcruple about them. 'Tis well known how eaſily the Roman Catholicks give their Aſſent to an infinite number of Miracles. They Piouſly believe thouſands of Stories which are daily Publiſh'd, and look upon the moſt plauſible Reaſons of thoſe who deny them as meer Cavils of obſtinate Heretics. But if they hear that the Proteſtants ſpread abroad any Miracles, they aſſume a quite different Spirit. They have Recourſe to all the Arguments made uſe of by the Incredulous. They deny the Fact, they challenge the Witneſſes, they Reproach 'em with Impoſture, or a diſtemper'd Brain. If they cannot deny the Fact, they explain it by Natural Cauſes, and Collect from the Naturaliſts, and the Relations of Travellers, a thouſand like Events. In a Word what they call Wrangling, Obſtinacy, and an Oppoſition to good Senſe, becomes a moſt ſolid and reaſonable Confutation of a falſity; for they make uſe of the ſame common Places that the Proteſtants employ againſt the Monks. There are every where thoſe who readily believe what is grateful to 'em, but are the hardeſt in the World to be perſuaded of a thing that is unacceptable to them. If they alledge the Reaſons of their Incredulity, they cannot abide that they ſhould be thought wrong: But if you Alledge the ſame Reaſons againſt 'em another time, they muſt be allowed the Liberty of Ridiculing 'em. This is the way of Humane Life: 'Tis almoſt an unavoidable effect of Preposſeſſion. And if this could not be avoided without laying aſide Prejudices, the Remedy would perhaps be worſe than the Diſeaſe.

(C) This Prophet came out of the Fiſh's Belly, in the Port of Ninive.] Sulpicius Severus fell into this Geographical Blunder; (c) Excetus à cete, marino monſtro, ac deporatus poſt triduum fere Niniviticarum littoribus eiectus, juſta prædicat. The Learned Druſius did not perceive a Fault in Commenting upon theſe Words, but only ſays, that the Scripture (d) do's not tell us upon what Shore the Fiſh diſcharg'd the Prophet. The other Commentators upon Sulpicius, and particularly Hornius have perceived the Fault, and ſo has Mr. Livenius; but he is groſly miſtaken in Chronology, as believing (e) that Sulpicius Severus borrowed this from St. Gregory's Morals. This Pope Flouriſhed 150 Years after Sulpicius. Mr. Simon has Tranſcribed the Fault of this Writer: A Whale, ſays he, receiv'd Jonas (f) in its Bowels ——— and prov'd a much ſafer Veſſel than the firſt he was in, and put him a Shore, or rather Vomited him up the third Day in the Port of Ninive. Note that Ninive was built upon the River Tigris, which has no immediate Communication with the Mediterranean Sea. Beſides, there is not Water enough for ſuch a Fiſh in this River at the Port of Ninive. This Reaſon, together with the ſurprizing Miracle, we muſt ſuppoſe, if we ſay that the Whale went into the Ocean, and doubled the Cape of Good-Hope, and entred into the Mouth of the Tigris, and made that prodigious Compaſs in three Days, takes away all ſorts of Subterfuge from ſuch as would excuſe Sulpicius Severus. That Notion never came into his Mind; he honeſtly believed that Ninive was Situated upon the Mediterranean Sea, and Erred for want of ſkill in Geography.

(D) Upon the Coaſt of the Euxine Sea.] Joſephus (g) Relates this Tradition; which has been follow'd by many Moderns (h), tho' it Claſhes with Probability, and Multiplies Prodigies; for according to Natural Laws, a Fiſh of that ſize cannot convey itſelf in ſo little a time from the Phenician Sea to the Black Sea. Beſides the Journey that Jonas was to make, either to return into Judæa, before he went to Ninive, or to go directly to Ninive, would have been too long and too difficult.

(E) Or upon the Coaſts of the Red Sea.] Lipenius (i) imputes this Opinion to Pineda, and to the Rabbins: And 'tis no difficult thing for him to Confute it; for the Whale muſt have enter'd into the Ocean, and have gone round Africa. See the Remark towards the End.

phet. Mr. d'Herbelot [a] says nothing of all this, tho' he relates many things reported of the Mahometans concerning Jonas. I will name a Modern Author, (G) who, according to Morery, made a most ingenious Poem upon the History of this Prophet.

JONAS (Arngrimus) an Islander made himself esteemed in the XVI*th.* and XVII*th.* Centuries by the Works he Published. He was still Alive [c] in 1644, being above 90 Years of Age. Four Years before, he had Married again a Young Woman. He was a learned and good Man, and in great Esteem among the Learned. He had been [d] Coadjutor to Gundebrand de Torlac, Bishop of Hole in Island. This Gundebrand was an Islander [e], a Man of great Learning and Probity. He had been a Disciple of Tycho Brahe, and was a good Astrologer. After his Death Arngrimus refused the Bishoprick of Hole, which the King of Denmark offered him [f]: he begg'd the King to dispence him with it, both to avoid being envied, and to prosecute his Studies with greater Tranquility. Most of the Books (A) he published, are Histories, and Descriptions of Island, or Apologies for his Nation. Bleskenius had said many Things to their Disadvantage, both with respect to (B) Witchcraft, and Lasciviousness (C). Arngrimus, confuted him. He died ‖ in the Year 1649. He had been Pastor of the Church of Melstad, and Overseer of the Neighbouring Churches in the Dioceses of Hole [g].

do (b), and after them Mariana and Tarnovius. If this was so, he must have been then above a Hundred Years old. They are Mr. Simon's Words in his Dictionary of the Bible, which are very obscure; for we don't know to what the Word then relates. Does it relate to the time of Jehu's Unction? Grammar will have it so, but the Sense will be absurd. Does it relate to the time of his Voyage to Ninive, or to the Reign of Jeroboam, the second of that Name? Guess at it if you can.

(G) I will Name a Modern Author, who, according to Morery, made a Poem.] He was a Gascon and a Minister, named Coras. He was Chaplain to Mr. de Turrenne for some Campaigns; afterwards he had a Church in the Lower Guienne, and there turned Papist, and had a considerable Office in the Presidial of Montauban. He published a Book before he changed his Religion, in which, if I well remember, he maintained, that the Protestants could not be reunited with the Roman Church. He published another to confute this after his Abjuration. The four (e) Poems, which he published upon the Histories of the Bible, sold well enough, tho' Mr. Despreaux; says the contrary in his Ninth Satyr.

Le David imprimé n'a point veu la lumiere.

The Enemies of Coras sent him by the Post to Montauban, a Pretended Letter from his Bookseller at Paris, in which he was desired to vindicate himself against Despreaux; because since the Publication of his 9th. Satyr, no body bought his Poems. He was provoked with that Insult, and published a very violent Piece against his Critick. He made some Verses against Racine, in the Year 1675. You'll see in (d) the Menagiana, a very pretty Epigram of Racine against him. Note, that he was descended from the famous Civilian John Coras, Counsellor in the Parliament of Toulouse, one of the Protestant Martyrs; for he was (e) hang'd for his Religion at Toulouse, in his Counsellor's Habit, in the Year 1572.

(A) The Books that he published.] I shall mention all those that I find in the Catalogues of Albert Bartholinus. Idea veri Magistratûs, Copenhagen 1589, in Octavo. Brevis Commentarius de Islandia, at the same place, 1593. in Octavo. Anatome Blefkeniana, at Hole in Island, 1612. in Octavo, and at Hamburg, 1618, in Quarto. Epistola pro patria defensoria, at the same place, 1618. Crymogæa Columnia, at the same Place, 1622, in Quarto. (f) Chrymogæa, seu veritatis Islandicarum libri tres, at the same Place, 1626. in Quarto. Vita Gudbrandi Thorlacii, at the same Place, 1630. in Quarto. Specimen Islandiæ Historicum, & magna ex parte Chorographicum, at Amsterdam, 1643, in Quarto (g).

A Learned Man, who has published the Treatise of Albert Bartholinus, with Historical and Critical Additions, informs me that the Anatome Blefkeniana, is a Confutation of a Book printed at Leyden in the Year 1607, and intituled, Islandiæ, seu descriptio populorum & memorabilium hujus Insulæ; that the Crymogæa was written in the Year 1603, and printed at Hamburg in 1609, with a Map of Denmark, and without it in 1610; that the Specimen Islandiæ Historicum contains an Apology for the Author's Opinion against the Reasons of John Isaacius Pontanus. Our Arngrimus Jonas maintains, that Island did not begin to be inhabited till towards the Year 874, and so cannot be the ancient Thule (h). Pontanus thought it a little strange that Arngrimus Jonas should write an Apology for an Opinion, that was less glorious to Island, than the contrary one; nevertheless, he spoke of this Islander with all sorts of Civility, and Marks of Esteem. See the Letter (i) which he wrote to Stephanius the 1st. of July 1638, Mr. Mollerus (k) gives us the Titles of some of our Jonas's Works, which have been omitted by Albert Bartholinus, some of which have been published, and others not.

(B) Concerning their Witchcraft.] Bleskenius says (l) that the Islanders sell the Wind, and that he has experienced it. Arngrimus laughs at this; for he says, 'that the Seamen of Island know over-Night by 'the Disposition of the Air, what Wind and Wea'ther there will be the next Day; and that when 'they Conjecture, that there will be such a Wind, 'which a Stranger waits for to go off, they go to 'him, and ingage to sell him this Wind; which they 'do in this manner. They ask the Stranger for his 'Handkerchief, in which they pretend to mutter some 'Words, and immediately (m) tie the Handker'chief with a Knot, as if it were for fear the Words 'pronounc'd should fly away. After this they give 'him his Handkerchief thus tied, and advise him 'to keep it carefully, as he receives it, assuring 'him that he shall have a good Wind for all his 'Voyage. Now it sometimes happens, that this 'Wind blows the next Day; but most frequently it 'changes after the Stranger is gone, and is out at 'Sea—— If it happens but once in a Hundred 'Times, that the Wind carries a Stranger to the 'end of his Voyage, that single Chance authorises 'the Error, notwithstanding a hundred contrary 'Experiments, and the Error is spread by him, who 'confidently says, because he believes it, that he 'bought the Wind in Island, and that this Wind 'has carried him safe Home. The same Bleskenius relates, (n), 'that there are some Magicians in 'Island, who have the Power to stop Ships in full 'Sail in the open Sea: he says also, that they who 'are thus stopt, make use of some slinking (o) Fumigations for a Counter-Charm, which he describe; with which, says he, they that are stopt, 'drive away the Devils, and the Ships being not 'harm'd, resume their Course.

(C) And Lasciviousness.] '(p) Bleskenius says, 'that the Germani, who Trade into Island, set up 'Tents near the Harbours where they land, and 'there expose their Merchandises, which are 'Cloaks, Shoes, Looking-Glasses, Knives, and 'abundance of Baubles, which they barter for the 'Commodities of the Islanders. The young Wo'men, which are very fair in that Island, but ill 'clad, come and offer themselves to the Germans, 'who have no Wives, for Bread or Biscuit, or any 'thing else of small Value. The Fathers them'selves present their Daughters to the Strangers; 'and if they are got with Child, it is a great Ho'nour to them. This makes them more respected 'and courted by the Islanders than the others, and 'there is a great Conteſt who ſhall have them. 'When the Iſlanders have bought, that is, barter'd 'Wine or Beer of the Foreign Merchants, they 'invite their Relations and Friends, and Neigh'bours, to drink both; and they never leave off 'till they have drank it all. They ſing, as they 'are tipling, the Heroick Actions of their Cap'tains——'Tis reckon'd an Incivility among 'them, to go from the Table, when they drink, to 'make Water. The young Women, which, as I 'have ſaid, are not ugly in this Country, ſlip un'der the Treſſles, and hand the Chamber-Pot to the 'Drinkers. Arngrimus Jonas will have this to be an 'abuſive Falſity, and is very angry with Blefkenius for ſcandaliſing the Iſlander Maids. The good 'Man can't bear to ſee his Countrymen contemptu'ouſly treated, and made Barbarians. If it was 'ever lawful for an Apologiſt to fall into a Paſſion, 'that of Arngrimus can't be blam'd; for 'tis not pro'bable that the Goſpel, which has been for ſo many 'Ages planted in that Iſland, could leave a People in 'ſo great a Brutality; nor, in Caſe Religion had 'made ſo little Progreſs among the Iſlanders, that the 'King of Denmark would ſuffer them to inſult the 'Laws of publick Decorum with Impunity. The 'Cuſtom of their Feaſtings does not ſeem to be fair'ly related; Matters are amplified to make the Reader 'laugh. Was ſuch a piece of Service, or ſo extra'vagant a Lazineſs ever heard of? Thoſe People not 'only will not riſe from Table to make Water, but 'will not ſo much as move their Hands. For this 'the Story leads us to; elſe why is it ſaid the young 'Women ſlip under the Treſtles. The Chamber-Pot 'might eaſily be given to the Gueſts without that, if 'all the Buſineſs was to ſave them the Trouble of ri'ſing. If what Blefkenius tells us were true, Jea'louſie (a) would not be an uſeleſs thing in the World.

(A) Died at Lombez.] As we learn from la Croix du Maine. He adds, that Lombez is 7 Leagues from Toulouſe, and becauſe 'tis not on the ſide of Languedoc, but on the ſide of Guienne, 'tis plain Sainte Marthe (b) is miſtaken, when he ſays, that Joubert died as he returned from Toulouſe to Montpellier. The Town of Lombez is at a great diſtance from that Road. Moreri is ſtill more to blame than Sainte Marthe, as thus: He ſays, as he had read it in la Croix du Maine, that this Phyſician died at Lombez, and he adds to it what he had read in Sainte Marthe, that Joubert died as he returned from Toulouſe to Montpellier. The joyning of theſe two Things proves him guilty of a Geographical Ignorance, which cannot be charged upon Sainte Marthe, who ſaid nothing of Lombez. A Man runs the hazard of committing Errors, when he mixes the Extracts of different Writers, without correcting their Inconſiſtencies. I don't mention the Chronological Blunder that is found in Moreri; 'tis plainly either a Fault of Impreſſion, or a want of Attention. You'll find in Moreri, that Joubert was born in 1624; that he made himſelf famous in the XVIth. Century; that he died in 1682, and that Du Verdier Vau-Privas, and la Croix du Maine, ſpeak of him (c) in ſome Works they publiſhed in the Year 1584, which have never been reprinted.

(B) He publiſhed a vaſt Number of Books.] His Latin Treatiſes are Two Volumes in Folio, in the Francfort Editions of 1582, 1599, 1645. One of the moſt conſiderable, is a Collection of Paradoxes, againſt which many (d) Phyſicians have written. He did not fail to reply to them. I obſerve, that his Treatiſe of the Paroreas was written in French, though when he publiſh'd it, he put it in the Title, that John Paul Zangmaiſtre, a Gentleman, born at Augsburg, who was Laurence Joubert's Scholar, had tranſlated it into French, from the ſaid Joubert's Latin (e).

(C) Becauſe he ſpoke with too much Plainneſs upon many nice Matters.] Perhaps the Queſtions about Virginity, and Generation, were never handled in French in ſo Natural Terms. He was ſo well pleaſed with the Subject, that he produced three Atteſtations made by ſworn Matrons, who had been ordered by the Judges to ſee whether ſome Maids that complain'd of having been raviſhed, complained wrongfully. The Firſt of theſe Atteſtations was made in Bearn; the Second at Paris, and the Third at Carcaſſonne. The Firſt declares the complaining Damſel to be a Virgin, the other two, that ſhe was deflowred. Joubert curiouſly compares together the Terms the Matrons made uſe of. A Book was printed in Holland in 1686, intituled (f) The Picture of Love conſider'd in the State of Marriage. The Author calls himſelf Salocini, a Venetian Phyſician; but 'tis known that his Name is Nicolas Venette, and that he is a Phyſician of Rochelle (g). He produces the like Atteſtations, and Furetiere took from him what he ſaid upon the Word Pucelage. To return to Joubert, He was tax'd with inventing theſe Atteſtations: (b) 'He well confutes this, 'in an Epiſtle to his Friends, naming him that Sup'plied him with thoſe of Paris and Bearn. As for 'that of Carcaſſone, I know that he had it from 'one that was principal Secretary to Marechal 'Dampville, who often recited it for Pleaſure. 'Mr. Joubert has much ado to underſtand the Terms 'theſe Midwives uſe, in order to apply them to the 'different Parts of the Member which diſtinguiſh'es the Sex. For he does not find there ſo many 'Parts as the Matrons do. In the publick Anato'mies we ſhew Sixteen or Seventeen of them; 'which I ſhall name in their natural Order, &c. La Croix du Maine obſerves, 'that ſome ſay, that 'Joubert ſpoke too freely, and alledged ſome Paſſa'ges too obſcene in ſome of his Works, particular'ly in his learned Books of Popular Errors; but if 'he has uſed, ſays he, ſome Terms too tickliſh for 'nice Ears, he was forc'd to do it, if he meant 'to be underſtood, and make his Books profitable to 'his Reader. Scævola de Sainte Marthe has reaſon to ſay, that this did the Author an Injury (a). Joubert himſelf was aware of it; for he laid that Work aſide, and as to what was already publiſhed, he endeavoured to anſwer ſome Complaints. He was blam'd for dedicating his Book 'to the Queen 'of Navarre, a moſt virtuous (b) Princeſs, the 'true Mirrour and Pattern of Honour, ſince ſhe was 'to treat at the beginning of his Book of obſcene 'Matters, writing of Conception, Generation, the 'Bellies, and Child-bearing (c). He anſwered 'that Complaint in the ſecond Edition; for beſides 'the Excuſes which he and Lewis Bertrand alledged '(d), he changed the Dedication, and preſented 'the whole Proceſs to Mr. de Fibrac, Chancellor of 'the ſaid Lady, to pick out ſuch Things as her 'Majeſty might know, and judge of without any 'Scruple; the ſaid Mr. de Fibrac reſerving the reſt 'to himſelf, as being more ſuitable to his Condi'on. There was another Complaint made againſt

Wife of Henry IV. But all this Buſtle was ſo far from hindring the Sale of the Book, that it very much contributed to make it (D) ſell the better.

This Work was to contain (E) Six Parts, each of 'em divided into Five Books; but he publiſhed only the firſt, and part of the ſecond. I'll mention a particular, which ſhews (F) that Joubert was a modeſt Man, and that he very well knew the Bounds of humane Knowledge.

JOVIUS (Paul) born at Como in Italy, in 1483, got a great Reputation by his Writings, and the Biſhoprick * of Nocera: but he was looked upon as a Mercenary Writer; ſo that no great Credit is given to his (A) Hiſtories. 'Tis ſaid, that he was not him. 'All this, ſaid ſome (e), would have been 'better in Latin than in French; ſuch Diſcourſes 'not ſounding ſo ill in a dead, as in a vulgar 'Tongue: Beſides Women and Maids who are moſt 'aſhamed of it, would have known nothing of it. Cabrol anſwers what follows. (f) the Sieur Joubert has ſufficiently anſwered this in his Epiſtle to his Friends, 'wherein he ſhews, that the chaſteſt Wo-'men in the World, may read it, and will learn 'nothing but virtuous Things from it, and their 'conjugal Duty; and their Husbands too. As for 'Maids, they cannot underſtand what is ſaid in it 'concerning the Works of the Fleſh, if they be 'Maids in Body and Soul, as one may ſay. But to 'ſatisfie every Body he has ſince left out whatever 'might give Offence to the moſt ſcrupulous Conſci-'ences; as knowing, we are not only to abſtain 'from Evil, but alſo from the Appearance of it. All theſe Reaſons are not good; and ſome of 'em are very pitiful.

(D) To make it ſell the better.] The Tract of vulgar Errors (g), 'has been printed in four ſeveral 'Places in half a Year, namely, at Bourdeaux, Paris, 'Lyons, and Avignon; and the leaſt Impreſſion in 'every place was 1600 Copies. This Book has been 'ſo much cried up, that being at firſt but Ten or 'Twelve Pence Price, it was afterwards ſold for a 'Crown, and even for four Livres; juſt as in times 'of Scarcity (a ſort of Famine) the Price of Corn 'riſes every Day. Nay, the Bookſellers and Prin-'ters are importuned for the reſt of the Work: 'And the Author is daily deſired to publiſh the reſt 'of it; at leaſt Five Books at a time, (if he will 'not do it all at once) according to the Diviſion he 'made of it. But he is ſo diſguſted, and full of Re-'ſentment upon the aforeſaid Complaints, being a 'Man of great Spirit, and extreamly jealous of his 'Honour, that he has often thought, as I know 'very well, to burn all that he has done of it. 'What a Loſs it would be!

(E) This Work was to contain Six Parts.] When he publiſhed the firſt, he added a Table, containing the Diviſion of the whole Work, and the Titles of the Chapters in every Book. But becauſe it was not he, that put the Second Part into the Preſs, it has not been anſwerable to the Plan he publiſhed. It is not divided into Five Books, and the Twenty Five Chapters it contains, don't correſpond with thoſe of the Model, either as to the Number or the Subject; you may ſee the reaſon of it in theſe Words of Cabrol. (b) He cannot be prevailed upon to 'condeſcend to the Publiſhing of the other Parts; 'which he keeps ſo cloſe, that there is no ſeeing or 'reading of them. Now, ſeeing his Reſolution (not to ſay Obſtinacy) I went about to print ſome 'Chapters, which I formerly had of him, having 'done me that Favour to explain to me ſome Pro-'poſitions, which I deſired to underſtand. They 'are not many; but moſt of the Chapters are very 'long, and contain many Heads, ſo that ſhould we 'divide 'em into Particulars, they would ſcarce be 'leſs than Thirty. Mr. Joubert made the firſt 'Draught of them, long before he publiſhed the 'firſt part of his Vulgar Errors: they are certain 'Subjects, which have ſince been diſpoſed by their 'Author in the Diviſion of the whole Work, both 'general and particular, to ſerve, one for the Se-'venth Book, another for the Eleventh, Seven-'teenth, Twentieth, Twenty Third, Twenty 'Fifth, Twenty Sixth, and ſo on to the Thirtieth. 'I have taken no other Care about their Order, 'ſince we can have nothing elſe at preſent from the 'Author. The ſame Cabrol ſays, (i) that whilſt he cauſed this to be printed, as it were by Stealth, he was ſurprized at the Printer's by Mr. Joubert, who took my Enterprize, adds he, very heinouſly. 'Ne-'vertheleſs, when he underſtood, that I deſigned to 'preſent you with it, he——permitted——the Book 'ſeller to go on, giving him beſides two fine Diſ-'courſes tranſlated from his Latin Paradoxes, by Ju-'ac Joubert his eldeſt Son. Note, that Gaſpar Ba-chot, Counſellor and Phyſician to the King, publiſh-ed in 1626, a Book (k) which he had written long before, to finiſh Lawrence Joubert's Deſign as to the third Part of his Vulgar Errors. He kept to the Chapters of the Books, according to the order he found them in, in the Table added to the firſt Part; but (l) he made the Conſtruction after his own way, without ſwearing in verba Magiſtri. This Book of Gaſpar Bachot is intituled, Errores Populares touchant la Medecine. Et regime de Santé. This Author is not to be found in Lindenius Renovatus.

(F) A Particular which ſhews, that Joubert was a modeſt Man.] Gaſpar Bachot, whom I mentioned in the foregoing Remark (m), was made Doctor of Phyſick in 1592. He gloried to have maintained his Theſis againſt all Opponents, and he looked upon his Doctorſhip as the Trophy of his Victory. (n) But as ſoon as I read your Anſwer (he writes this to M. de Lorme, Phyſician in ordinary to Lewis XIII. and firſt Phyſician to the Queen Mother) in which you acquainted me, that the late M. Joubert your Collegue and Friend, uſed to ſay of himſelf ter Doctor nunquam futurus doctus; who being learned, and having obtained that Laurel in three different Univerſities, whilſt he was admired by every Body, could not ſatisfie himſelf. I began from that time to have ſuch a Diſtruſt of my ſelf, that I thought all my former Labour uſeleſs, without hoping to grow learned, ſince ſo great a Perſon, like another Socrates, confeſſed his Inſufficiency, or the fear of his being able to arrive to the end of his Wiſhes. Note, that he ſays, that M. Joubert had learned his Profeſſion in Montbriſon (o), and in the adjacent Country, and lived there when his Decads were dedicated to Papon, a Renowned Civilian, the Glory of that Town (p).

(A) No great credit is given to his Hiſtories.] James Goborri made no ſcruple to ſay, that the Adventures of Amadis ſeemed as true as the Hiſtories of Paul Jovius. (q) Illud certe ad ſempiternam memoriam teſtatum reliquit Gorreus Pariſienſis, qui quas finxit (r) Amadiſi fabulas non minus veras ac probabiles quam Jovii ſcripta fore confidit. Thuanus has not made uſe of that Hyperbole, but he ſays enough to let us know the Eſteem that Writer was in. (s) Cum alioqui homo gratioſus ſe paſſim obnoxium prodat; eoque nomine ipſi in pleriſque rebus fides derogetur, quod adgratiam & in odium ſcripſiſſe, & venalem calamum habuiſſe fere omnibus perſuaſum ſit. To which you may add the Paſſage of Voſſius, who witneſſes that Paul Jovius had in ſome manner ſet up a Bank: he promiſed an antient Genealogy, and an immortal Glory, to all the Scoundrels that paid him well for his Pains, and he run down all others who would not pay him for his Lyes (a) Quam fluxa etiam fides patrum apud Paullus Jovius? quem conſtat in aula Henrici ſecundi quibuſque terræ filius bene de ſe merentibus generis claritatem ac perpetuum nomen pollicitum: contaque maledice eos traduxiſſe qui venali charo merces non gerarent. We ſhall ſee in the following Remark, from whence this is taken. He had offered his Pen to Don John III. King of Portugal; and becauſe his Offers were not accepted, he paſſed over in Silence a Victory of the Portugueſe. Had he had a good Salary for Writing the Hiſtory of Portugal, he would have forged imaginary Victories, ſo far would he have been from ſuppreſſing the true one. He has been therefore pitifully carried down. The Hiſtory of Emanuel's Life has a fling at him. Lusitana historia scribenda munus Joanni, hujus nominis tertio, Lusitaniæ regi venale proponeret, rex optimus non illum muneribus Insitis ad res Lusitanorum virtute gestas monumentis illustrandas invitavit. He has had the Fate of all Liars; he is hardly believed when he speaks Truth. The worst of all is, that his Lyes have been more profitable to him, than the Love of Truth has been to sincere Historians. This Complaint of Bodin is very well grounded. (c) Non quod multa non sint verè & eleganter ab eo scripta: sed hunc mendacii fructum tulit, ut etiam cum vera scribit, suspectus habeatur. Hoc tamen acerbius est ac indignius, quod cum historiam venalem prostituisset, uberiores tulit mendacii fructus, quàm quis alius vera scribendo. This Man was not in a Capacity to write a good History, for when he could say the Truth, he had no mind to it, and when he had a mind to it, he could not; he had no good Memoirs, except for the Transactions in Italy. This is what Bodin says (d), because Paul Jovius had not travell'd, nor been present at the Events, but had attended the Court of the Popes for Thirty Seven Years. This to me seems no Impediment to his collecting good Memoirs about other Countries. Besides Paul Jovius boasts of the Sieges and Battles he has seen (e), &c. See in the Remark F, another Passage of Bodin, and the Judgment of Justus Lipsius upon our Author, whom he taxes with an extream Partiality.

(B) He was not much ashamed to own it.] Bodin affirms, that Paul Jovius being asked, why he told so many Lyes, and suppressed true Events? answered, that he did it in favour of his Friends; that he knew well enough, that the present Age would give no Credit to his Histories, but that Posterity would not doubt of what he said. (f) Cum autem rogaretur cur simularet falsa, vera dissimularet, amicorum gratia id à se factum respondit; ac tametsi superstites intelligeret suis scriptis fidem derogaturos, attamen intelligebat infinita posteritati credibilia fore quæ sibi suisque populanibus laudem essent allatura. Some will have it, that he made Answer: 'A 'Hundred Years hence there will remain no Proof 'to convict me of Falshood: and therefore what 'I shall be read in my History, will be necessarily 'looked upon as Truth. (g) Anzi mi vien detto, che essendo biasimato il Giovio della infedeltà della sua historia, egli la confessò, soggiungendo però, che si riconfortava, sapendo, che dopo lo spatio di cento anni, non vi sarà più alcuna memoria in contrario; onde vennno i posteri necessariamente à dare indubitata fede à suoi scritti. Some say he bragged that (h) he had a Pen of Gold, and another of Iron, one for the Princes, who were bountiful to him, and the other against those Princes from whom he received nothing. 'Tis said also, that he confest, that the reason why he suppress the Three Books, where he spoke of Antony de Leva, was because that famous General made him no present, and that he resolved an ungrateful Man should have no Place in his Work. (i) Quis nescit quanta fuerit virtus Antonii Levæ Hispani ducis ut solus dici, aut cum paucis Imperator appellari nostri temporis possit: tamen nequissimus (k) historicus, seu potius fabulator, quod pecunias non dedisset, maluit totam corrumpere historiam, tresque libros qui illi debebantur intermittere, ne (ut ajebat) ingratum inferret historiæ. 'Tis said, that at the Court of Henry II. he promised a noble Genealogy to any one that would pay him for it, and threatned to slander all those that should cross him in his Design of getting Money (l). Paulus Jovius, me puero, in aula Henrici secundi obscurissimo cuique claritatem generis mercede pollicitus, maledicentia ulturus qui ejus nundinationi adversaretur. For my part, I can scarce believe, that he confest the things I have been relating. I find he boldly declares, that he printed his Book in the Life-time (m) of the Persons concerned, because he does not fear to be convicted of any Falshood, which he could not avoid, if he was not a Faithful Historian.

(C) No Man did ever ask for Presents with less reserve than he.] (n), 'His begging Trade put me 'in mind of that of Paul Jovius, who craved still 'more openly and more scandalously than he. 'I have read some Letters of his, which are admirable in that kind. In some of which he protests, that if the Cardinal de Lorraine did not pay him his Pension, he will say that he is no longer of the Race of Godfrey, (who gave the Archbishoprick of Tyre to a Pedant. In others, he begs two 'Horses of the Marquis of Pescara, and desires him 'for that effect to strike the Ground more stoutly 'than Neptune did. In others, he desires a Lady 'to send him some Sweet-meats from Naples, because he begins to be weary of eating new Eggs '(o), &c.

(D) Against Annas de Montmorenci. Brantome speaks of it.] Tho' Brantome's Passage be somewhat long, I will not omit it (p), I have heard a 'great Man say, that he had seen in the first Latin 'Impression of Paul Jovius (I know not how true 'it is) a little Touch, wherein 'tis said, that at the 'very same time the grand Signor Sultan Soliman, put to Death his great Favourite Ibrahim Bassa; 'the King of France put out of his Favour his 'great Favourite, the Constable de Montmorenci: but why, says he, did not he put him to 'Death; as the other did Ibrahim, or Hibraim Bassa? It was not, said he, but that he had as well 'deserved it: (And hereupon he specified some Impertinencies, that are not proper to be mention'd, 'and which are false) but because this great King 'was good and merciful, and the other was a real 'Tyrant. I don't know whether that Latin Edition, has this; but this Gentleman affirmed it to 'me. This is not in the French Version, and no 'credit is to be given to it; for the said Paul Jovius spoke it, if he did speak it, as a passionate 'Man, and dissatisfied with the said Constable, who, 'when he was recalled by King Henry, and went 'about to regulate the King's Houshold, as it was 'his Office, found amongst the Pensioners of 'the late King, a constant Pension of five Hundred 'Crowns, given to the said Paul Jovius, which he 'immediately struck out, giving the King to understand, that it was Money ill employed, he being 'more in the Emperor's Interests than in the French, 'and a great Lyar. The said Paul understanding 'that his Pension was cut off, fell a babling against 'the Constable, and railling bitterly against him. 'This it is to have to do with a virulent Tongue 'and Pen, which when provoked, spare nothing. 'Some say that the Constable, in the time of his 'Disgrace, had read this, which this Spark had 'writen rather to please the King, than for any 'reason, as generally such Writers are Flatterers, 'and Time-servers for their Belly's sake; and that 'therefore, when the Constable was recall'd, he 'paid him off, and had done worse, if he could 'have done it; for it is a great Trouble for a valiant and noble Man, like him, to be thus abused and 'exposed by a Writer, without any Reason. Some say, that Jovius's Spite proceeded only from his not obtaining some things which he confidently asked of the Constable. (a) Quod quidem expertus est Annas Mommorantius Comes Stabuli Francis traductus à venali historico, non aliam ob rem quam quod nescio quid impudenter petens, repulsam tulisset. I shall observe by the bye, that Francis I. had the reason to repent the Pension he gave Paul Jovius; for he appeared in the Writings of his Pensioner, more like a Conqueror than a conquered Prince. 'Tis said that Charles V. (b) made that Complaint.

(E) He was not accounted a Man of good Morals.] Cardan taxes him with Lewdness. (c) Hic noster historicus, says he, admirandus profecto magis (d) alius qui tametsi senex, parum abfuit, quin (e) perverit. Sed & id detestabilius, quod cum esset etiam Antistes, gaudebat numeri (e) procos adolescentulos. Cardan's Marginal Note has something very strange in it, which is, that Paul Jovius was an Hermaphrodite. Imperialis (f) owns that this Author was accused of leading a licentious Life, and of being very negligent in his Prayers, and repeating his Breviary.

(F) His Style was bright, but not Historical or correct enough.] Scaliger speaks thus of it. (g) Paulus Jovius mendaciſſimus & Guicciardino inferior, nimis affectato & luxuriante stylo, potius quam castigato utens. Roland Marefius speaks of it with the utmost Contempt, and even says it is full of Barbarisms. Quantum sentio, says he (h), non bonus est historiæ scriptor (Paulus Jovius) nec judicio satis valet: qui si vernaculè scripsisset, nullo in numero haberetur. Latinus enim sermo quasi fucus quidam labes illius multas contegit: qui primâ specie elegans videtur; nam belle sonat, & quibusdam imponit, mihi non item. Vix enim Latinus est, certè minime purus, totusque idiotismis scatet; nihil fere proprie effert, sed plerumque circumloquitur, nec pene ulla vox est sine epitheto. They are two very competent Judges, and therefore 'tis somewhat strange that Lipsius should speak so much in praise of Jovius's Style. Must we not conclude from it, that the taste of the best Criticks is not uniform upon a Subject, about which there ought to be no different Opinions? Those who know the Rules of Eloquence, and of the Art of History, ought to agree either in praising or condemning the Style of a Writer. But let us see what Character Lipsius gives of him (i). Paulus Jovius multorum judicia magis acerba quam libera experitur. Acriter valde in virum eunt. Ego de eo sic censeo, stilo bonum gravemque esse & plane ad historiam: judicio ac fide ambiguum. Ubi affectus non distrahunt, rectum, ubi illi adsunt, obnoxium. ad gratiam scilicet se dat & auram. Laudationum nec causſam sæpe habet, nec modum. Gentis suæ, Vastio, Medicæis nimis ex professo addictus. His quidem ita ut Laurentium Medicen parricidii rerum velut apud judices agat. Orationibus quoque aut frigidus interdum, aut ineptus. Lauandus tamen legendusque ob multiplicem & variam rerum seriem, quas redegit composite & dilucide in unum historiæ corpus (k.) Lipsius's Observation concerning the cold and impertinent Harangues that Paul Jovius has inserted in his History, puts me in mind of Bodin, who laughs at him for making Soldiers speak like Rhetoricians: (l) Præsertim in concionibus, epistolis, foederibus, decretis quæ Jovius pro arbitratu fingit, in quo tamen decorum ita confudit, ut imperiti milites ipsius Alciati sui laudatoris judicio, declamatores scholastici esse videantur. I am perſuaded that my Readers will be pleased to see here Alciatus's own Words, which Bodin goes upon. (m) Id à te præcipue desiderabam, ut ad illud quod Græci πρέπον vocant, non absurdè responderes. Sicuti in ea oratione animadvertebam, quæ à Marconio gregario milite, ad legiones jam planè consternatas & ad seditionem spectantes habebantur, quum Solymano Pannoniæ finibus excedente, Carolus Cæsar Vienna profectus in Italiam rediret. In ea siquidem concione omnes artis nervos numerosque ita expressisti, ut ille Marconius nequaquam ab aratro Volaterrani agri ad signa vocatus, sed ex schola Ciceronis & Hermogenis ad suggestum raptus esse videatur, quum passim exacta eloquentiæ schemata interniteant, quæ perorandi turbam parere cogerent.

Note, that these Words of Lipsius, Laurentium Medicen parricidii rerum velut apud judices agat, have been thus translated by Mr. Teissier, (n) He vindicates Laurence de Medicis from the Crime of Parricide, as if he was pleading for him before his Judges. Paul Jovius doth just the contrary; he pleads like the Advocate of this Lawrence's Accuſer would do (o). Doubtless M. Teissier thought, that the great Lawrence de Medicis is here meant, who was the Patron of the Learned in the XVth. Century; but this concerns another Lawrence, who assassinated Alexander de Medicis in the Year 1537.

(G) Which of all his Works is that he has taken most Pains in.] 'Tis the first he composed, and the last he published. He formed the Design of it in the Year 1515, and continued the Execution of it all his Life. He took for his Subject all that happen'd in his own time all over the World, beginning at the Year 1494, which was that in which the French conquered Naples under Charles VIII. This History contains 45 Books, and reaches to the Year 1544. But there's a considerable Gap from the 19th. Book to the 24th. inclusively (p). Those Six Books, which reached from the Death of Leo X to the sacking of Rome in 1527, contain but a short Summary of the Events. He lost (q) in the sacking of Rome, what he had composed upon that part of his History, and he would neither do it again, nor finish what was wanting, being dissuaded from it by two Reasons; one was, that he would have incurred the terrible Anger of some People; the other was, that he would not exercise his Pen upon a Subject that was ignominious to Italy. (r) Peritos medicos imitatus, carcinomata desperata curationis, quæ si attrectes, & acri medicamine lacessas, in immensum furere, & pestifera edacique serpigine mortem afferre solent, naturæ relinquenda, neque his ullo pacto manum admovendam judicavi. Quamobrem existimationi salutique meæ consulens, diræ tempestatis materiam, tanquam abominabilis impiique operis, minimè attingendam arbitratus sum, quando hæc adversæ fortunæ accepta vulnera, insaniaque nostra detrimenta, non modo non prodenda posteris, sed pro viribus occultanda esse videantur: hæ siquidem, quæ Italicum nomen dedecorent, neque memoria recoli sine dolore, neque sine uberrimis lachrymis scribi, nec sine flagitio pudoreque posteris enarrari queunt. We have seen above, that this Gap (s) has been much reflected upon to his Dishonour. 'Tis a remarkable thing, that tho' he had alledged these two Reasons as a very good Apology, yet in the following Page he promised to publish in a little Time, that part which was wanting to his History, (t) Quod si mihi quanquam pedibus capto, atque graviter senescenti, Deus magnus fatalis horæ spatium extendat, perpetuæ procul dubio lucubrationi eximat, ut totum id quod in clade urbis ereptum, vel à me postea contumaci quadam indignatione prætermissum fuit, non diu à bonis mortalibus desideretur. Besides, he tells us, that he has filled up that Gap, by the particular Lives he has published. The Preface, out of which I have taken this, was written at Pisa the first of May, 1552. 'Tis the Epistle Dedicatory of the Second Volume of his History. The Author died in December following, and had not the Satisfaction of seeing the third and last Volume out of the Press. He had his Work printed at Florence. He who says that it was the first Work that Paul Jovius composed, is wretchedly confounded in his Calculations. He says, that the Author began to write it in the Year 1515, when he was about Thirty Years of Age, and that he died being near Seventy five Years old, and that during the Thirty seven Years, that he spent upon it, his Fortune was very much unsettled. not obtain (H) the Bishoprick of Como. He had a Brother called Benedictus (I) Jovius, who wrote some Books. There was one Paulus JOVIUS, who in the Council of Trent, gave his Opnion in a curious manner upon the Question (K) concerning Residence.

opus, omnium suorum primum exorsus fuit, licet omnium postremum illud ediderit, eique quinque fermè annis septuagenario major immortuus est. Triginta itaque illis ac septem annis quibus historiam concinnavit, varia & ipse fortuna (uti fieri solet) jactatus JOVIUS. We may reckon here three Faults. 1. A Man that is employed in a thing from his Thirtieth to his Seventy fourth Year, labours Forty four, and not Thirty seven Years. 2. Paul Jovius dying in the Year 1552, lived not above Seventy four Years, if it be true that in 1515, he was not above Thirty: He would have lived but Sixty seven Years, or thereabouts. 3. Paul Jovius's Epitaph (a) gives him Sixty nine Years, seven Months, and Twenty two Days; 'tis not therefore true that he lived near Seventy five Years, and 'tis speaking unexactly to say, that he was about Thirty Years of Age in 1515.

I shall occasionally observe, that the Book De Piscibus Romanis, is the first (b) that Jovius published. He dedicated it to Cardinal Lewis de Bourbon. The Epistle Dedicatory is dated from the Vatican, the 20th. of March, 1524. He then proposed to himself, a thing which he did not execute, which was speedily to put into the Press the first Decad of his History. (c) Exhibit in publicum propediem hujusmodi laboriosissimi operis prima decas, non sine aliqua spe immortalitis.

Alcyonius praises it in a Book which was printed in 1522; but this ought not to serve for a Proof of its being printed; he might mention it, as having read it in Manuscript. These are his Words. (a) Quam etiam scribendi laudem, felicissime consequutus est Paulus Jovius tuus, in ea decade, quæ res omnes complexus est, quæ toto terrarum orbe gestæ sunt, postquam Carolus VIII. Rex Galliæ cum Maximis Copiis transgressus Alpeis tranquillum Italiæ Statum perturbavit, & prima funestissimorum in Italia Bellorum jecit semina. Historia enim hujus Clarissimi Scriptoris, omnes Elegantiæ flores, omnia Eloquentiæ lumina habet, & mira Orationis Claritate splendescit (usque eo omnia ornate narrantur) & regiones aut pugnæ admirabiliter describuntur, & conciones hortationesque prudenter & gravissime interponuntur. Denique illius auctor, varietate, evagationibus amplificationibus, digressionibus non minus præstantis Historici quam eximii Oratoris laude, ab omnibus decorari debet.

(H) Because he could not obtain the Bishoprick of Como.] This appears from a Letter (d) which Andrew Alciatus writ to him. 'Tis dated from Pavia, the 7th. of October, 1549, and is an Answer to a Letter, which Paul Jovius wrote to him to acquaint him with his Discontent, and design of leaving Rome, and betaking himself to Florence. Scribis te gravi injuria permotum, Urbe (quod nunquam fieri posse putaram) propediem excessurum, ne diutius acceptæ contumeliæ deformis testis in ea aula spectaris, in qua per multos annos (uti mihi videtur) cum aurea mediocritatis bonis plane beatus, tum studiorum tuorum Authoritate clarus hactenus fuisti. Mirum profectò videri potest, quid tibi doctrinæ ac ætatis honore majora promerito, in petitione Pontificatus patriæ tuæ Paulus Pontifex quendam prætulerit. At quem hominem? qui Comi neque natus, neque uniquam visus sit, & qui (sicut à multis audio) ex arcanis cubiculi sordibus in lucem repente sit productus. This is well enough; he speaks very freely of the Holy Father, and uses him little better in what follows. Quis in hoc Pontificem [illegible] non judicet: non enim hostis bonarum literarum & plane ferreus esse non potest qui te gravissimarum rerum scriptorem intempestive contempserit——Dices te indigne deceptum ab inveterati æstus sene principe, qui blandis promissis vota tua honestè concepta iniquè fefellerit. I fancy Thuanus has committed a Mistake; he pretends that it was Clement VII. who refus'd Paul Jovius the Bishoprick of Como, and that his refusal drew upon him some hard Words in the Books of that Historian. (e) Cum ad Novocomensem Episcopatum omnibus votis anniteretur, suaque erga Medicæam familiam, in cujus laudes profusus fuerat, observantia deberi id meritorum fiducia putaret, tamen ab eo obtinere non potuit: quod in causa fuisse plerique credunt, cur Clementem in Historiis avaritiæ & tenacitatis insimulet.

(I) Called Benedictus JOVIUS, who wrote some Books.] He was Paul's Elder Brother, and proved a kind of a Father to him; 'twas he that educated him, and instructed him, and encouraged him to be an Author; for having shewn him two of his Works, viz. the History of Como, and a Treatise of the Actions and Manners of the Swiss, he kindled in him the desire of Writing a General History. He led a very quiet and retired Life, in the place of his Birth, which he never left but to go to Milan to hear the Lectures of a Greek Professor. He had learn'd that Language of himself; but he desired to learn to pronounce it, which was the occasion of his only Journey. He lived Seventy three Years in perfect Health and Vigour of Body and Mind. He designed a Century of Letters full of Learning, for the Publick; and his Sons were to have (f) the care of publishing them, with some other Compositures which he left 'em, some Translations from the Greek, and some Pieces of Poetry. Their Uncle expected this from their Diligence (g), but I think there was nothing of this Author printed besides some Latin Poems. We are not to believe that Paul JOVIUS, junior, whereof many Latin Verses are to be seen in the Elogies which our Paul Jovius composed, was Benedict, Jovius's Son. He was Nephew to Julius JOVIUS, who was made Coadjutor to his Uncle (h) in the Bishoprick of Nocera, the 21st. of August, 1551, and was Bishop of that place after him. Paulus Jovius junior, a good Poet, was made Coadjutor to his Uncle, Julius Jovius, in the same Bishoprick, the 29th. of November, 1560, and was his Successor there. He kept that See Twenty five Years, and died in the Year (i) 1585. I have said elsewhere (k), that Paul Jovius was no Poet.

(K) Gave his Opinion in a curious manner upon the Question concerning Residence.] One of my Friends, who heard me say all that I remembred of our Paul Jovius, represented to me, that I had forgot a notable Circumstance. He was, said he, one of the Fathers of the Council of Trent; and having no Skill in Divinity (for he had been a Physician before he was made a Bishop, and never interrupted his Study of humane Learning.) I believe he did not distinguish himself in that Assembly, when he was to give his Opinion upon any Point of Doctrine. He had a great Interest, not to suffer that the Residence of Bishops should be declared to be of Divine Right. This Assertion so warmly maintain'd by some of the Deputies, did not please him. He opposed it with Reasons taken from Experience; he shewed, that the Dioceses, in which Residence was observed, were no less (l) disorderly than others; and he instanced upon the City of Rome. This Friend shewed me immediately the 470th. Page of Father Paul, where I find what follows. 'If the Absence of the Prelates was the true cause 'of Abuses, we should see less Corruption in the 'Churches, where the Bishops have resided in our 'time. For this Hundred Years the Popes have 'continually kept at Rome, and taken great care to 'have the People instructed; and yet after all, we 'don't see that City better governed. The Capital 'Cities of Kingdoms, where the Bishops have al'ways resided, are more corrupted than some 'wretched Places that have not seen their Bishops 'for a Hundred Years. And none of the ancient 'Prelates, that are present here, and have always 'resided (for there are some such) can shew us, 'that his Dioceses is better ordered, than those of 'his Neighbours, who never resided. They who 'say that those Churches are Sheep without a Shep'herd, ought to consider that Curates have the 'Charge of Souls as well as Bishops; and yet these 'are only spoken of, as if there could be no true 'Christians, but where there are Bishops. Some 'People in the Mountains, who never saw one in 'their Lives, might serve for a Pattern to Episco'pal Cities. We ought to praise and imitate the Zeal 'and Conduct of the Fathers of this Country under 'Paul, who have decreed some Penalties against the 'Prelates, to oblige 'em to Residence, and have be-haps their Absence was less scandalous than their would have been.

I must not forget that our Paul Jovius has been blamed for giving too much Credit (L) to Astrological Predictions, and such like Superstitions. 'gun to remove the Impediments, which kept them 'from their Churches. Rather than flatter our 'selves with a vain Hope, that Residence will pro'duce the Reformation of the Church, we ought 'to fear, that as we design at present to command 'Residence, the (m) Inconveniencies which will 'arise from it, may oblige our Successors to apply 'to them the Remedy of Absence (n). I easily undeceived my Friend, by telling him, that the Writer of the History of that Council speaks of one Paul Jovius (o), Bishop of Nocera, in the Year 1562, Ten Years after the Death of Paul Jovius, who is the Subject of this Article.

(L) For giving too much Credit to Astrological Predictions, and such like Superstitions.] Martin del Rio having mention'd some things, which seem to prove, that Chiromancy and Astrology can reveal Futurities, adds: (a) Unus ista omnia narrat Jovius, (b) nec usquequaque indubitatæ fidei historicus, nec satis à superstitiosis & gentilium ne dicam opinionibus, saltem locutionibus, alienus. He had before blam'd him for having some respect for a Remark of Amniomancy. This is the Name they give to the Art of Divining by the Inspection of the Membrane Amnios, wherewith a Child is wrapp'd up in his Mother's Belly. (b) Sed & Jovius ne quid superstitionis omitteret, nimis hujusmodi vanitatibus pro Episcopo deditus, in Ferdinandi Davali nativitate (lib. 1. Piscarii) hujusmodi pelle involutum ex utero prodiisse consideravit. This Membrane commonly breaks when the Child is born, but sometimes it is preserved whole, and this is taken for a Sign of good Fortune: (c) whence comes the Proverb, il est né coiffé, (he is wrapp'd up in his Mother's Smock). Paul Jovius curiously observed this Circumstance in the Nativity of the Noble Marquis of Pescara; and we have just now seen how he was Censur'd for it by Martin del Rio. I add another Proof of his fondness for Astrology. Having said that there happen'd Revolutions of Religion all the World over towards the beginning of the XVIth. Century, he ascribes it to the influence of the Stars. I will tell this Story in the Words of Florimond de Remond, because they will acquaint us with a little trick of a Translator. '(d) Almost at the same 'time, says Jovius, that Ismael Possess'd the Em'pire of the Persians, and chang'd the Religion, 'mixing it with a new Mahometan Superstition, 'there arose in Germany under the Conduct of Lu'ther, that Monstrous Heresy, which went about 'to destroy the Catholick Religion, as the People 'had done in Persia, bigotted with their new Follies 'and Superstitions. Whereupon, says he, I freely 'Acknowledge that it came to pass by a Secret 'Power of Heaven, and a Malignant Influence of 'the Stars, that at the same time, all the Religions 'in the Universe began to change; since not only 'the Mahometans, but also the Christians, nay 'the Idolatrous Nations that are Remotest from us, 'both in the East-Indies, and in the New World 'lately discover'd in the West, fell into New Reli'gions and Opinions. This is what the Latin 'Jovius says. But in the French Translation the 'sincerity of the Translator is Remarkable; who 'passes over in silence all that Jovius says of this 'Change of Religions, and of that Monstrous Lu'theran Heresy that sprung up in Saxony: This 'went to the Heart of him. With what faithful'ness do they handle the Holy and sacred Books, 'who can thus lame, without any Shame, the His'torians that are but just come into the World, 'only to suppress one Word which touches Luther 'the Father of all the Heresies that disturb Chri'stendom. Florimond de Remond cites the 13th. Book of Paul Jovius's History, where I find in fol. 239th. verso of the Strasburg Edition 1556. that which follows: Nec multo post exarsit in Germania author Luthero dira hæresis, qua populis, ut in Perfide acciderat, ad insaniam versis, Christiani dogmatis placita, & veteres sacrorum ritus vehementissimè conturbavit. Ita ut facilè crediderim ab occulta cœli potestate, malignoque syderum concursu provenisse ut religiones toto terrarum orbe enatis factionibus, uno tempore scinderentur, quando non Mahometani modo Christianique, sed & remotissimæ gentes idololatræ, aut sydera aut portenta pro Diis venerantes, cum in India quæ ad Orientem vergit, tum in Novo orbe ad Occiduam plagam reperto, novas sacrorum opiniones induerint. I know no other French Translator of Paul Jovius's General History besides Denys Sauvage. Was he a Protestant? And is it he that was Guilty of the Fraud which Florimond de Remond objected to the Reform'd?

(A) And serv'd still in the Companies of the Life-Guards.] In saying this, I principally regard these Words of Eutropius: (e) Post hunc (Julianum) Jovianus, qui tunc DOMESTICUS MILITABAT, ad obtinendum imperium consensu cunctorum electus est, commendatione patris quàm sua militibus notior. But it must be observed that the Expressions of this Author, are not precise enough, and that they ought to be rectified by those of another Historian, which more Expressly shew the Degree to which Jovian arriv'd. (f) Jovianus eligitur Imperator, Domesticorum ordinis primus paternis meritis mediocriter commendabilis. As Military Imployments have not at present the same Order, or the same Disposition, as in that Age, it would be difficult to find a Word that signifies exactly what is meant by domesticorum ordinis primus, or (g) primicerius domesticorum; but we may very well presume that those Words don't signify, that Jovian was the Chief, or Captain of the Guards call'd Domestici, for the true name of their Captain was Comes Domesticorum (h). 'Tis said in Moreri's Dictionary, that Jovian was Captain of the Prætorian Guards, when he refus'd to Abjure Christianity under Julian the Apostate. This is taken from Socrates the Historian, who (i) making use of the Word χιλιαρχος, does not Authorize Moreri's Phrase. Observe that Theodoret affirms that Jovian (k) had no Imployment in the Army when he was made Emperor. Ammianus Marcellinus who says the contrary, is more credible, for he was upon the Spot.

(B) Jovian Concluded a Peace so Shameful and Disadvantageous ——— that he Expos'd himself ——— to the Scorn.] He gave up to the Persians five Provinces, with some Places that were a strong Rampart to the Roman Empire. Amongst others, the Important Town of Nisibis, (l) and that of Singara; and he difficultly obtain'd Liberty for the Inhabitants to retire into the Roman Territories (m). He oblig'd himself not to give any Assistance to the King of Armenia, who had constantly been a good and faithful Friend of the Emperors. This was, say the Historians, a sort of Impiety, and the ruin of this faithful Friend, and the Soul of Armenia. (n) Quibus exitiale simul accessit & impium, ne post hæc ita compositis, Arsaci posceuti contra Persas ferretur auxilium, amico nobis semper & fido ——— Unde posteà contigit, ut vivus cæsereturidem Arsaces, & Armenia maximum latus Medii conterminans, & vantageous to the Roman Empire, that he expoſed himſelf to the Murmurs of the Publick.

& Artaxatâ inter diſſenſiones & turbamenta rapserent Parthi. Nothing can be more moving than the Deſcription of the Condition the Inhabitants of Niſibis (o) found themſelves in, when they ſaw they were forc'd to remove to another Place. Their Intreaties to Jovian not to force them to leave their Country, were enough to break his Heart; and yet he had no regard to them, Alledging the engagement of his Word, and the fear of Perjury: But 'twas believed he did not aſſign the true Subject of his Fear. (p) Et hæc quidem ſuppliciter ordo & populus precabatur: ſed verbis loquabantur ineaſſum, Imperatore, ut fingebat alia metuens, perjurii piacula declinante. 'Twas thought he only obſerv'd his Word, becauſe he fear'd that if he ſtaid in this Country, and ſhould have any new Quarrels with the Perſians, he ſhould have a Competitor for the Empire. There was Reaſon perhaps for ſaying this; but at the bottom the Roman Hiſtorians are much to blame for complaining of his punctual Execution of the Peace. Here is a Paſſage of Eutropius, who Cenſures him for it, and makes his great Fault to conſiſt in that: For otherwiſe he owns that Jovian was oblig'd by a ſort of neceſſity, to conſent to thoſe Ignominious Conditions, which were never before impos'd on the Roman People. (q) Jam turbatis rebus, exercitu, quoque inopia laborante vino à Perſis atque altero prælio victus (Jovianus) pacem cum Sapore neceſſariam quidem, ſed ignobilem fecit, multatus finibus, ac nonnulla imperii Romani parte tradita: quod ante eum annis mille centum & duobus-de-viginti fere, ex quo Romanum imperium conditum erat, nunquam accidit. Quinetiam legiones noſtræ ita & apud Caudium per Pontium Teleſinum, ita & in Hiſpania apud Numantiam, & in Numidia ſub jugum miſſæ ſunt, ut nihil tamen finium traderetur. Ea pacis conditio non penitus reprehendenda foret, ſi fœderis neceſſitatem, cum integrum fuit, mutare voluiſſet: ſicut à Romanis omnibus bis bellis, quæ commemoravi, factum eſt. Nam & Samnitibus, & Numantinis, & Numidis confeſtim bella illata ſunt: neque pax rata fuit. You ſee that he is Cenſur'd for not having imitated the Antient Romans, who without any delay Attack'd the Nations, which had obliged 'em to accept of a ſhameful Capitulation, but had never made 'em loſe an Inch of Ground. And ſince he was Cenſured, tho' he Reigned but ſeven or eighth Months, for not repairing the Diſgrace and Loſs this Peace brought along with it, 'tis plain they would have had him break theſe Articles a few Days after they were Concluded, and aſſoon as his Army was ſupplied with Proviſions, and in a Place of ſafety: But were not theſe Politicks manifeſtly unjuſt? Suppoſe that after a very Prejudicial Peace which neceſſity has extorted, it may be Lawful to ſeek an Occaſion of Relief; muſt one not let ſome time paſs, and wait for Pretences and Conjectures which time never fails to ſupply? You ſee that even according to the Corrupt Maxims of Politicks, Jovian would have been guilty of a horrible Treachery, if he had done what the Hiſtorians blame him for having omitted it. The three Examples Alledged by Eutropius are not like this. The Senate and the People might Lawfully break the Agreement of their Generals; but Jovian who Concluded the Peace, knew no Superiour, he was ſole Maſter. Note that what went moſt to the Heart of the true Romans was the yielding of a Country which did belong to the Empire; for they pretended, that the like had never been ſeen before; and it was ſo little conſiſtent with their Maxims to ſuffer their States to leſſen, that they allowed the honour of a Triumph only to thoſe who extended their Frontiers: It was refuſed to ſome Generals who had done great Actions, but without any other Fruit, than recovering what had been loſt before. Read the Deſcription of this Roman Grandeur in theſe Words of Marcellinus. (a) Illud tamen ad medullas uſque bonorum pervenit: quod dum antimeſcit æmulum poteſtatis, dimque in animo per Gallias & Illyricum verſat, quoſdam ſæpe ſublimiora cupiſſe, famam adventus ſui prævenire feſtinans, indignum imperio facinus amisit perjurii fugiendi cautiſſ, Niſibi proditæ: quæ jam inde à Mithridatici regni temporibus, ne Oriens à Perſis occuparetur, viribus exhibitis maximis. Nunquam enim ab Urbis ortu inveniri poteſt annalibus replicatis, ut arbitror, terrarum pars illa noſtrarum ab Imperatore vel Conſule hoſti conceſſa: ſed nec ob recepta quidem quæ direpta ſunt, verum ob amplificata regna triumphalis gloria fuiſſe delata. Unde P. Scipioni ob recuperatas Hiſpanias, Fulvio Capuâ poſt diuturna certamina ſuperatâ, & Opimio poſt diverſos exitus prœliorum, Fregellanis nunc internecivis hoſtibus ad deditionem compulſis, triumphi ſunt denegati. Id etiam memoria nos veteres docent, in extremis caſibus ita cum dedecore fœdera, poſquam partes verbis juravere conceptis, repetitione bellorum illico diſſolutâ: ut temporibus priſcis apud Furcas Caudinas ſub jugum legionibus miſſis in Samnio, & per Albinum in Numidia ſcelerè pace cogitata, & auctore turpiter pactionis feſtinato Mancino dedito Numantinis. Obſerve that the Remark B muſt be conſidered as a Conſequence of this; for I there examine whether Eutropius and Ammianus Marcellinus had reaſon to Affirm what they ſay.

If we Reflect never ſo little upon the Temper of Nations, and eſpecially on the condition that Chriſtians and Heathens were then in, we ſhall eaſily believe that the Emperor Jovian became Odious and Contemptible, and the Subject of many Satyrs. The People fear and hate War; they love and deſire Peace, and with good Reaſon; for they ſuffer the greateſt Inconveniencies of the War: nevertheleſs they are Afflicted at a Treaty of Peace, that Diſgraces the Nation, and deprives it of a Frontier, that was a ſafe Barrier to it, and made it Formidable to its Neighbours. Victories and Conquests Rejoyce the meaneſt Peaſants, and make 'em more Patiently bear the burden of the War. Taxes and Impoſts are more eaſily forgotten when the War is attended with good Succeſs, and with an Advantageous Peace. Every one has a ſhare in the Glory of the Nation; but the thought that the Enemies will grow Haughty, Contemptuous, and Inſulting upon their Terminating the War by a Peace wholly to their Mind, overwhelms them with Grief and Indignation. Muſt ſo many Charges and Expences, ſay they, go for nothing? &c. See above (b) the Murmurs of the French againſt the Peace of Cateau. Never were People in a better Capacity to ſhew the like Indignation than under the Empire of Jovian: There was great Emulation betwixt the Chriſtians and the Heathens. The latter had juſt loſt an Emperor whom they lov'd, and from whom they expected mighty things; they Flattered themſelves with the hopes, that his Expedition againſt the Perſians would be Advantageous and Glorious; and they ſaw that Death having deprived him of theſe fine Triumphs, he was ſucceeded by a Chriſtian Prince, under whom things were reduced to a miſerable Condition. To Murmur againſt ſuch a Prince, to Cenſure and Satyrize him, was to Gratify many Paſſions at once; 'twas heightning Julian's Glory, and making the Chriſtians Aſhamed; 'twas Sacrificing to the Idol of Politick Vanity, and to their Zeal for Religion. They failed not to Act according to theſe ſeveral Principles: They (c) made Verſes and Parodies to abuſe Jovian. The Libellers of Antioch Diſtinguiſhed themſelves; they diſperſed their Libels againſt him in the Streets, and Poſted up others; they turned him into Ridicule, by applying to him ſome Places of the Iliads, and amongſt others that of the third Book (d), where Paris is ſo roughly Treated by his Brother Hector; and that of the ſecond Book, (e) where Ulyſſes threatens Therſites to ſtrip him Naked, and to ſend him ſhamefully Packing.

lick. The ſecond is, that he did not approve the uſing of Violence (C) for the Extirpation of Sects. (C) He did not approve the uſing of Violence for the Extirpation of Sects.] The Philoſopher Themiſtius gives him an Elogy which does not agree with the Accounts we find in Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory. He praiſes him for permitting all Men to ſerve God in their way, and fixing by that means the inconſtancy of thoſe Flatterers, who had changed their Religion, juſt as the Imperial Purple had changed Hands whom (l) he compares to Euripus. (m) Θαυμάζειν βασιλέα, ὅτι τοῖς ἄλλοις ἅπασιν ἐξῆν ἐπὶ τοῦτο ἐλθεῖν, ὅπερ ἐβούλοντο, καὶ τοῖς μὲν ἐπὶ τὰ πρόσω τῶν πολλῶν τὰς ὁδοὺς ἐκκόψαι, ἐπὶ τὰ ὀπίσω δὲ πάλιν ἐμβιάσασθαι· αὐτὸς δὲ ἀνεπιτήδευτος μηδὲν τοιοῦτον αὐτὸς ἐφεύρηται, μήτε μὴν ἑτέροις ἐπιτρέψας τοῦτο ποιεῖν, μηδὲ ἐπὶ τοῦτο ἐλθεῖν ἐθελῆσαι. Imperatorem magnis effert laudibus, ob id quod conceſſa cuique libera facultate colendi numinis prout vellet, adulatorum mores compreſſerit. Quos quidem facete perſtringens, ait experimento cognitum eſſe, illos non Deum ſed purpuram colere: planeque ſimiles eſſe Euripo, qui modo in hanc, modo in illam partem fertur. Themiſtius ſpoke in this manner in his Oration upon Jovian's Conſulſhip. Which ſignifies, that the Emperor did not forbid the Heathens to Worſhip their Gods in their old way; and yet we learn from Socrates the Hiſtorian, (n) that all the Temples of the Heathens were ſhut up, and that theſe Idolaters concealed themſelves, ſome in one Place and ſome in another; that the Philoſophers left off their Habit, and that the Sacrifices, which had been ſo frequent in Julian's time, were at an end. It muſt be ſaid then, that Themiſtius uſed an Hyperbole, that was only grounded upon Jovian's Moderation to Hereticks, and which perhaps was a ſly Exhortation to tolerate all Religions in the ſame manner. That which is certain, is, that this Prince ſeeing himſelf Courted by all the Chriſtian Sects, every one deſiring to gain him; declared (o) for the Orthodox Party, as to the Conſubſtantiality of the Word; but he did not give way (p) to the Requeſt of Expelling from their Churches ſuch as were of another Opinion; and he Anſwered that he hated Diſputes, and that he loved and eſteemed the Lovers of Peace and Unity. He deſign'd by his Gentleneſs and Mildneſs to extinguiſh all the Schiſms of the Church; for which Reaſon he gave out, that he would Perſecute no Body, and that he would Love and Honour eſpecially ſuch, as expreſs'd the greateſt Zeal for the Re-eſtabliſhment of Peace. (q) Ὁ μέντοι βασιλεὺς ἐπιτρέπει μὲν ἅπασι, κελεύει δὲ πᾶσιν ἀνεπιφθόνως τὰ πάτρια νέμεσθαι· ἐπιτρέπει δὲ καὶ τοῖς ἐκκλησιαστικοῖς ἀνδράσιν ἐπὶ τὰς ἑαυτῶν ἐκκλησίας ἰέναι, φίλειν μέντοι καὶ ἀσπάζεσθαι τοὺς ὁμοδόξους μᾶλλον ἐκείνων ἐπιτάττει. Cæterum Imperator id ſibi propoſuerat, ut diſſidentium jurgia blanditiis & leni verborum perſuaſione extingueret: ajebatque ſe nemini omnino qualiſcunque fidei eſſet, moleſtiam exhibiturum: eos tamen præ cæteris amaturum atque in pretio habiturum, qui reparanda in Eccleſia pacis auctores ac duces ſe præberent. I muſt obſerve that he made a ſevere Law (r) againſt thoſe who ſhould endeavour to Marry the Nuns, or behave themſelves immodeſtly to them; for he Ordered them to be Puniſhed with Death. He was induced to this ſeverity that he might ſuppreſs the Audacious'neſs that was uſed in Julian's Reign, in Marrying the Nuns, and Imploying ſometimes Force, and ſometimes Perſuaſions (s) to Corrupt them.
